This gentleman, the representative of one of the oldest families in Dauphin's [illegible] the possessor of very extensive estates, died at Bena House, Pembroke, in the course of last week. He was born 9th August, 1790, and married, 11th September, 1817, Harriet, only daughter of Arthur-James, eighth Earl of Pembroke, by whom [illegible] leaves four sons and one daughter. Of the former, the eldest, John Arthur Jones, Esq., now of Llanarth, is married to the daughter of Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., of Llanover, M.P. for Marylebone [illegible] son has sought, during the last few years of his life, to obtain Royal permission to resume the ancient name of his family, Herbert, or Herberten, [illegible] at his decease. The patronage of [illegible] and Herbert, and head chief of Vernandale, was the Prince [illegible] Lord Herbert, and filled the office of Chamberlain to William Rufus. From [illegible] of Herbert's descendants sprang the families of [illegible] Worcester, and of Jones of Llanarth, uniformly the [illegible] the elevation of the Earls of Pembroke, the Lords Herbert of Cherbury, &c. The noble house of Raglan is also a scion of the Jones's of Llanarth.

The deceased's great-uncle, who was eldest son of John Jones, Esq., of Llanarth and Upton Court, had six brothers, the second of whom, William, now of Clytha, inherited the great property of his grand-uncle, W. Jones, Esq., of Clytha

LADY MARY FITZROY.

The Sydney papers bring intelligence of a [illegible] accident to the wife of the [illegible] governor. While driving in a carriage, by which Lady Mary Barry, wife of Sir Charles Augustus Fitzroy, K.C.H., Governor of New South Wales, was killed, the reins were consigned to the grave at Sydney, the funeral solemnities being attended by nearly the whole of the Government Officers and Ministers of the Colony. Upwards of 3000 persons were present.

The effect of the ever-advancing battalions was frequently curious enough: some had placed green branches in their muskets, and came on like Burnam wood; others had nosegays and branches of lilac in theirs, and looked like moving flower-beds

There was never a symptom of disturbance or of the slightest ... weariness until the last legion—the first of the National Guards—came ... and then ... which ... after ... longed fatigue ... astonishing. It must not be forgotten that these ... Republic to speak for itself, the established power ... protection ... and ... and ... cipline and fatigue, who showed this spirit. When, at ten o'clock at night, they were returning to their homes, they might be heard laughingly saying, "Well, now we'll go to breakfast." The whole effect of this seemingly interminable review was such as to make it seem almost incredible that, like processions on the stage, the troops were continually passing round and round again, having passed back behind the scenes through the streets.

The ferment of the returning troops and the swarming crowds continued until long after midnight. The whole city was very brilliantly illuminated, as were the Champs Elysées with their usual holiday show. But this time there was no cry of "Des amphions!" no ill-will displayed towards the very few houses that remained dark. It was now the spontaneous triumph of the cause of order. It was expected that during the night, at a moment when all the National Guards were harassed with fatigue, a fresh attempt would be made by the Ultras; but nothing of the kind took place. The number of men under arms during the day amounted to 400,000.

At night the illuminations in the Champs Elysées presented a fairy like scene. Lights, festooned from tree to tree were hung from the Place de la Concorde all the way to the magnificent triumphal arch, and then the vista was terminated by a splendid display of various coloured lamps. The pale moon looked on from above in full sail, but her ineffectual fires were paled by the brilliant [illegible] Chamber of Deputies and the noble edifices on the Place [illegible] red with lights, and added to the effects of the scene. In the midst of all this, [illegible] of peaceful Republicans, male and female, sang the [illegible] that cannot be sung for which the Parisian stands unrivalled amongst the children of the capitals of Europe.

The following is a description of the new standard: The Landlubber's [illegible] by a [illegible] beam which is a medallion, on which is engraved, in relief, the Gallic cock, and under the medallion an oblong plate, with the letters "R. "Let your hearts be penetrated with the holy mantle of the Republic, henceforth to become [illegible] with the colours of the country.

"If that country should require your arms, let this standard serve as the guide to your courage.

"Let it be in peace the symbol of discipline and of order—a rallying point for the defence of those great principles which the Revolution has proclaimed, and which the Republic will verify.

"Citizen soldiers—soldiers, citizens, all children of the people, equally dear to them, carry with pride this emblem of the strength and of the grandeur of the armed people.

"It is for the Republic a pledge of union and power, for all free nations a guarantee of alliance and of friendship, for oppressed people a hope of enfranchisement.

"Colonels, in the name of the Republic, we take God and men to witness that you swear fidelity to this flag."

The soldiers of the regiments of the line that had entered Paris for the grand "Fraternité Fête" had been billeted on the inhabitants, most of whom had displayed eager hospitality on the occasion.

The first of these striking displays of Republican pageantry shows the vast body of troops on their march through the Champs Elysées—a brilliant assemblage of gleaming bayonets, crowned with bouquets of flowers—a strange juxta-position of the emblems of war and peace.

The second engraving shows the destiny of the troops before the Arc de l'Etoile, at night; the massive triangular structure blazing with illuminations, and a host of torches blazing around its base, and the whole scene bathed in a flood of festal light.

CHAPTER IV. COVENT GARDEN.

COVENT-GARDEN MARKET is the ever-open flower-show of London. Here, when "the wind and rain beat dark December," the costly chrysanthemum may be purchased, with which beauty decks her waving ringlets, as she shoots the arrows of love from her eyes, or and ess on whom they may alight. In spring, summer, autumn, or winter, the choicest treasures of the floral world are here collected: from the conservatory, and the humble cottage-garden, blossoms of all hues are gathered to grace the Covent-Garden colonnades. Few places surprise a stranger more than when he emerges suddenly from that great, crowded, and noisy thoroughfare, the Strand, and finds himself all at once in the little world of flowers. In this spot are to be found the first offerings of Spring; the snow-drop that comes "like an unbidden guest," violets and primroses which have been gathered in many a far-off dell and sunny dingle, come to tell us the progress that Nature is making in the green and out of-door world. Many a sad and many a pleasing thought must have been awakened in the bosoms of thousands who have long been in-dwellers in this mighty city, by walking through the ranks of flowers which are here placed. They must have recalled the image of some old home far away, and probably never again to be visited by them—the porch, over which the woodbine or jasmine trembled, and the garden-flowers, along which the clustering moss-roses hung. Many a flower is thus borne away and treasured for the old memories it awakens, for the tender recollections it recals—feelings to which the heart had long been a stranger. For Byron has shewn how small a key can touch in the human heart—how slight a chord may be struck, and some slumbering affection be in a moment aroused:—

It may but be a sound
A tone of music—summer's eve—or spring—
A flower—strains the electric chain.

Here are purchased the cut flowers that decorate the banquet and ball-rooms—the posy which the blushing bride bears with downcast look in her hand—the bouquet which is rained down at the feet of our favourite actresses; and here, also, affection comes for its last tribute to place beside the pale face of the loved dead, or plant around the grave in the cemetery. The house of mirth and the house of mourning are both supplied from the same common store. Pride, love, interest, fame, and [illegible] have [illegible] garland.

Here the young lover purchases for his fair one the blue forget-me-not; the graceful acacia, emblem of elegance; the myrtle, the old Grecian symbol of love; pansies—"that's for thoughts;" the red-streaked woodbine, which denotes devoted affection; the lily, that ancient representative of purity of heart; the rose, the queen of beauty, and for the richest of which five or six shillings is no unusual sum to pay; with every flower that makes up the great alphabet of love.

The epicure may here feast his eyes with delight; and, if he is wealthy enough, purchase the natural produce of April or May while the snows of February are whitening the ground: for so has science triumphed over nature, by the skilful treatment, that almost anything scarcely anything too difficult for our forcing-gardeners to accomplish. New potatoes, peas, and fruit of almost every description, are here to be found, fresh gathered, before spring has hung out a single leaf upon the oak. Green April is made to produce green gooseberries; and summer-fruits come in with the blossoms of May. Here conservatories are also formed over the colonnades; and the choicest and most delicate flowers that ever bloomed in kingly gardens, may be found as healthy and beautiful, amid London smoke, as if flourishing a hundred miles away in the country.

Those Itinerant dealers who make the streets of London r[illegible] with the pleasant [illegible]-cry of "All a-blowing, all a-growing" as they move along with barrow, basket, and cart, are generally supplied from this market; and few would credit the many hundreds of pounds expended in the metropolis for the purchase of flower-roots to be re-planted in the little back-yards called gardens, which are a peculiar feature in most of the London streets, beyond the city boundaries. Places which, to pass in front, a stranger would think no green thing had ever grown for years near such a neighbourhood; but in the rear they contain choice wallflowers, sweet-williams, carnations, Canterbury-bells, hollyhocks, sun-flowers, and fancy dahlias, which have been grown within a mile or so of the bridges, and have been set forth to "dispute the prize" at a flower-show. Many a poor man has often expended his shilling when he could ill spare it, to purchase a choice tulip or dahlia, which he treasured as the pride of his garden; and this is one amongst other pleasing sights to witness in this market. Those here finds enjoyment as well as the wealthy; [illegible]n or the aristocratic lady, who treads with "mincing gait" through the arcade, attended by John the page, and all his "eruption of buttons." Fine specimens of English beauty are often met with here—faces that look not unlike our own island roses; the fine blue-eyed Saxon cast of countenance, and the long fair hair, such as centuries ago drooped about the brow of Rowena, and were the cause of King Vortigern losing his kingdom and his life.

In contrast to these are our Covent-Garden portresses—sturdy daughters of Erin, clad in almost manly attire, and, with scarcely an exception, every soul a smoker and drinker of neat gin. Wonderful are the loads which these "juvenile antiques" carry; they would [illegible] the neck of a strong man, unused to bearing such burthens, ache [illegible], were he only to carry one a moderate distance. Their faithfulness and honesty are deserving of the highest praise: no matter how valuable the load may be that you purchase, or how great the distance it has to be borne into the [illegible]burbs, you have but to mix the trifle upon, furnish the right address, and when you return home, there you will find every bud and blossom uninjured, for Buddy may be trusted with untounted gold. They [illegible] caryatides, strong enough to support a temple, although such forms never mingled with the dreams of our ancient sculptors. Beside a good-natured, it requires a strong-armed man to help to replace the load upon their heads when they have rested; and few gentlemen, we [illegible] "Will your honour please to send a bit to the basket?"

At a very early hour in the morning, and while the rest of London—except [illegible]—seem wrapt in sleep, the whole of the street which open into Covent-Garden are thronged with vehicles, and buyers and sellers—for either the greengrocer or his man must be here early, if our dinner-table is to be supplied with first-rate vegetables; and from the most remote street of the suburbs the greengrocers are compelled to come out into the Borough, to Farmington, or Covent-Garden markets, for their stock—for these, with the exception of spot-fields, which is celebrated for potatoes, are the only garden markets. From one or other of these places have all those tempting shows of flowers, fruit, and vegetables, which give such a country-look to the greengrocers' shops, been brought at an early hour.

Here an imaginative lover of good living may feel [illegible] feast his eyes with the first rhubarb pie of the season—or pure up the roast shoulder of lamb that is to accompany the asparagus—catch the new potatoes with the brown veil called—see a couple of ducks lying prostrate beside a dish of green peas—and streaks of bacilful pass between the rich lines of raspberries—thrust bundles of sage and onions inside some stubble-fed goose, or call up the plump leg of mutton that is to be boiled along with those lily-white turnips; while cauliflowers, spinach, broccoli, and greens of every description may be found to match with the finest joints that either Leadenhall or Newgate markets can produce; for here they are to be seen "thick as leaves that strew the Vale of Vallambrosa."

The poet may also ramble here, and call up visions of the Garden of Eden, where our first mother stood "half-spied, so thick the blushing roses round about her blowed;" or the golden fields of Enna and Prosperine, and her nymphs; and the whole of that gloomy chaos, which ploughed up the waving flowers,—of Cupid and Psyche; and the beautiful vale of Arcady, and Venus mourning over her beloved Adonis, from whose blood there sprang a rich array of peerless blossoms.

But, independent of these associations, Covent-Garden has an interest of its own. Above six hundred years ago it bore the name of Convent Garden, and originally belonged to Westminster Abbey. A pleasant walk must it have been, a few centuries ago, from that grave and venerable pile, to the garden, before even the village of Charing existed, and when probably the whole line of road, from the Abbey, consisted of avenues of trees, and open fields, where the dasies blowed, and the skylark built and sang. We can picture those early fathers of the Church, with the rich missals in their hands, wiling away the hours in pleasant meditation, as they sauntered leisurely along between the Abbey and the Convent Garden, "in cope and stole arrayed." Within the last three hundred years it was walled round, and covered with trees, whose blossoms waved white and beautiful in the breezes of spring, and in summer displayed a rich array of trembling green; while half-a-dozen thatched cottages, and a convent, were the only habitations that then heaved up in this small neighbourhood. A few noblemen's mansions were all that at this time stood beside the river from Temple Bar to the Abbey; and these, with their beautiful gardens, sloped down by the edge of the water. Only a few years ago Covent-Garden consisted of a mass of unsightly wooden sheds and open standing-places, inferior to the market of many a common country town; and it was not until about 1828, that this mass of rubbish began to be swept away, and the present market to be built. The foundations of the old convent, from which, no doubt, this place takes its name, are not yet wholly swept away, a considerable portion being at present enclosed within the house occupied by Mr. Bohn, the bookseller, in York-street. Here two or three bulky piles of masonry, no doubt containing the remains of the early fathers, who wandered about this ancient neighbourhood, while, with the exception of the convent, it was all one garden-ground, may still be seen. This convent, if we remember rightly, has escaped the notice of several of the London historians, who, because it was built on land belonging to the Abbey, seem to have lost sight of it as a separate structure.

It was not until the time of Charles the First that any material improvement commenced in this neighbourhood. The name of Inigo Jones is connected with the first advances architecture made in this direction, through the agency of the fourth Earl of Bedford. A few of the princely mansions which rise up in the neighbourhood of Lincoln's-inn, are fine specimens of the buildings which were erected about this period.

What an uncomfortable place must the old City have been, with its little poking market in Honey-lane, now covered by the City of London School, and the Stocks Market, long since removed, and with only one bridge leading into this large London, which was then rapidly bursting its ancient barriers and shooting out far beyond its weather-beaten walls, while all propositions for improvement were considered as death-blows aimed at its old and barbarous privileges. Our forefathers never knew, nor needed, such places as the present Covent-Garden Market.

We read, in old plays, of the apple-woman at the corner of the street, and the vender of herbs who passed through those ancient thoroughfares: but of the greengrocers, like those of our own days, we find no mention, for they had no predecessors; and excepting the onions and the parsnips, peas and beans, and the radish mentioned by Izaak Walton, there seems but to have been a scanty supply of vegetables. The potato is of comparatively modern introduction, while fruit-trees appear to have been grown in England from time immemorial; even as far back as the days of the Saxons, we find the vine cultivated in the gardens of the monasteries, and that the monks made their own wine. Their vegetable diet was simple indeed, and we need no further proof than the quantity of cattle slaughtered for the winter consumption, and salted for the sole purpose of saving the food they would require. Indeed, with the exception of beans, peas, wheat, barley, and a kind of cabbage called kale, we scarcely find any other mention of the vegetables used by our Saxon ancestors in the days of good King Alfred, according to old Tassor, a supper of bacon broth was not to be despised, and a breakfast off the same substance cold, with the addition of a piece of [illegible] bacon in the cold stand, and a lump of barley bread, formed the chief diet of the English in the days of Edward the Confessor, by a draught of beer.

Still the Londoners seem always to have been a flower-loving people, [illegible] Britons banished their may-poles and Whitsun[illegible] games, they revived again at the Restoration, and continued [illegible] at little alteration until the middle of the last century. Even the old Pepys allowed his wife to go down into the Woodyard under Greenwich, so that she might rise early and [illegible] on May-day; and Bluff Hal, attended by his Queen and nobles, went out to "do observance to the May" at Shooters-hill. We cannot help marvelling, while such a love for the flowers of nature prevailed, that no such thing as a regular flower market should exist. It is true the dramatists and poets of the smell that pervaded Ruckersbury: and no doubt a few centuries back this was the chief spot where the country-people assembled and sold the flowers and herbs they brought from the country. That thoroughfare came, eventually, to be called Hungerford, Hampstead and Highgate, or from the wilder wastes on which Norwood now stands, each bearing their burthen into Ruckersbury at simple-time," when only one bridge [illegible] led across the [illegible].

Yet it must have been a merry London, when, to quote the words of an old chronicler, "[illegible] hums [illegible] in the morning to fetch may or green boughs—himself fresh and ruddy apparelled; all his knights, squires, and gentlemen clothed in white satin; and all his guards and yeomen of the crown in white sarsenet. And so went every man with his fair and green arbours, hasting to the wood; and so repaired again to the court, every man with a green bough in his cap." This was the time when, although London was without its Covent-Garden Market, in May, according to Herrick's description—

Each field became a street—each street a park,
Made green, and trimmed with trees.
Devotion gave each house a bough, a branch;
Each porch and door
With whitethorn neatly was inwove,
As if they were the cooler shades of love.

THE THEATRES

HER MAJESTY'S.

[illegible] proceeded on Tuesday [illegible] is announced, for the [illegible] consent of Parliament, who was to have filled the Giovanni, [illegible] situated, and was followed by a scene from "[illegible]," in which Celletti personated the Page with [illegible] dress, the closing scene being [illegible] as usual, a rare combination of vocal and dramatic power. Madame Grevelli also sang with great spirit and taste in the "Matrimonio," Lablache was irresistibly humorous in the popular ballet of "La Tarida" concluded the performances.

Thursday night was signalised by the re-appearance of Mademoiselle Cerito and M. St. Leon in the divertissement of "La Vivandière," which almost on its [illegible] introduction at the [illegible] as Ondine," from the "Lac des Fées," as the Polka" were the favourite gems on Thursday. Lablache [illegible] than sustained his [illegible] character.

The advance in the [illegible] encored, and Cerito was [illegible] for at the close of the divertissement.

[illegible] night next, (a subscription night,) Mlle. Jenny Lind is announced to make her first appearance [illegible] the season, as Amina, in "La Sonnambula."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Tuesday, "La Donna del Lago" was performed at this theatre, with unprecedented success, both as regards individual and entire effect. The cast was greatly strengthened by Tamburini's Rodrigo Dhu, which was almost faultless in dramatic effect. It was complete. [illegible] as Elen, and Mario as Kenn James sang with even more than their wonted vigour; and Alboni as Malcolm won with the brilliancy of last season. The ensemble [illegible] and concerted music of the opera was given with wonderful precision [illegible] excellence of the orchestra contributed to render this the most effective performance of the season. The house was crowded; and in one of the boxes might be observed Mrs. Jenny Lind, who was by no means [illegible] in her applause.

On Thursday, "Il Don Giovanni" was repeated.

ST. JAMES'S.

An amateur performance, under the immediate patronage of the Queen and Prince Albert, took place on Tuesday evening last, at the above theatre, "in aid of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution;" and we were pleased to see the house well filled. The play was George Colman's amusing comedy of "The Heir at Law," in which Lord Duberly, by Mr. J. Wilson, jun., was very creditably played. Mr. R. J. Hamerton, as Dick Dowlas, was well up in the part, but wanted the buoyancy of the Dick we have seen in bygone days. Mr. S. Holl's Dr. Pangloss was excellent. Mr. Poole's Zekiel Homespun was a good sketch of the gentleman, the best played part in the piece. The Henry Moreland of Mr. J. Tennier, the Steadfast of Mr. W. Angell (aspita), and the rest of the amateurs who filled the [illegible] and Miss Cooper's Cicely Homespun [illegible] to be considered [illegible] performance. After the epilogue by the characters, as [illegible] and admirably given by the actors and the ladies, a burst of applause and a call for [illegible] followed, and was played with a fair portion of [illegible] on next week's Monday [illegible] on of the play. The [illegible] [illegible]ion to [illegible] length the performance took place cannot be too extensively made known, or too extensively patronised.

PRINCESS'.

Lebrun is a name of note in musical history. There was Louis Auguste Lebrun, the famous oboe-player, who was the husband of the celebrated Madame Lebrun, the German prima donna; there was Jean Lebrun, the horn player, [illegible] Sebastien Lebrun, the French composer, born in Paris, 1764, who [illegible] one-act opera, called "The Nightingale," at the Princess', on [illegible] produced at the Théâtre Feydeau, in 1816, under the title of [illegible] and has since been a popular production, being generally [illegible] grand duncan, who has extraordinary agility of voice, to show off her skill in roulades. Madame Albert Hymn was the original representative, and on the renewal of the performances [illegible] The Brussels Company, when at Drury Lane Theatre, performed this operetta for Madame Lalande. Vocal mechanism is second only to Madame Persiani. It was the revival, with Madame Laura Addison as Phillis, Mr. Barker as Lubin, Weiss as the Bailiff, and Bodart as Mathurin, Phillis's father, is likely to please the public. The plot is simple, merely having reference to the mystification of an old stupid Bailiff, who aspires to the hand of Phillis, and whose lover, Lubin, by playing a flute, is passed off as a nightingale. The lovers, of course, succeed in their contrivance, and are eventually united. Lebrun's music is melodious and simple; the instrumentation being somewhat dry and old-fashioned, but free, at all events, from the modern system of overloading the score with brass. Madame Thillon sings and acts charmingly, especially in the piccolo song. Mr. Leder conducted the band with tact.

[illegible] Monday brought with it its customary novelties at the different [illegible] and we are happy to add, that all of them were more or less successful. The number of houses open on the evening compels us to be more brief than usual in our notices; but the following will be found a careful report of their various claims to patronage from our play going readers.

Miss Lane was put forward at its first—human—appearance—in a variety of novel scenes in the circus, any one of which would have made an amphitheatre populer some little time back. "The Festival of Flowers" was a very pretty piece, performed by eight ladies and eight gentlemen besides Lane and Messrs. Henri and Leroy, lying on their backs, on a series of table-cloth, danced four [illegible] on their feet, in an extraordinary manner, spinning and twirling and tossing from one to the other about. Mr. Lane stood on the top of a ladder, surrounded by fireworks. The Siegrists, Newsome, Bassin, and Herrman, performed some wonderful feats on "rapid courses;" and all the pretty ensembles appeared in their most effective garb, while the dresses of Mr. Leclar kept the house in a roar of laughter. "God save the Queen" was lustily called for, and as [illegible] raised, and one hapless discontented foreigner, who tried to get up a little agitation for the "Marseillaise," was treated in a manner that must have given him a most decisive opinion respecting the unshaken loyalty of England. The entire entertainments gave such general satisfaction, that those who thought of introducing in the conventional strain of regret that "Old Drury" should be turned into a circus, &c., ended by confessing what a capital evening's amusement they had found there.

Fires and fetes—and fur beyond all the others, the LYCEUM piece again promises to run all its competitors off their boards. The new burlesque, "Theseus and Ariadne," is by Mr. Planché, to whom the daily papers have been so lavish of compliments, that we have none left to pay him, albeit we much wish to do so. It is true that in his present extravaganza we miss the continuous [illegible] of the author of "The Golden Branch," and the [illegible] perfect ensemble of the performance, the exquisite taste displayed in every department concerned in its production, the choice selection of music, the inimitable smoothness of the writing, and first-rate style in which the pointed lines are delivered, [illegible] more than compensate for the absence of very broad fun. Mr. C. Mathews and Miss Marshall, Madame Vestris, Miss Fitzwilliam, Mr. Hall, and the Gilberts, a beautiful group of caryatides, and a clever chorus, with an admirable mechanical effects, all combine to make this piece even more perfect, than "The Golden Branch;" and when we first saw that extravaganza we thought that it was impossible for any [illegible] to surpass it. [illegible] Mr. Planché, the brothers Cormon, and [illegible] managers—to one [illegible] combinations they never can [illegible] the times of the [illegible] Bacchus [illegible] Chevreul d'Or." The [illegible] revelry, deserves especial notice. Nothing has been done [illegible] indeed, the scenery of "The Vines," with its open trellis [illegible] arbours, speaking vistas, and sunny back landscape, has only been surpassed in "Acis and Galatea." Thanks to him for the high gratification he has afforded us; thanks to Mr. Planché for his elegant extravaganza; and, above all, thanks to the [illegible] for the LYCEUM for the exquisite taste and unbounded liberality so palpably evident in every part of the [illegible] night into use in "Theseus and Ariadne."

[illegible] as of the best kind, with others equally amusing from the [illegible] badness," and an unceasing fire of allusions to everything that has happened of late, at a period so rife with events for burlesque-writers to seize upon at once, [illegible] the chief characteristics of "The Castle of Otranto," the leader piece written by Mr. Gilbert à Beckett for the HAYMARKET. Indeed, [illegible] the first one has scarcy time to collect them, even if he is [illegible] to do so, for the [illegible] of the scenes and of the slow of compensation, we may [illegible] pity the hopeless confusion into which his ideas must be thrown. We never could exactly make out what "The Castle of Otranto" was about, and the burlesque does not much assist us here. Mr. Beckett has contrived to make us laugh, so that we do not care to pause for an enquiry. Mr. Keeley and Miss Reynolds, Mr. J. Bland and Mrs. W. Clifford, and Miss P. Horn, support the chief characters, and some very [illegible] are sufficient to prove the care with which the [illegible] are delivered. The gem of the piece is a parody on the "Swiss Boy," so deliciously sung by Miss P. Horn that it merely escaped [illegible] double encore. It is also worth a hearer, Keeley's address to the "spectators" to the air of "Sweet while Anne, also loudly [illegible]nded. Mr. Bland [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Phillips confri[illegible] scene [illegible] writer; and Mr. Gem an Reed [illegible] as arranged some catching music [illegible]. It was a dangerous [illegible] to [illegible] as were the two Misses [illegible] Carlotta's acute interpretation of the part in the minds of many of the audiences; but the debutante acquitted herself remarkably well. Her dancing was easy and [illegible] and her pantomime [illegible] above the average. Mr. Flanders was very quaint and droll in Perrot's part of Pierre Grugnyre, and in the renowned "Tyrolienne" with Mdlle. Auriol was loudly applauded. M. Le Clerc threw a great deal of dramatic force into Quasimodo, and he was well accompanied by M. Deulin's Claude Frollo. M. Zavyatowski, who was at Drury-Lane with Mr. Bunn, and subsequently at the Surrey, played Pandaz. The ballet has been well mounted. The costumes are good, and the tableaux effectively arranged; whilst some excellent scenery, portraying old Paris, has been painted by Mr. Bruning, assisted by Mr Grey. The new scenario was called before the curtain at the conclusion to receive the usual honours; and the ballet altogether ...

Mr Wyndham and Miss Woolgar are, according to established rule, the chief attractions in the Easter piece at the ADELPHI, which is written by the prolific Mr. Starling Coyne, and called "The Fountain of Zea, or the Child of Art." The ball informs us that in the island of Zea there is a fountain; and that whatever good spirit touches its waters once becomes subservient to the will of the drinker for evil; but that, should the waters touch the good spirit a second time, the evil one loses its power, and in his turn becomes the servant of the benefit he sought to subdue. Upon this legend the story of the piece is founded, and the adventures of the child of art, Aglea (Madame Celeste), furnish the action. She becomes the slave to the Genius King (Mr. O. Smith), who imprisons her in a box and throws her into the sea, as the gem is created in the Arabian Nights—whence she is picked up by Pietro Flammoso (Mr. Wright). She next, according to the prop ... of ... of this description, falls in love with a mortal, and is persecuted by the Genius King, until, being once more sprinkled with water from the fountain, she ... of her own. The spectacle is very well got up, and the ballet is ... Mr. Wright is, as usual, enormously droll, and Miss Woolgar, as his sweetheart, the essence of liveliness and coquetry. Madame Celeste's pantomime is very expressive ... and the result of all is ... that the certain fulls to it in due season.

The SURREY opened last ... manager, that of Mr Kershaw, who has contrived to bring together many of the old favourites attached to the property ... summer, whom are Mr and Mrs. Honner, Mr. N. T. Hicks, Miss Terrey, and Mr. E. F. Saville. The first piece was "The Bohemians," a translation of a Boulevard drama, "Les Bohémiens de Paris," and one that has been long before popular drama, "Les Bohémiens de Paris," and one that has been long before popular favour in the theatres, as well as at the Adelphi, Lyceum, &c. We noticed it at length when it was first produced. The interlude of "Ladies Beware" was played almost in dumb show, Mr. Honner and Miss Terrey being the only pantomime of "Cinderella," which concluded the entertainments. Mr H. Berry, from Astley's, was the Clown, and a very capital one he made. The old ... were closely followed in the opening, and the burlesquade at the ... events were unsparingly ridiculed. One of them—the Chartist petition demonstration—created some difference of opinion in the gallery; but, upon the whole, the pantomime went famously, and promises to repay the out-lay of the theatre of producing one at Easter.

The OLYMPIC put forth Howard Payne's tragedy of "Brutus," in which Mr. Brooke sustained the principal character, and followed afterwards a new extravaganza, called "A Mission to Borneo, or the Second Voyage of Sindbad the Sailor," written with a fair degree of smartness, but too long and unmeaning, as the audience seemed to think. It wants considerable pruning at this moment, if, it will, without doubt, serve its purpose.

The little theatre in the Strand was not behind-hand in the production of novelty, and, under the new management of Mr Oxberry, a neat burlesque, entitled "Sir Rupert the Fearless, a Legend of the Rhine," was brought out in a most creditable manner. It is very well written, with plenty of allusion and hits at passing events, and a fair sprinkling of puns; and some very excellent dancing was introduced all of which appeared to afford the highest gratification to the visitors

Mrs. Warner did not put forth any novelty at the MARYLEBONE, and we think she acted wisely. The company is of holiday entertainment that she could have availed herself of was burlesque; and burlesque, to do anything, requires a very peculiar style of acting, an experience sans en sous, and not very common vein of authorship. But she carried out the praiseworthy mission of her theatre by engaging Mr. Macready, who appeared as Hamlet. The performances to see by engaging Mr. Macready, who appeared as Hamlet. The performances to see will known to call for a criticism. The house was very full; and the admirable manner in which the tragedy, generally, was performed elicited the heartiest and most judicious applause

Mr. Love appeared at SADLER'S WELLS, and marvellously delighted his patrons. His changes of face and costume were extraordinary; and the manner in which he surrounds himself by a most powerful company of celebrated nightingales is worthy of his reputation. He stands alone in his line; and his excellent performance will repay the journey even to Sadler's Wells

On Wednesday evening, at the HAYMARKET Theatre, a smart a propos sketch, called "Lola Montez," from the exhaustless pen of Mr. Coyne, gave Mrs. Keeley an opportunity of appearing in one of those inimitable bits of character which she has only found so few opportunities of favouring us with. The piece is of the same style as Mr. Reach's "Jenny Lind" which some of our readers may remember at the Lyceum, and the fun turns entirely upon the assumption of the character of the celebrated danseuse by an ambitious little German laundress, who allows herself to be arrested by mistake. Mrs. Keeley is, of course, the heroine; Mr. Tilbury is an odd noble whom she captivates; and Mr. Keeley is the lady's real sweetheart. The various dilemmas and comic adventures of these parties keep the audience in a roar of laughter, from the beginning of the piece to its end; and the curtain descends amidst very hearty and general demonstrations of approval. "Lola Montez" will prove as attractive to the London public as she was to the Bavarian Monarch

MUSIC.

LONDON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

The new society formed by Mr. Surman, the late conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society, met at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday night, to give a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabeus," in aid of the funds for the relief of English operatives driven out of France. Mr. H. Blagrove was the leader of the band, and Mr Surman wielded the bâton. The solos were sung by the Misses Williams, Miss Birch, Miss Byers, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr Machin. In the execution of the oratorio there was the same amount of uncertainty which characterised the old society. A new national hymn, by Vincent Wallace, the words by Mr. George Linley, entitled "Queen Victoria God protect," was received with the greatest enthusiasm. It is arranged for chorus, and soprano, and tenor solos, sung by Miss Birch, and Mr Reeves, and is in C major. It is simple in the construction, finely harmonised, and the effect of the whole clear and musician-like.

WHITTINGTON CLUB CONCERTS. The first concert given by the members at their Club House (the late Crown and Anchor Tavern) was very gratifying. Miss Miran, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Bodda were the vocalists. Beethoven's beautiful melody of "Adelaida" was given with impassioned feeling by Mr. Reeves, and demanded a second time. Miss Miran sang the romantic cavatina from "La Donna del Lago," "Elena," and was encored in the second movement. Wallace's popular trio from "Maritana," "Turn on, old Time," sung by Miss Miran, Mr. Reeves, and Mr. Bodda, was one of the most attractive items in the scheme, in which three madrigals, by Festa, Dinland, and J. Benet, were judiciously introduced. Mr. Lazarus played a cadenza fantasia; and a Mozartian trio was performed by Mr. T. H. Severn (piano), Westlake (cello), and Mr. Lazarus (clarionet). Mr. Carte was the director of this agreeable entertainment.

MR. FRASER'S ILLUSTRATIONS OF ENGLISH MINSTRELSY AND SONG.—Every singer who visits the United States thinks that he is qualified, on his return, to give a musical entertainment, at which he is to be the only source of attraction. This practice has become a nuisance, and it is no wonder that there have been so many failures. Mr. Fraser is an effective tenor singer on a small scale; and in a concert-room, with other artists, would take his proper position; but there is nothing either in his dramatic or musical qualifications to authorise him to attempt to bear the entire responsibility of an evening's amusement.

SUSSEX HALL.—The Committee of the Jews' and General Literary and Scientific Institution gave a Concert on Monday night, at their room in Leadenhall-street, Miss Lanne F. Lablache, Mrs. J. Lea (late Miss Sara Hobbs), Misses Messent, Holmes, and Solomon; Messrs. Harrison, Farquharson Smith, and J. Lea, were the vocalists. The National Anthem was sung at the conclusion, amidst general plaudits.

MUSICAL DOINGS.—Mr. Dando's sixth and last Quartet Meeting took place on Monday, at Crosby Hall. Mr. Gerhard Taylor had a Harp Recital at the Hanover-square Rooms, and Miss A. Purcell a Concert at the Princess', on Wednesday; at the meeting of the Melodists, the same evening, Mesdames the violinist, Richardson the flautist, and Sims Reeves, and Signor Marras were the artists invited by the Club. The Amateur Musical Society gave their Concert on Friday night. The Catch Club will meet this evening. This morning will be the rehearsal of the fourth Philharmonic Concert, to be given on Monday. On Tuesday, the third meeting of the Musical Union; and on Wednesday, the third Ancient Concert, and Mr. G. Case's concerting soiree. The Italian Opera at her Majesty's and the Royal Italian Theatres, on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday; and the English Opera every evening at the Princess'.

ARRIVAL OF MDLLE LIND.—Mdlle Lind arrived at Blackwall on Monday, at four A.M., by the Countess of L ... steamer, from Hamburg. She appeared in excellent health and spirits. Her departure from Stockholm was attended by the most extraordinary demonstration. It was on the 16th of March; the weather was beautiful, from 15,000 to 20,000 people lined the quays, military bands were placed at intervals, and she embarked amidst cheers and music. The regulars of the vessels in the harbour were manned, the "Hurrahs" and the waving of hats and handkerchiefs continued as long as the vessel which bore her remained in sight. Her last performance in Stockholm was for the benefit of a charitable institution she has established. The tickets of admission on this occasion were put up to auction, and fetched immense prices.

MDLLE LIND AND THE QUEEN'S HOUNDS.—Notwithstanding the extremely unfavourable state of the weather, with a cold north-east wind and a drizzling rain, an immense number of persons were present on Stoke Common on Monday morning; some merely to witness the uncarting of the stag, and others (including several officers of the two regiments in garrison at Windsor, and many from Hounslow and the metropolis) to join in the chase. The field of well-mounted horsemen numbered not less than between three and four hundred. The families of all the principal residents for miles around Stoke were present in carriages, which extended in all directions in the vicinity of the heath. The celebrated stag Rory O'More, which has afforded such excellent sport during the past three seasons, was selected for the Easter hunt. Rory, upon being uncarted, took away in beautiful style to the soft, down to Fulmer Bottom. He then went right ahead for Kiddington's Park, on to the village of Longford, where he was taken and safely housed, after a slow run throughout of about two hours

ST. MARYLEBONE VISITING SOCIETIES.—At a meeting of the five District Societies of St. Marylebone, it was found, during the past year, 3884 persons had been relieved by their visitation, and that the sums distributed amounted to £.765 15s. 9d.

THE LATE JOHN JACOB ASTOR.—Before the removal of the body of the deceased from the house of his son, in Lafayette-place, New York, the coffin was placed in the hall, and the doors thrown open; when thousands rushed in, until the place was crowded almost to suffocation. The coffin was covered with rich black velvet, and bound with bullion fringe, over which was a velvet pall of beautiful workmanship; over the face a glass had been set in, that all might have a look upon the face of the richest man in the country. Mr. Astor has bequeathed by will 400,000 dollars for erecting suitable buildings, and establishing a library in New York, for free general use. To this portion of his bequest he has manifested the deepest and undivided, or for the improvement of the young, 50,000 dollars. The German Society, 20,000 dollars; Institution for the Blind, 5000 dollars. Half ... phan Asylum, 10 00 dollars; Juvenile Asylum, 2000 dollars. The personal estate of Mr. Astor is worth from seven to nine millions of dollars, and his real estate perhaps as much more; so that the aggregate is less than twenty millions, or half the sum which is the income of his wife alone.

POST-OFFICE.—According to a recent order of the Postmaster-General, on any case where the party in whose favour a money order is granted is unable to write his or her name, it must be witnessed in writing. "The witness must own a name, with his address, in the presence of the paying officer, who must then certify the payment by adding his initials. The witness must be known to the paying officer; but it is desirable that he be not connected with the Post Office. In no case must the paying officer act as witness. No paid order requiring such attestation will be passed to the credit of any postmaster, by the Money Order Department, unless this regulation shall have been strictly complied with." This will be a serious check to the usefulness of the money order system, for it has happened that the person in whose favour the order is granted may be at a distance, utterly unknown to any of the inhabitants of the place at which it is payable, while, even if they can obtain a witness, that witness may be unknown to the paying officer. The regulation is absurd on the face of it; for it assumes that persons have friends in every place they visit, and that the Post-Office clerks know every person in the places at which they are stationed

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

RETURNING FROM THE BEACH.—PAINTED BY J. H. MOLE.

We resume, from page 263, our notice of this Exhibition with two pictures of high merit:—

194. "Returning from the Beach," J. H. Mole. A charming sunset picture. The bright light falling upon the faces of the three figures, and especially upon the chubby child, is very effectively managed; and the little incident of the dog, who has found a crab upon the sand, is good. Altogether, this is a very pleasing work. It is the largest size of the artist's contributions: most of his smaller pictures have been disposed of.

127. "Sebastian Gomez, commonly called 'El Mulato de Murillo,' discovered by his Master at Work," E. H. Wehnert. Gomez, who slept in the studio of Murillo, used to practise painting, unknown to his master. On one occasion, whilst painting a picture of the Virgin, he was [illegible] that he neither noticed the approach of daylight [illegible] with some of his pupils into the studio. Murillo was so struck, [illegible] admiration of the genius evinced by the boy, that he not only at once gave him his freedom, but also took him as a pupil, and Gomez subsequently became one of the most eminent painters in Spain. Such is the incident chosen by Mr. Wehnert for his great picture of the present year. The slave is intently at work, touching in the ear of the Child by the side of the Virgin. Murillo is looking on, with a surprise of great delight, while he waves his hand behind him, to keep his pupils back. The grouping is good; the story well told; and the furniture and odds and ends of a painter's studio correctly and carefully introduced. [illegible] Mr. Wehnert has as yet produced, and his friends may still confidently look for his making before very long a further advance in the art he loves.

Next week we shall conclude our notice of the Collection.

[illegible] MURILLO.—PAINTED BY E. H. WEHNERT.

GYMNASIUM, PRIMROSE-HILL.

GOVERNMENT GYMNASIUM.

By desire of Viscount Morpeth, the Chief Commissioner of her Majesty's Woods and Forests, a Gymnasium has just been erected for the use of the the public, near the foot of Primrose-hill, and was opened on Good Friday. The attendance was then but trifling, owing to the unfavourable weather; but on Easter Monday and Tuesday the spot was visited by many persons. The apparatus is inclosed, and a keeper is in attendance to preserve order.

The regulations to be observed by the public are inscribed upon a large board within the ground. Among these, no person is allowed to occupy any one part of the apparatus exclusively longer than fifteen minutes; any person wilfully damaging the apparatus will be prosecuted; use of gross or abusive language is to be punished by exclusion from the Gymnasium during that day; and the public are requested, by another regulation, to assist the keeper, if required, in maintaining order.

ASTLEY'S.

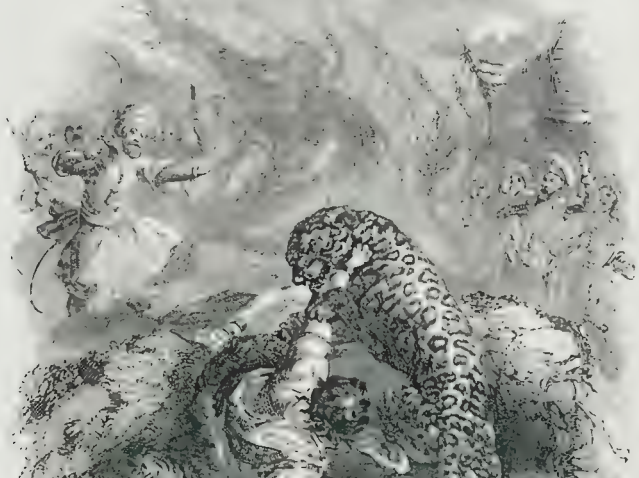
Astley's comes out, this Easter, very strong indeed, with a capital zoological spectacle called "Morok, the Beast Tamer," written by Mr. Bayle Bernard, for the purpose of introducing Mr. Van Amburgh and his trained animals; and founded, as may be supposed, on incidents taken from Eugene Sue's mysterious romance of "Le Juif Errant." A drama of this description does not come within the rules of criticism. The author is trammelled with certain situations and effects that must be introduced; and in writing up to these he is compelled to make everything give place to them. Mr. Bernard, however, is a skilful dramatist, and he has managed his plot remarkably well; the peculiar performances of Mr. Van Amburgh falling appropriately into the course of the story—no less as regards his combat with "the panther of the jungle," than his final well-known exhibition in the cage, with his entire menagerie, as a prisoner who has been offered the alternative of embracing an infidel faith or being thrown into a den of wild beasts.

A true holiday audience were, on Monday, uproarious in their demonstrations of delight, and very heartily, applauded the spectacle, which will prove a good card for the management; as well as the equestrian performances which followed.

We have engraved one of the most exciting scenes of the spectacle—that in which Morok (Van Amburgh) is attacked by "the panther of the jungle," whilst seeking refuge in a cavern from the pursuit of the Arab's troops, who, coming suddenly on their fugitive in this situation, start back alarmed, and form with their torches and arms an effective background to the fearful struggle.

The Late Lord Cowley, G.C.B., P.C.—Probate of the will of the Right Honourable Henry (Wellesley) Baron Cowley, who died at Paris on the 27th of April, last year, leaving personal property in this country which has been estimated for duty at £50,000, was granted on the 18th instant, by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, to his son, the Right Honourable Henry Richard Charles (Wellesley) Lord Cowley, the executor appointed in the will, together with the Right Honourable Georgiana Charlotte Augusta Dowager Baroness Cowley, the relict, the executrix also appointed therein, to whom a power was reserved to prove the will hereafter, whenever her Ladyship might apply for the same. The will was executed by his Lordship on the 20th of February, 1841, by which he leaves to his son, the Baron, his freehold estate at Calcutta, also the sum of £6000 Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock, in addition to £10,000 like stock settled upon him on his marriage with the Hon. Olivia Cecilia Fitzgerald de Ros; bequeaths to his lady, the Dowager Baroness, the use and enjoyment of the estate at Twickenham (called Riverdale), together with the furniture and wine, as well as such furniture, plate, books, and pictures at his residence in London, as she might require, besides that which was her own; and upon her demise leaves the same to his son, Lord Cowley, whom he has appointed residuary legatee of his property, both real and personal. His Lordship was in his seventy-fifth year, and the younger brother of his Grace the Duke of Wellington.

The Chartist Convict Williams.—The Launceston papers received by the late Sydney mail, dated the 18th of December, state that Zephaniah Williams, who was transported for life with Frost and Jones, for participating in the Chartist riots at Newport a few years since, has been sentenced to one year's hard labour in chains at the settlement at Port Arthur, for attempting to escape with another convict from the colony. At the period of the alleged offence he was employed at a tavern in Van Diemen's Land on ticket leave. The sinking of a vessel in which they endeavoured to escape to New Zealand led to his detection.



SCENE FROM THE NEW SPECTACLE AT ASTLEY'S.—MOROK (VAN AMBURGH) ATTACKED BY A PANTHER

THE LATE JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

"Another, and almost the only, link which binds the political history of our country's present to the past era of her first existence as a nation," says a New York Journal, "has been broken by the death of this venerable statesman. It is the fate of no common life to contain within the span of its earthly rising and setting such experience as his embraced; the growth of a feeble colony into one of the mightiest empires of all time—the spectacle of a total revolution in the world's politics, science, and philosophy—the birth and developement of wonderful age. Yet such a life was his, whose loss we deplore."

John Quincy Adams

John Quincy Adams was born at Braintree (afterwards Quincy) Mass on the 11th of July, 1767. He received his name from his great-grandfather, John Quincy, who, in the early part of the century, was honoured with many civil distinctions from the Governor of the Province, and who died a few hours after the birth of the boy who took his name. His childhood was passed during the stormy times of the Revolution, and even as a child he participated in some of its most memorable occurrences. When John Adams was appointed Joint Commissioner to France in 1777, with Franklin and Lee, John Quincy accompanied him, though at this time but 11 years of age. He spent 18 months in Paris at school, and returned to America with his father in 1779. During this visit he enjoyed the instructions of Franklin, who conceived a strong attachment for his young countryman. In three months after their arrival, John Adams was again dispatched by Congress to Europe, and set sail, with his son, in a French frigate for Brest. They had a perilous passage, for the ocean was at that time thronged with British fleets, and their capture was only avoided by the daring and courage of the commander. The frigate was driven by violent storms into the port of Ferrol, in Spain, whence they travelled by land to Paris. They went soon after to Holland, where he studied for some time at Amsterdam and in the celebrated University of Leyden.

In July, 1781, Francis Dana, (father of Richard H. Dana, the poet,) who had accompanied John Adams as Secretary of Legation, was appointed Minister to Russia, and took with him young John Quincy, then but fourteen years of age, as his Private Secretary. After a year's residence in St. Petersburgh, he left Mr. Dana, and in the fall of 1782 and the following winter travelled alone through Sweden, Denmark, and Hamburgh to Holland, where he arrived in April. His father was then in Paris, but visiting the Hague in July, he took his son with him on his return. The treaty of peace was signed in September, and from that time till May, 1785, he resided with his father in England and France, having intercourse with the most distinguished society of those countries. In London he was introduced upon the floor of Parliament, and heard some of the finest efforts of Pitt, Burke, Fox, and Sheridan. His acquaintance with Jefferson, who was then Minister to France, dates from this period, and he was afterwards strongly recommended to the notice of Washington by that great statesman.

When his father was appointed Minister to the Court of St. James', in 1785, he obtained permission to return. He then entered an advanced class in Harvard University, and graduated at the end of two years. Making choice of the law for his profession, he studied in the office of the celebrated Theophilus Parsons, at Newburyport, and afterwards established himself in Boston where he remained four years, satisfying himself with extending his knowledge of the principles of [illegible], and writing occasional political essays. But when, in 1794, the [illegible] aroused and excited by the appeals of the French Minister, Genet, [illegible] ams entered the field as a political writer, urging the obligation of neutrality concerning the policy or conflicts of other nations; and his political foresight, thus honourably established, introduced him to the notice of Washington, to whose esteem and confidence he was at once admitted.

At the recommendation of Jefferson, he was appointed Minister to Holland in Mar., 1794, and from that time until 1801 he remained abroad, serving the country in various diplomatic capacities. Immediately before the expiration of Washington's term he received the appointment of Minister to Portugal, but, while on his way to Lisbon, his destination was changed by President Adams to Berlin, where he resided four years. During this period he visited the Reisengebirge, the wild mountain district of Silesia, the haunt of German fairy tradition, which at that time was hardly known to tourists. He was the first American who ascended the Schneekoppe, which is considered the highest mountain in Central Europe, north of the Danube.

In 1802 Adams was elected to the Massachusetts Senate, and in the same year to the service of the United States. In all these he had high distinction, he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Harvard University, and, during the recess of [illegible] a series of lectures, which were attended by crowded audiences, and afterwards published in two octavo volumes.

In the Senate, he was considered a moderate Federalist: he was, however, above the dictation of party, and for this independence, in relation to the Embargo, he received the censure of the Massachusetts Legislature, and on this account resigned his seat in 1808. Immediately after Madison's accession to the Presidency in 1809, he received the appointment of Minister to Russia, and during his residence of five years in St. Petersburgh he enjoyed the respect and confidence of the Emperor Alexander to a degree seldom bestowed upon the representatives of other nations. It was this esteem which induced the Emperor, after the Peace of 1815, to offer his mediation in the then existing war between the United States and England. Though this was declined by England, it produced an effect on her part of direct negotiation, and John Quincy Adams was placed at the head of the Commissioners, who met at Ghent.

In February, 1815, he was appointed Minister to Great Britain, and continued to act in that capacity until Monroe's accession, in 1817, when he was recalled, and appointed Secretary of State, a station only second in responsibility to the Executive office itself. During his eight years' secretaryship, he retained the full confidence of Mr. Monroe; and among his official labours may be mentioned the recognition of the independence of the South American Republics, first advocated by Henry Clay, in the House of Representatives, and the successful acquisition of Florida, and adjustment of the Spanish claims.

After Monroe's retirement, the claims of Mr. Adams to the Presidentship were not overlooked; at the first ballot he received the votes of thirteen states, which constituted a majority, and he at once accepted the office.

During the four years of his administration, large sums were expended upon internal improvements—more, indeed, was effected in the permanent improvement of the country than during all the administrations of his predecessors; upward of five millions of dollars were appropriated to pensions and private bounties, and yet three millions of the national debt had been paid off at the end of his term.

Notwithstanding these servi[illegible], he met with virulent and bitter opposition. The friends of Jackson and [illegible]ward combined in a hostility to the measures of his administration, which rested not until it had procured his defeat at the Presidential election in 1828.

After Jackson's inauguration he retired to the old homestead at Quincy, where he passed a year or two in the enjoyment of tranquil domestic life, and surrounded with the happiest social relations. But such a man as he could not long be spared long from the councils of the nation. In 1830 he was elected to represent the Congressional district in which he resided, and in the following year took his seat in the House of Representatives. He was subsequently elected to nine successive Congressional terms, the duties of which he faithfully performed, till, after sixty-seven years spent in the service of his country, he laid down with his hand to the last labours of his last words uttered in her Hall of Council.

His youth, almost his childhood, was consecrated to his country's service: his long life and wonderful energies were consumed in rearing the fabric of her greatness; and he drew his last breath under the shelter of her legislative dome. His nearer relatives will lament his departure, but they will be left most vacant at his loss—who will be chief mourner[illegible]as he grave.

THE MONTAGNARDS

For some weeks past a small body of desperate men in Paris, known by this [illegible] name, have attracted attention by their conduct and bearing. They [illegible] the satellites of a Cincyen Sobrier, who had been a [illegible]ate of the Police, but was dismissed some short time back by the Provisional Government. He is at present the principal editor of Commune de Paris, and it is said that from his office, in a house in the Rue Rivoli, opposite the Tuileries, and in which the Duchess of Orleans rented apartments, while the National Guards are employed in arresting the vères of the people, issue the most inflammatory bulletins, and raise suspected of imaginary réactionaire and contre-révolutionaire, that is, of moderate principles—in fact, the new suspects of the day. By what authority this is done no one seems to know certain is it that arrests are made in the name of the editor of the Commune de Paris; and that the Citoyen Sobrier him self accuses, browbeats, and bullies with menace and threat, as enemies of the true Republic, those who are brought before him.

We find the following notice of the recent proceedings of this [illegible] in the Gazette des Tribunaux: "The Montagnards, whose effective force, somewhat variable, amounts to from 600 to 800 men, were formed at the first[illegible]reform of Police, the first of them having been that small knot of republican combatants, who, headed by M. Cavaignac and M. Sobrier, took possession of the hotel on the Quai des Orfèvres, in the struggle of the 24th February. The first idea of the organisation of this corps has never been regular, neither have its uniform and equipments. The Montagnards, without joining any other corps, and it must be said without consenting to submit to the severe rules of discipline, placed themselves at the moment of danger, with praiseworthy devotedness, at the disposal of the Prefect of Police. They have, however, acquitted themselves with zeal and intelligent energy of the difficult mission entrusted to them. As a proof of their want of discipline, it may be stated that [illegible] ago, in consequence of a misunderstanding with the staff, the company of the National Guard, which was to have taken the post of the Prefecture of Police, was behind time: and when they did arrive, the Montagnards, who had [illegible] manœuvre done the service in conjunction with the National Guard, refused to allow them to enter the court, saying that their orders were inconsiderable, withdrew his men in order to prevent a collision. On the two following days other companies of the National Guard were relieved, admittance to the hotel by the Montagnards, a refusal against which they constantly protested. On Tuesday, the day on which the rappel was beaten, several individuals were arrested for distributing Communist pamphlets or uttering Communist cries. These individuals, who were protected from the vengeance of the crowd by the National Guard, were sent by the commissaries of police before whom they were taken to the Prefecture of Police, some of the National Guard escorting them. On reaching the Hotel of the Prefecture, the Montagnards, who occupied all the entrances, refused to allow the National Guards to enter; they required that the warrants for detaining the accused should be given up to them, and they then selected certain of the prisoners, saying that they knew them, and would answer for them. In vain did the National Guards insist on being allowed to place the men in the custody of the regular authorities [illegible] and threatening, and when at length they retired, the prisoners were set at liberty, without any other formality. On being informed of these circumstances, the Prefect, M. Caussidière, assembled the Montagnards, and expressed his [illegible] at their conduct. He told them that no one should be allowed to [illegible] above the laws, and that they must submit to the usual rules [illegible]. He added that they should leave the Hotel of the Prefecture [illegible], and be located in the building formerly occupied by the Institute [illegible] Avocates. At the same moment[illegible] of discontent were heard, whereupon the Prefect declared that they would not be allowed to oppose [illegible] existing discipline would be respected, and that they must obey willingly, or he should be obliged to employ measures to enforce obedience. On the same day the Montagnards evacuated the Prefecture, and went to occupy the building prepared for the Rue Saint Victor. It was, however, arranged that twenty of them should do the service of the hotel, in conjunction with the National Guard and the Garde Républicaine. The Montagnards have since been guarded by the Montagnards, and the Garde Républicaine, the National Guard being at the review. On Friday a company of the 1st legion, under the command of Captain Mauvais, came to the Prefecture to take possession of the post, in arming they found the Montagnards in[illegible]ed before the vestibule, and barring the passage; and their chief declared that as men would not allow the National Guard to enter the Prefecture, Captain Mauvais might [illegible] Le Montagnards, that, as an old soldier, he must, in obedience to the orders he had received, occupy the post of the Prefecture in spite of all resistance. His men made an attempt to overthrow the Montagnards, who the [illegible] were present at, but took no part in the contest. "I am an old soldier," said "the Republican as those who prevent me from entering—but I [illegible] Vidame, perhaps, for I have the honour to command a company of the Montagnards, who prove, the sincerity of their convictions by the loss of their [illegible] on the scaffold. I appeal to you, young citizens! I have an order, and I must push on or recede. I order the publication stated as a ruse. Vive la Garde Républicaine! Soldat, brave Capitaine! This put an end to the conflict, and since the National Guard has done the service at the Prefecture, in conjunction with the Garde Républicaine and the Montagnards.

[illegible] Admiral Dundas, senior Sea Lord, left the Admiralty on Saturday for Liverpool and Birkenhead, to make an inspection, whence the gallant officer proceeded to Kingstown (Dublin). He was expected to return by Monday next.

BANKRUPTCY OF M. JULLIEN.—The first of M. Jullien's bankruptcy has been granted to him at Commissioners' Hall, and Mr. Cannan has been appointed official assignee. His debts are said to be between £900.0 and £10,000, and his assets and Mr. Banks, of Lamb street-hill, has been retained by M. Jullien to make up [illegible] accounts. His[illegible] are stretched to his bringing out the opera at [illegible] Jullien, before[illegible] g himself a bankrupt, offered his creditors £1000 per annum out of his future professional earnings, which [illegible] general Lady would have accepted; but, as a few individuals pertinaciously pressed their demands against him, and refused his offer, he was driven into the Bankruptcy Court for protection. The first meeting for the proof of debts and choice of assignees has been appointed to take place on the 1st of May, at eleven o'clock.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Fracto crura——plurima manet
Lesyrna. HORAT

Inasmuch as hope exceeds fact in interest, so the First Spring Meeting at Newmarket excels all racing occasions of the season. Epsom and Doncaster, indeed, are mighty in their results, but in effects effective they yield to that week which prophetically—in more senses of the word than one—in the neighbourhood of The Devil's Dutch, "casts its shadows before." That epoch of account has now played out its play a deep game, with its tricks and honours, its science and experience, its luck and good guidance. Pouring its "finesses" and "revokes" (scratches), its "tenaces" and "loose cards," we confine our notice to its chief "point"—the race for the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes, if not the absolute touchstone of the Derby, at all events an index to much of its machinery.

Jockeyism and[illegible]

The Two Thousand Guinea Stakes, with an entry of thirty-one, contained several of the marked horses, headed for the great Derby contest. These were Surplice, Glendower, Loadstone, Assault, Fern, Flatcatcher, Rosslyn, Sunnyside, John Orridge, and others. Of the list of 31, only five ran—the winner being an animal most emphatically called The Flatcatcher, whose price for the Derby a few weeks ago was fifty to one. The most clever two-year-old performance of '47 was that by Flatcatcher when he overthrustled the rest of his field at Chester. Subsequently he was beaten, or "finessed," and now he'll strive in vain to save himself from his friends. Loadstone was declared not to start an hour or so before the race; and Surplice was scratched a few weeks previous. Thus, the "cracks" of the Goodwood stable are preserved from becoming "stale and cheap to vulgar company." Glendower, in his two-year-old form, was anything but "owing" Glendower; he paid his way, and was a game animal for the Two Thousand. But how speaks that for the field? Fern was unknown before, and his debût will not make him fame. [illegible]'s engagements, and at Epsom, calls for no remark; and Sunnyside rather made his Craven trial a very bad one, or this one whose verdict should not be despised.

A more dangerous Derby for the backers of horses has not been known for many years, and that is saying much for speculation. Last season's two-year-old stock was to close together to be good, but we no other criterion. The system of compromise spreads fast, and the better an animal is the more the probability of his being "safe"—the owner understands the risk is against himself, and is content with half a loaf rather than no bread. What's the public to him? If there happen to be two horses engaged in one event in the same stable, it matters little to chances whether they can't tell whether the [illegible] to win with the best or the worst, if with either.

Hedge then your hopes, ye that have drawn the "cracks" in Sweeps or Lottery; and hold on patiently, ye to whose "lots" the scum has fallen. There is nothing certain under the sun: your horse comes in first, and turns out to be not himself, as with Running Rein in 1844. And is there any limit to the contingency of luck? Is the fate of one dependent upon the corner being bad—being shut out—being knocked down—being dead? One of the latest cases before the Jockey Club was that of a master who charged his jockey with having feloniously stolen his race. The case, for off when backing horses for stakes and mates will ensure a pass for Bedlam.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The difficulty of employment is the most unfashionable that the leading discount houses have reduced the rate to two-and-a-half per cent for money [illegible] to limit transactions to actual requirements everywhere ensues like it, and the unsettled state of continental affairs renders such a course one of sound prudence. The comparatively small trade doing is nearly confined to cash payments, which, coupled with the liberal terms on foreign paper, makes good Lilla difficult to procure. To these causes may be added a belief that, depressed as the funds generally are, a greater depression is probable. Combined, the sun ent of capital awaiting temporary investment is thus unusually increased, and it may be doubted if even the present low rates can be long maintained, unless the [illegible] exportation of gold now existing should largely increase.

From Good Friday until the Wednesday following, in quiet times, is what is regarded as almost a continuous holiday, the little business transacted being nearly confined to private investments. At present, however, the unsettled state of affairs has materially lessened these mercantile vacations, the attendance at the Stock Exchange on Monday was, of course, rather thinner than usual, but would have been comparatively numerous, had it not happened to be also an Hebrew holiday. Unusual, however, as the attendance was, it did not produce much activity, Consols standing at 82¾ ⅞, until the announcement of a telegraphic despatch from Hull, with the news of the Danish fleet having captured several Prussian merchantmen, decline to 82½ ⅝ was the immediate effect, and closing price. On Tuesday the market was dull [illegible] only for a short time quoted 82 to ⅝, and until the same hour[illegible] were declared Consols remained at 82½ ⅝, but a large sale by a Chancery broker, added to some sales by the Government broker, caused a decline to 82¼ ⅜. The relatively low price of Reduced, which has now a full dividend, and the Long Annuity, has caused several changes from Consols to that stock. Together the supply of Money Stock equalised the price of Consols for money and account, the intervening day being that of the sale of stock being greater if paid for immediately than if paid for a month hence. Consols on Thursday opened firmly, and the news from France bringing improved prices of the Rentes, caused a further advance of ⅜ this week there was a firm market at the following rates:—Bank Stock, 18[illegible]; Reduced Annuities, 80¾ ⅞ per Cent. Consols Annuities, 82¼ ⅝ New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 91¼ ⅜ Long Annuities, 18¼ Ditto 30 years, Jan. 1885, 24¼ India Stock, 230; Consols for Account, 82¼; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 43 pm.; £500, 44 pm.; Small, 43 pm.

Little has been less activity in the Foreign Market this week, and the rise of last week in several instances has been barely maintained. In Brazilian securities as low as 68 has occurred, but prices have since risen to 69. The news from Spain has slightly depressed Spanish, but in Peruvians some bargains have been done at improved prices. The hopes of the bondholders are again aroused by [illegible] that a loan agent at Madrid is waited for, to commence an adjustment. Ditto, stock has slightly improved. In Portuguese there is little doing. The closing quotations are:—Brazilian Bonds, 69; Do. New, 1829 and 1839, 66; Chilian Bonds, 3 per Cent, 41; Equator Bonds, 2½; Grenada Bonds, 27; ferred, 9½; Mexican 5 per Cent, 1845, 15½; Peruvian Bonds, 6 per Cents, 29; Portuguese 4 per Cent, 15½; Do. SATURDAY MORNING.—The English Market was steady yesterday, and advanced a point upon the arrival of improved prices from Paris. At the close Consols marked 82½ ⅝ for Money and 82¾ ⅞ for Account. In the Foreign and Share Markets there was no alteration of importance.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Since Monday the arrivals of wheat, coastwise and from Essex and Kent, have very moderate. To-day the show of sam ples of both red and white was very small. Although the accounts received to-day are unfavourable as regards the appearance of the winter wheat the demand for all kinds of wheat of home growth continued the pressure of foreign parcels, was dull, and scarcely active, yet previous terms were steadily supported in every instance. Nearly 12,000 quarters of foreign wheat have come in this week. The parcels marked off steadily, other kinds slowly, at late rates. Fine barley both English and foreign commanded a ready sale, at extreme currencies, a shade dearer. Other kinds were wholesome. Malt is steadily request, but we have no improvement and fine grades realise readily.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

LONGCHAMP WALKING DRESSES.

In France, in Paris at least, nothing can depose "Longchamps," or it is there that the annual congress of fashion is held, in the name of good taste, and under the auspices of talent and genius. If, however, this year "Longchamps" has not presented all the exterior elements which have distinguished preceding years, the tradespeople, who, in spite of bad times, consider "Longchamps" rather as an epoch than as a fête, which lasts for a few hours, have prepared and kept in reserve the most delightful novelties; thoroughly convinced that whatever may happen in France, dress will never suffer diminution, since the country possesses all the essentials which contribute to its success. Besides, what the Republic neither can nor will stop, is fashion. For a short time, we feared that the eccentric and too republican dresses in their shape and colour, might prevail this year at the commencement of spring; but the good taste of the majority has had the ascendency, and very slight variations have been observed. The magazines of fashions and dress-making, whose business was suspended during the Revolution, have resumed their accustomed activity, and it is to be wished that it were the same in all the other branches of industry. The only fashion which is completely new, and which will be probably adopted, is the diminution of length of the skirts of dresses, principally in front, so as to disengage the foot and allow it to be seen. This fashion must be approved: in truth, it was no longer important to have a fine ankle and a little foot gracefully turned out; you could with the long dresses conceal a deformed foot and disproportioned legs; but with dresses a little shortened, intended for walking, the ground will be scarcely touched. We believe, nevertheless, that for elegance of figure and deportment, the dresses should remain long behind.

As we have said that "Longchamps" is the designation of a period, rather than the obsolete indication of three poor days, there will be worn during that period, according to the best authorities in these matters, plain dresses with open bodices; some with "bamoyeus," or capes turned back; others with capes added on, in the form of a shawl, which, passing over the shoulders, makes an angle and terminates in a point at the waist. Some of these dresses have received the name of "robes de ," in commemoration of the toilettes of a grand epoch.

In the large Engraving of walking dresses for "Longchamps" which we give, our readers will notice that the shape of the bonnets has rather varied. Brown bonnets of white crape, Tuscan bonnets, rice straw bonnets, separated by fullings of four little folds of taffeta, be it pink, lilac, or green, ornamented with branches of flowers or bows of ribbon, or with feathers, are at present the novelties most sought aft These bonnets, of white, pink, green, or lilac crape—all of very delicate hues—are trimmed with puffings of tulle of the same colour, as well as the interior of the poke: the crown is always round.

The most fashionable colour for dresses and mantles is bronze, infinitely variegated, and shot with every shade—bronze moderne, bronze rouge, bronze vert, &c. Plaids of the same colour are much worn also. Dresses are less ornamented with flounces than formerly; the sleeves half full, with under sleeves in guipure lace, or application, or tarlatan. The home toilette is a dress with large satin stripes on a light ground; the bodice carré in front: the skirt is open, so as to show an under slip, embroidered down the front en tablier.

The Ball Dress has two flounces of lace over the slip in taffeta d'Italie, which is extremely fashionable for evening dress. The sleeves are trimmed with little bows of ribbon without ends. The head-dress is composed of real flowers in bunches, hanging downward, or of the tips of feathers shaded pink and white.

Basques of braided cloth, resembling riding-habits, are much worn, and are extremely becoming: the sleeves of these are open, and discover full and puffing under-sleeves in batiste confined at the wrist with an embroidered insertion. The tucker, which goes up to the throat, is small-plaited very finely, and closed by a pretty little ribbon of black watered silk.

The great question of mantles and outer garments is not ready to be solved, and our legislators will sooner have projected and passed twenty Acts of Parliament, than our "artistes" will have decided if the Mantle will take precedence of the Visite, or even this of the Paletot. [illegible] been shamefully perverted; but it is not because they have [illegible] cut, or from the questionable caste of the wearers, that we are to renounce them. A visite of handsome material, trimmed with beautiful lace, is a charming accessory, which females of the most recherché taste will always be desirous of possessing. The mantilla is a fantasie of no consequence, but very useful for the morning.

The lady's paletot is no matter of indifference, be it in the cut, the choice of the material, or even in the manner that it is worn. The pamelle is not the hood for it. It is [illegible] ridiculous, a burlesque or a "portail comme il faut." But if the paletot is in excellent substance or armure, if it is lined with vair, and if the covering the upper part of the body it displays the form of an elegant waist, an enchanting figure, to appear—if, in short, it is [illegible] with trimmings, or surrounded with a light lace, the paletot is really splendid.

INSTALLATION OF THE ARCHBISHOP.

IN another part of our paper we have given an account of the enthronisation of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The ceremony was not merely grand and imposing but full of serious solemnity, and no one appeared to feel this more sensibly than he who was the chief personage in it, towards whom all eyes were turned, and on whom all thoughts were for the moment centered. The most careless observer of the times cannot but be conscious that Dr. Sumner has been called to his high office at a season of peculiar difficulty. A life of comparative indolence and ease cannot be the lot of the present inmate of Lambeth Palace. There is a cry throughout the whole length and breadth of the land for a reform in the Church—a reform in its discipline, a reform in its revenues. We do not speak of men of harsh thoughts and rude hands, who, without considering the effects of such an act, would destroy her utterly. But we refer to that numerous class of the sound-thinking, who, conscious of the abuses which exist, and of the changes that are necessary, are desirous of seeing the one removed and the other effected. And such are the best, and soundest, and surest friends of the Church.

Men's eyes are open and their tongues are free; they see the evils and will speak of them, and speak strongly too. The days are passed when a few honied phrases would gloss over what is wrong; the truth must be spoken, and must be heard, and heeded too. The present Archbishop knows well what is needful to be done, and we trust that he will have both the manliness and the honesty to set about it. He has passed many years in the energetic fulfilment of the onerous duties of one of the largest dioceses in the kingdom; he is, therefore, a practical man; not elevated to his high station from some academic retreat, or from the soft luxuriance of a dean's easy chair, but passing from a station of activity which gave him ample opportunities of knowing the condition and the wants of both the Church and the Clergy. He will now have to exercise less personal labour, but far greater anxious superintendence. There is even among the Clergy a feverish state of unsettlement. They see, on the part of many of the Bishops, a desire to possess an increase of power, which, if granted, will be used neither to their own comfort nor the well-doing of the Church. They therefore look with concern to him who is the head of the Church to watch their interests, and to protect them in the proper liberty and independence of principle which they ought to enjoy. They have good hopes, and we trust they will not be disappointed—indeed, we feel they will not—in placing confidence in the Archbishop. He has been raised to the Metropolitical See—not by political party—not by the favour of Court influence—not by the recommendation of his Episcopal brethren—but on account of his talents and his character alone. He comes, therefore, an unbiassed and independent man. He has embraced no party. As a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission we trust he will not lend his sanction to that gross and unpardonable injustice which has led to the squandering of tens of thousands on Episcopal parks and palaces, while so many of the hard-working, poor, parochial clergy are without a roof that they can call their own. He is the first Archbishop of Canterbury whose revenues have been diminished by a Parliamentary decree; and we trust, that for his own sake, and for the sake of the suffering clergy, he will not tamely see the surplus lavishly squandered on objects which cause shame and scandal. When we speak of the suffering clergy, we mean those who groan under the burden of a poverty which [illegible]ation ought to be free from, which fills their [illegible] with solicitudes and cares, and which, however great may be their piety, their zeal, or their learning, cramps their energies and lessens their usefulness. Say what people will make as many fine speeches as you please about worth, talents, &c.—as long as the possessor of them is poor, he is, if not actually looked down upon, at least not valued as he ought to be. That great gulf which at present separates the curate or poor vicar from the wealthy dignitary, must be narrowed. There must be gr[illegible] in the Church, we know, as well as in every other branch of society; but there ought not to exist what so frequently calls forth our observation now—that unbecoming, that painful contrast between the threadbare coat and scan[illegible]urnished table of one, and the luxurious equipage and sumptuous board of another.

The vast difference between the two destroys, or at least weakens to an infinite degree, that bond which ought to exist between them. Their sympathies are lessened, while heart-sinking comparisons, which lead almost to envy on the one hand, and a distant coldness too evident on the other, form an insurmountable barrier to that cordial co-operation, without which the effects of both lose half their weight. This must be amended; it cannot longer be borne, that one who has been educated as a gentleman, whose position in society renders him a fit companion for the noblest and

THE PARIS ELECTIONS.

SCRUTINY OF VOTES, AT THE SALLE ST. JEAN.

Ten details of the French Elections will be found in another part of our Journal. The present Engravings show the closing scenes of the Election of the Deputies for the Department of the Seine.

The best accompaniment to this pair of Illustrations is the following passage from the Moniteur:—

"On Friday night, at half-past ten o'clock, the Mayor of Paris, M. Armand Marrast, accompanied by the three deputy Mayors, and the Secretary-General of the Mayoralty, all the Mayors of the capital and banlieue, amongst whom was Citizen Wée, the oldest among them, and Citizen Pagnerre, Mayor of the 10th arrondissement and Secretary-General of the Provisional Government, descended to the square of the Hôtel de Ville to proclaim the names of the 34 representatives elected by the department of the Seine. The night was dark, and the population, which had awaited since morning the result of the ballot, enthusiastically filled the Mayor when he mounted the platform erected behind the railing in front of the Hôtel de Ville. The square was filled by the crowd of the National Guard, and Municipal Guards, anxious and joyous. Each name that was proclaimed elicited deafening applause, cries, flourishes of trumpets, and patriotic songs. The Mayor of Paris read first proclaimed the names of the deputies in the great hall of St. Jean, in presence of the presidents and scrutators of all the sections. But here the proclamation took place before the multitude, which could not have been present at the counting of the votes, and whose curiosity was excited by the long expectation. It would be impossible to give an idea of the joy which pervaded the crowd when the last name proclaimed announced the close of that grand operation which had kept all Paris in suspense during five days."

Another account states:—"Towards night torches were lighted by the National Guards, and the murmur of curiosity from the crowd around became louder and louder. At length there was a general movement, as it became known that the names of the elected were being declared within. Men with hats came hurrying out of the Hôtel de Ville. There was a general shout of 'The names! the names!' In obedience to this call Marrast, as Mayor of Paris, appeared upon the low balcony before the building, and in the midst of this strange torchlight scene he read aloud the list and the numbers of votes obtained by each. As the name of 'Lamartine' at the head, with his immense majority of 293,800, it was impossible to control the shouting, which lasted for several minutes. When silence was at length obtained, the other names were read over with comparatively less tumult. At the conclusion came cries of 'Vive l'Assemblée Nationale!' the military bands struck up the 'Marseillaise,' amidst the usual shouting, the crowd gradually dispersed, and the different detachments of the National Guards disseminated themselves throughout the city, returning in picturesque bands, with torches and music to their different quarters."

The Salle St. Jean, in which the scrutiny was held, is the principal apartment on the ground-floor of the Hôtel de Ville. It has detached Doric columns fronting pilasters to correspond, and supporting an elliptical roof. Various chambers and corridors communicate with the courts and the pavilions, which are occupied by various public offices. At the three long tables on the floor of the saloon are seated the mayors of Paris, and other towns of the department.

In an adjoining column we give a correct representation of the new Republican flag.

POPULARITY OF LAMARTINE IN FRANCE.—A scene occurred at the Opera in Paris on Wednesday night (last week), which shows how high the moderation and ability of M. Lamartine have placed him in the estimation of the Parisians. On that evening the result of the elections was already partially known. The opera was over when Lamartine was discovered in a box. "Lamartine! Lamartine is here! Vive Lamartine!" was cried by a few, and then the whole theatre took up the shout of "Vive Lamartine!" M. Lamartine, however, could not be persuaded to come forward to accept the homage of the crowd. A partial silence was at length obtained, when the curtain rose. The ballet was about to commence. But no. The actors came forward, and presented arms. The "Marseillaise" was sung, and then the whole chorus shouted "Vive Lamartine!" Everybody stood, hats and pocket-handkerchiefs were raised, and the universal cry. The poet statesman alone did not rise from his seat. He had his face in his hands. His feelings seemed to have completely overpowered him.

ABD-EL-KADER AT PAU.

THE Provisional Government of France having, at length, assigned a resting-place for Abd-el-Kader, the preparations for his removal thither are stated to have been conducted with great secrecy. On the decision of the Government being communicated to him, he strove to repress his feelings, but those who surrounded him "saw the iron enter into his soul."

On Sunday, the 23rd ult., whilst the elections occupied the whole population of France, a hackney-coach and several omnibuses conveyed Abd-el-Kader and his suite from Fort Lamalgue to Castigneau, whence the Arabs, about 70 in number, were transferred on board the steamers lying in the roads. The Emir and his nearest relatives, with Colonel Lheureux, Governor of Fort Lamalgue, and Colonel Daumas, who has been for some time on a mission at Toulon, embarked in the Mineo, and the Arabs of the suite, forming two bodies, in the small steamers Pingouin and Diamond. These vessels were to convey the passengers to Cette. The latter were thence to proceed by canal to Toulouse, where carriages were to be placed at their disposal to continue their journey to Pau.

On the 26th, according to the Toulouse journals, the Emir arrived in that city; and on the 29th the whole party reached the Castle of Pau.

Besides his family, which was composed of his mother, three wives, three concubines, five legitimate sons and daughters, and an illegitimate son, Abd-el-Kader brought a wet-nurse, nine women, and six children, four Arabian servants, and a native cook. His relatives and friends consisted of twenty-six men, fifteen women, and fourteen children; in all, eighty-nine persons.

Pau is the ancient capital of the little kingdom of French Navarre and

ABD-EL-KADER.

Béarn, now the principal place in the Department of the Lower Pyrenees. It stands on a lofty ridge, forming the right bank of the river, or Gave de Pau. Its situation is, perhaps, scarcely surpassed by that of any town in France; and, says "Murray's Handbook," "The English have shown their good taste in having chosen it for their residence, especially in winter." From this accredited work we select these additional descriptive details

The range of the Pyrenees, as seen from Pau, presents a strikingly-beautiful and varied outline of peaks, cones, and ridges, often cut like a saw, rising against the south horizon; the Pic du Midi de Pau and the Pic du Midi de Bigorre being the most prominent points. These members of the great central range are disclosed to view through the gaps of a subordinate chain of round-backed and wooded hills, forming the middle distance; while, in the foreground appear the venerable Castle of Pau; the torrent, or Gave, its banks beautifully fringed with trees; the picturesque bridge, and the ruins of another bridge destroyed by its inundations. Within the scope of this view appear Jurançon, a village famed for its wines; and Bithàre, where Henri IV. was nursed. It is a glorious prospect, to be feeit upon, and seen over and over again.

Pau owes its chief renown to its having been the birthplace of the "Bon Roi," Henry IV., who drew his first breath (December 13, 1553) in its ancient, time-honoured, historic Castle, the most conspicuous object in the annexed Illustration. It stands stately upon the mountain ridge, looking over the river, at the point of a sort of promontory formed by a small rivulet which cuts its way through the town, and behind the Castle walls, at the bottom of a deep ravine, to throw itself into the Gave, just below it. The five towers of the Castle, and the outer wall which unites them, and serves to support the upper stories, are the oldest part, and supposed to date from the time of Gaston Phœbus, Count de Foix, who founded the Castle about 1363. The tallest tower, or donjon, named after Gaston, rises at the east end 115 feet high. In the gutted and half-ruined Tour de la Monnaye, rising on the side of the Castle next the river, from the bottom of the eminence on which it stands, to a level with the terrace, Margaret de Valois, et in sanè, gave an asylum to Calvin and other persecuted Reformers. This tower was used as a gaol until 1814. The Tour de Montpezat, on one side of the courtyard, contained, according to popular belief, the oubliettes. It is about 80 feet high, and its walls, to a height of 40 feet, were originally destitute of any opening, the gate at the bottom having been broken through in 1793, when the Castle was sacked by the Revolutionists. It stands within and detached from the outer wall of the Castle, from which a small drawbridge, thrown over the gap, gave access to it through a little door.

Opposite the tower of Montauret is the grand staircase, among the sculptured vaulting of which are the letters H. M., the initials of Henri II. of Navarre, and Margaret, the grand-parent of Henri IV., by whom it was built. The entire restoration of the interior was undertaken by Louis Philippe, and, as far as completed, has been executed with good taste and splendour. The King revived, as nearly as possible, the ancient decorations injured by the Revolutionists, who first stripped and ruined this ancient palace, and then degraded it to a barrack; and he has replaced those which they destroyed by others as far as possible in accordance with the age and style of the edifice. The walls of the chief apartments have been covered with tapestry, and the rooms filled with ancient furniture of the period, collected at a vast expense.

In an apartment on the first floor is preserved the cradle in which Henri IV. was rocked; it consists of a large tortoise shell, inverted, and suspended by cords, like the scale of a balance. In a room of the second story of the Castle Henri was born. On the day of Henri's death, in 1610, there is a tradition that the Castle was struck by lightning, which broke in pieces the Royal escutcheon! Jean d'Albert was also born in the Castle, 1528. It was alternately the prison of Reformers and Romanists during the religious wars and troubles of Béarn, and was the refuge of Theodore Beza and other Protestant teachers whom Jean de Navarre protected from persecution.

Such is the history, in brief, of the prison-house of Abd-el-Kader.

FRENCH NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.—Next week we shall give several large views descriptive of this important Epoch in the History of the World.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1848.

PUBLIC attention, attracted so intensely to the proceedings of the French Republic, and to the election and probable character of the National Assembly, has not yet been fixed with sufficient earnestness upon the mighty revolution that is now in progress in Germany. A larger, more industrious, and better-educated population than that of France, living under the dominion of thirty-seven independent Sovereigns, and occupying a district extending from the Adriatic to the Baltic, and forming, even in their present anomalous and disjointed condition, a barrier against the semi-barbarous power that holds in subjection the north-east of Europe and a large portion of Asia, are effecting a revolution, which, if successful in its objects, will be one of the grandest events in modern history. The people of these thirty-seven States speak the same language, glory in the same literature, have the same traditions of the past, and form the same aspirations for the future. They desire the Unity of Germany, and, unappalled by the numerous difficulties to be surmounted before such Unity can be realised, pursue their object with a calmness and steadiness which show a conviction of success, and impress the other nations of Europe with the utmost respect for their cause and for the manner in which they advocate it. The first ebullitions of excitement have passed over—Prussia has entered the career of Constitutionalism—Austria has recounced her Metternich and her ultra-Absolutism—Bavaria has liberalised herself—Saxony, Wurtemberg, and the other minor states, have joined the movement; and Germany, from one extremity to the other, has secured to itself two out of the three great objects for which it has been struggling. These are freedom of speech and freedom of the press, which are guaranteed, for the future, in every state in Germany. The third object is unity of the Fatherland, an object more difficult, on account of the pretensions of Austria and Prussia—to say nothing of the Kings and Princes of the smaller states—to the leadership or Emperorship of the Federation. This object, however, has not been lost sight of by any of the States, even amid those isolated efforts for individual rights which have signalised the last ten weeks.

A new movement has just been made, and seventeen "MEN OF TRUST" have been despatched to Frankfort by several of the States, to aid the Diet now sitting in that city in the preparation of a scheme for the Union of Germany. A sketch of the proposed Constitution has been published. As it must have been evident to all the Kings, Princes, Dukes, Electors, &c., of the German States, that no project of Union could be at all feasible which should not diminish the powers of each Sovereign, none of them can feel surprise that under the Constitution now proposed each Potentate is called upon to renounce some portion of his privilege and authority for the general good. Whether they call themselves Kings or Dukes, their powers will closely resemble those exercised by the Governors of the several States of the American Union. Accordingly, we find that in the scheme proposed to the Diet, by these seventeen "Men of Trust," they are to be reduced to that condition —Chief Magistrates in their own States, but governed in all matters relating to the entire Confederation by the superior authority of the President or Emperor of Germany. It is proposed to elect the Emperor from amid the existing Royal or Ducal houses, and to make his office hereditary. The relations of United Germany with the rest of Europe and the world are to be conducted not as at present by the Consuls and Ambassadors of each State, but by the Consuls and Ambassadors of the Emperor. The military and naval forces of the United States of Germany will be one, and not several; and the central authority commanding over both will have its jurisdiction over the Post-office, the Mint, the Railway system, and the Custom-houses of the whole Union. In fact, an approximation will be made in all important and national particulars to the system of the United States, with the sole difference that neither the Presidenship of each State nor the Presidenship of the Union will be elective as in America, but hereditary, and confirmed to the present holders in the several States.

The only election necessary will be for the general Presidenship or Emperorship of the Union; after which it will be hereditary in the family of the potentate that shall be chosen. This, however, will be the grand difficulty to be overcome. If the House of Hapsburg be chosen, the House of Brandenburgh may resist. If the House of Brandenburgh, which is evidently and indeed avowedly putting itself forward as the chief of United Germany, by intrigue or by violence, or even by fair election, be elevated to the high position which it seeks, will the House of Hapsburgh, the successors and representatives of Charlemagne, be content of with inferiority? This point once settled, all other matters will be of easy execution. It is proposed that the Emperor shall rule by means of responsible ministers, and two Houses of Legislature. The Upper House is to be composed of all the Sovereigns of the existing States, who may sit by deputy; and of 161 senators, to be men of forty years of age and upwards, paying a certain amount of taxation, and to be elected for twelve years. The Lower House is to be chosen from the political assemblies of each separate State, in the proportion of one member to every 100,000 inhabitants. The seat of Government is to be at Frankfort-on-the-Maine. In addition to these two legislative bodies, a third is proposed, to be called the Supreme Imperial Court of Judicature, and to hold its seat at Nuremburg. This Court is to be composed of twenty-one judges, of whom one-third are to be named by the Emperor, one-third by the Upper, and one-third by the Lower House. They are to hold office for life, and their functions are to embrace the decision of all questions of federal law, arising between States or individuals; the determination of legislative bodies; the trial of political impeachments, both of Ministers of the Empire, and Ministers of the separate States; and generally all questions of arbitration that may arise between the States and the Empire, or between one State and another. This is a grand project—to our mind infinitely grander and more practicable than any of the projects of the French. It is to be hoped that its discussion will be peaceable, and that the Germans will realise the vision of their true patriots.

The Irish sedition has at length taken a mock-heroic turn. Nothing could have been more unexpected, after the dangerous denunciations and appeals to lawless violence of Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Meagher, than such a catastrophe. Nothing could have been more fortunate for the Irish Government and for the cause of order—nothing more ludicrous—nothing more satisfactory. Mr. Smith O'Brien and the other two heroes of rebellion and republicanism, after having made a progress through the east of Ireland, bethought them of trying a similar experiment in the west. They fixed upon Limerick as the scene of their demonstration, and a grand tea-party, with speechifying and sedition to give it a zest, was got up in their honour. It so happened, however, that in Limerick there resided a priest of great influence, who held the memory of the late Daniel O'Connell in especial reverence. The Young Ireland party, and Mr. Mitchell more especially, having been assaulting the name and fame of this once great leader of the Irish people, Dr. O'Brien, the priest alluded to, resolved to show them that whatever might be the opinions of "Young Ireland" with regard to Daniel O'Connell, those of "Old Ireland" were still enthusiastic in his favour, and that the people of Limerick held his enemies to be no true Irishmen. Mr. Mitchell in his paper having been more than usually defamatory of O'Connell's memory, the extract was reprinted in the form of a hand-bill, and widely circulated through Limerick by Dr. O'Brien, with such comments as he thought the occasion warranted. The result was, that, instead of receiving a triumph, Mr. Mitchell and his friends sustained a reverse. An effigy of Mitchell was publicly burnt by the populace, who, somewhat ludicrously, under the circumstances, called themselves the moral force party. As there was danger that the house in which the physical force tea-party was held would take fire, the effigy of Mr. Mitchell that was blazing against the door was removed, and a riot ensued. The moral force O'Connellites invaded the physical force Mitchellites, and peaceable "Old Ireland" set upon rampant "Young Ireland" with virulence as well as vigour, and inflicted such personal damage upon them, that the usual contenders and desires of the Saxon and of the Saxon were saved from a worse fate by the interposition of the police and military. Mr. Mitchell had to defend his life, not against Englishmen and Saxons, but against Irishmen; not with sword and spear, but with a piece of a broken chair; and Mr. Smith O'Brien received from the fists or weapons of his Celtic countrymen the degrading infliction of a black eye—and the more serious calamity, according to one report, which we hope is incorrect, of two or three broken ribs. The disturbers were routed by the anti-disturbers. The three heroes of the pike, the sword, and the vitriol bottle were beaten with sticks, and driven to an ignominious retreat. Laughter, so fatal to all big projects, has thus made the cause of Mitchell and O'Brien its own. The Repeal delusion has received from the hands of the mob at Limerick a more severe blow than all its soldiers could have administered to it; and if Lord Clarendon follows up this accidental advantage with spirit and discretion, the mouthing patriots may be very soon, very summarily, and quite finally disposed of. Mr. O'Brien, it appears, was so disgusted at the treatment he received in his own county town, that he resigned in a huff the representation of Limerick, and expressed his determination to forsake the ungrateful trade of politics, and cultivate his own domains for the remainder of his life. He has, according to some accounts, re-considered this determination. He is certainly the unluckiest of public men. One time he braved the authority of the House of Commons, and instead of being sent in his dignity to the Tower, he was ignominiously imprisoned in a coal-cellar. At another period he headed a physical force faction, whose whole talk was of blood, pikes, muskets, and barricades, and received no other reward for his daring and his magnilocuence than a black eye, in an inglorious scuffle with a portion of his own countrymen. Punch and the Government will gain greatly by the result. Even Mr. O'Brien himself may have cause to congratulate himself hereafter that his ambition was thus nipped in the bud, and that his black eye saved him from the fate that awaits the bolder Mr. Mitchell at the instance of the Attorney-General.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

ROYAL COMMISSION.—The Royal Assent was given, by Commission, to the Election Recognizances Bill and the Leicester Cemetery Bill. The Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftesbury, and Lord Campbell.

The Jewish Disabilities Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

SPAIN.—Lord HENLEY, in moving for copies of the correspondence which had lately taken place between the Foreign Secretary and the Government of Spain, took occasion to censure strongly the spirit of interference in the purely internal affairs of foreign countries manifested on that and other occasions by Lord Palmerston. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE defended the conduct of Lord Palmerston, and stated, that the letter addressed by the noble Viscount to Mr. Bulwer, and which had been censured, was intended solely for that gentleman's guidance, and was not intended to be made public. Lord BROUGHAM also defended the conduct of Lord Palmerston. The motion was then agreed to.

At a later period of the evening the Marquis of LANSDOWNE changed the day for the second reading of the Jewish Disabilities Bill to Monday, the 24th inst.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

ALIEN BILL.—The House went into committee on this bill, the discussion on the various clauses of which took up a great portion of the evening. The bill ultimately passed through committee, the chief amendment effected in it being, that any foreigner resident for three years in this country before its enactment, should be exempt from its provisions.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—On the order of the day for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. URQUHART moved, as an amendment, that the House go into Committee that day six months. A lengthened debate ensued, and Mr. BROTHERTON having moved its adjournment, the motion was lost by a majority of 225 to 54. Ultimately, however, the debate was adjourned.

The House adjourned at half-past one o'clock.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.—On Thursday evening an influential meeting of the electors of Marylebone was held in the Westmoreland-rooms, George-street, Manchester-square, for the purpose of forming an association to co-operate with the Equitable Taxation League, to secure a reduction of taxation, the extension of the franchise, &c., and resolutions in support of those objects were passed unanimously.

THE West India Mail arrived at Southampton yesterday (Friday), but bringing no news of the slightest interest

EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—At half-past three o'clock yesterday afternoon, a loud explosion took place in a building situated in Shoemaker-row, Doctors' Commons, in the occupation of Messrs. Dakin and Co., lace-dealers, of No. 1, St. Paul's Churchyard, by whom the premises were occupied for the purpose of roasting coffee by a new method lately patented. The apparatus consisted of a steam-engine and boiler on the ground-floor, from which iron pipes formed the medium of conveying the steam to the upper floor. Mr. Dakin, the senior partner of the firm, had lately been very anxious concerning the erection of his new apparatus, and had been on Wednesday night and Thursday personally superintending the working of the process. At the time mentioned, Mr. Dakin was standing in contiguity to the pipe on the upper floor, when it suddenly burst, and the unfortunate gentleman was struck violently upon the forehead, immediately above the left temple, inflicting a dreadful gash, which caused his instantaneous death. Another gentleman and four of the workmen were in the room at the time, but almost miraculously escaped any injury, except the engineer, who was severely wounded.

FRANCE.—OPENING OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

On Thursday the National Assembly of the Republic was opened with all due pomp and solemnity.

The National Guards, who had been summoned by rappel at an early hour of the morning, mustered at the various places of rendezvous, and at 11 o'clock took up the stations assigned them in the Place Vendôme, Place de la Concorde, the Boulevards, the immediate neighbourhood of the Assembly Hall, &c. The troops of the line were also present, and the entire force under arms numbered about 35,000 men. The throng in the vicinity of the Hall was beyond all expected, very great.

The Deputies began to enter about 12 o'clock.

But few wore the prescribed white waistcoat, and none the tri-coloured scarf. The ouvriers dressed à la bourgeoise, and one member is peared in the Hermes costume. Three clerical members were in the Soutane, and one fine celebrated Abbé Lacordaire, attracted not a little notice by his tonsured head and the white robe of the Dominican order of Friars Preachers.

Among the foreigners present were the Marquis and Marchioness Normanby, Mr. Rush, the American Minister, &c.

At one o'clock M. Pairaveau, the senior member, took the chair; the members of the Provisional Government shortly after entered amidst the salutation of all present; and M. Dupont (de l'Eure) immediately ascended the tribune and read a short address. The members then proceeded to their several committees to verify the powers of representatives of the people.

On Thursday morning the Provisional Government issued a decree granting an extraordinary credit for war purposes (supposed to refer to interference in Italy) of £3,200,000

GERMAN STATES

CONSTITUTION OF A FEDERAL GERMAN EMPIRE.—The fundamental law for the constitution of a German Empire, as presented to the German Diet at the sitting of the 26th ult. by the committee of seventeen men of confidence has been published. Its bases are—1st. "The countries which have hitherto appertained to the German Confederation, including the Prussian provinces which are not now incorporated, and the Duchy of Schleswig, constitute henceforth an empire (federal state). 2nd. The independence of the different German States which constitute the confederation is maintained, but limited in so much as the unity of Germany demands it. This limitation consists in part, that some especial affairs of state will come under the exclusive domain of the Imperial power; in part that certain fundamental rights and certain institutions will be guaranteed to the people." The details are then set forth at very great length.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION SOCIETY.—The twenty-third annual meeting of this useful society, which has for its object the promulgation of evangelical religious truth, irrespective of denominational differences, was amongst the smallmans of the metropolis and its vicinity, and the circulation of religious tracts, was held on Tuesday evening, in Finsbury Chapel, S. N. Peto, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The receipts for the past year were £703 3s. 11d.; but this sum did not include all the resources, as several of the local societies did not report the amount of their funds. The report was adopted.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The forty-fifth anniversary meeting of this society was held on Wednesday, at Exeter-hall, and was, as regards number, rank, and talent, the greatest religious occasion of the season. Lord BEXLEY, the venerable president of the society, took the chair, in which he was supported by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Norwich, St Asaph, and Winchester, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, the Earls of Chichester and Harrowby, Viscount Mahon, and several other noblemen and gentlemen. Dr Brandram read an abstract of the report, which described the society's operations in various parts of the world. The entire receipts for the year ending March, 1848, amounted to £90,149 8s. 4d. The total amount payable to the general purposes of the society is £43,586 16s. 11d., including £31,303 4s. 4d. free contributions from auxiliary societies; showing an increase in this item of £451 12s. 8d. The receipts for Bibles and Testaments amounted to £46,189 11s. 8d. The issues of the society during the year amount to 1,194,057, viz. from the depository at home, 837,361; from the depôts abroad, 356,706. The total issues of the society have been 20,860,837 volumes. The expenditure during the past year has been £105,042 19s. 1d., being £14,896 10s. 9d. beyond the receipts. The society is under engagements to the extent of £41,860. The Archbishop of Canterbury moved the adoption of the report, and Lord Morpeth seconded the motion, which was carried. Resolutions in furtherance of the society's objects were supported by the Bishop of St. Asaph and several clergymen and gentlemen, and the meeting separated.

GOVERNESSES' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The fifth anniversary festival was held on Wednesday evening at the London Tavern, where a large number of gentlemen sat down to dinner. Mr. Thos. Trevor presided, the Chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the Governesses' Benevolent Institution," stated that the ladies' committee had during the past year investigated 1719 applications for temporary relief, and had made grants to the amount of £2245. The amount of stock invested for the purchase of election annuities was upwards of £14,000, securing annuities of £700 for twenty governesses. Nearly 400 ladies had contributed for provident annuities, and had thus been enabled to invest safely upwards of £33,000. A house had been purchased and furnished in Harley-street, where in the last two years 300 governesses had found a temporary home. About 2500 governesses had been registered there since the branch had been commenced in 1843, and 1250 provided with situations without any charge. The asylum was to be erected immediately, the tenders being about to be issued. The college born her Majesty's name, and enrolled amongst its professors some of the most distinguished men in the literary world. Many certificates had already been given after examination, and classes would shortly be commenced on all the subjects of female education. The society had thus, in five years, produced benefit to 3800 governesses, and when the charter was granted from the crown he did not doubt but that they would be enabled to carry out their views. The toast was drunk with acclamation. It was announced that a fancy fair would be held on the 6th and 7th of June next, on behalf of the building and endowment fund of the aged asylum, in the grounds of the Royal Hospital, Chelsea. The subscriptions announced during the evening amounted to £1136.

LONDON ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROTECTION OF TRADE.—On Tuesday the annual meeting of this society was held at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street; Mr. F. Graham in the chair. The report for the past year stated that the society had been making steady progress in its objects, and had been found to be of great value and importance to the trading community. The great feature of the society was establishing inquiries with regard to the character of persons seeking to obtain credit, and the result had been that the society's registry of names of persons who were either swindlers or unworthy of credit had increased, during the past year, from 7492 to 17,600. Amongst those described as persons unworthy of credit, were persons who had been frequently applied to, unsuccessfully, for the payment of their accounts, and could not, therefore, be considered entitled to credit. Various gangs of adventurers had been obliged to give up their nefarious projects of obtaining credit; and thus the society had been saved an immense amount of bad debts. During the past year less than £5295 had been obtained on the written application of the secretary, although the account had been considered bad before the society was applied to. The subscribers, during the same time, had increased from 1020 to 1960. Several petitions had been presented to Parliament for increasing the stringency of the County Courts Act; for altering the law as relating to married ladies separated from their husbands; for abolishing Grand Juries, as attended with inconvenience and expense; and for making the property in this country of individuals, going abroad available for the purposes of their creditors. Various resolutions tending to carry out the objects of the society were then adopted, and thanks having been voted to the chairman, the meeting separated.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

On Monday, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Mitchell pleaded in abatement that the original process under the bills of indictment had not been set aside and vitiated by the nolle prosequi

The Attorney-General, on the part of the Crown, on Tuesday, demurred to the plea in abatement entered by Mr. Mitchell, and applied to the Court to compel the defendant to join instanter. The Court ordered a rejoinder in four days from the service of the order.

This decision is a most important one for the traverser (Mitchell), as it precludes the possibility of his trial taking place before the sittings after Trinity Term; and in case of conviction he cannot be brought up for sentence before November next; consequently the determined opposition, which is now discerned, may be said to be at an end.

Mr. Smith O'Brien has put in a plea of "Not Guilty;" and having thus offered no technical difficulty, his trial is expected about the 12th inst.

Mr. Meagher, it was understood, would take the same course

On Friday last, at a meeting of upwards of eighty magistrates of the county of Dublin, an address was agreed to, to the Lord Lieutenant, praying his Excellency to take energetic measures to repress the organization of political clubs, and other proceedings of the disaffected, and promising his Excellency their strenuous support and assistance in such a course.

The editor of the Nation has in last week's number of that paper given an exposition of the political "faith that is in him," in which he says:—"I believe the public opinion of Ireland to be as well-disposed to peace at this hour as ever it was, or ought to become. Peace upon honourable terms. I am well convinced there is no possibility of preserving the connexion either by force or by unworthy compromise. An independent Irish Parliament, elected by the widest popular suffrage, a responsible Minister for Ireland, and a Viceroy of Irish birth, will content the country; and they will defend such settlement against all aggression from without or from within. Such a Parliament will inevitably establish tenant right, abolish the established church, and endeavour to settle the claims of labour upon some solid and satisfactory basis. would, probably, settle the Church question, by providing out of it a fund for the Catholic, Protestant, and Presbyterian clergy, according to the actual wants of the country. Under a native Government, the support of the clergy, as in France, I hold to be a primary duty of the state. But no further is the direction of revolution I do not believe it would go." This sentiment, Mr. Duffy believes, would be preferable to a Republic won by insurrection, an idea thus explained:—"Not from any unmanly abhorrence of war, which would be a glorious waged for our country, but because insurrection would plant deadly animosities between men of the same Irish race; and because the sudden transition of a people from provincialism to republicanism, meaning though no intermediate state, is a doubtful experiment."

THE proprietors of the press at which the United Irishmen (Mr. Mitchell's paper) is printed, having refused to work off any copies of that journal unless the objectionably violent passages in "the leaders" were struck out, Mr. M. had no actionable ground to go upon in Parliament to "come out" in very moderate guise indeed. He promises this will not occur again.

Great sensation had been created in Dublin, on Monday, in consequence of a proclamation from the Lord-Lieutenant prohibiting the intended assemblage of the Council of 300 and the enrolment of a National Guard.

Serious disturbances took place at Limerick on last Saturday evening, in consequence of Mr. Mitchell, who has so often thrilled the memory of O'Connell, being invited to attend the Young Ireland soirée of the Sarsfield Club. The populace (O.d Irelanders) attacked the building with volleys of stones. Shots were fired by the members of the Club, many of whom attended armed, and it was said (but the rumour wants confirmation) that one man fell pierced by a bullet. The police and military were called out. Mr. Smith O'Brien was seriously injured, and has consigned to bed at Penrhyndeudraeth.

THE PROTESTANT REPEAL ASSOCIATION have issued a temperate and able address to their co-religionists, in which, having declared their principles to be "a determination to avoid mixing religious with political questions; the protection of vested interests; loyalty to the Queen: and, as a necessary consequence, opposition to Republican principles, so far as concerns our own country they proceed to remove the objections which the Protestants might still entertain towards a repeal of the union, and state, in conclusion:—"We claim the right of appointing, collecting, and controlling our own revenues, of regulating our own internal affairs; in a word, of minding our own business in our own country. This we shall continue to demand, and this we are convinced we shall obtain."

ENTHRONIZATION OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

THE PORTRAIT

THE most Reverend Father in God, John Bird Sumner, D.D., Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1780; and after completing his education on the foundation at Eton, became in due course a Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. In 1800 he gained the prize for the Latin Ode. Being afterwards appointed Librarian to the King, he was directed by George IV. to publish the original Latin and to translate into English a treatise of Milton on Christian Doctrine. This interesting work was discovered among a heap of documents at the Record Office. We cannot say that it added much to the reputation of the poet.

In 1820 Dr. Sumner became Canon of Durham; and in 1828 was elected to the see of Chester. For almost twenty years he faithfully discharged the duties of his office. He consecrated, in that period, nearly two hundred new churches, a great number of which owed their erection to his own zealous exertions. In addition to his public employments, he found leisure to publish more writings than any other member of the Episcopal bench. Besides charges and occasional sermons, he obtained the prize of nearly £4000 for his "Treatise on the Records of the Creation." His "Apostolical Preaching considered" has passed through numerous editions. "The Evidences of Christianity" has met with similar success; and his Expositions on the Four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, and some of the Epistles of St. Paul, have stamped his character as a theologian.

The following lines appeared in a contemporary journal soon after the Election:—

TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY ON HIS ELECTION.

Whom shall I seek for HOWLEY'S vacant chair?
What mind of Intellect, what man of Pray'r?
Where many claim 'tis difficult to choose—
Where parts are equal which can I refuse?
Thus may have thought the Queen's superior mind,
Just in her sway, and in her motives kind.
When the good spirit, reft of whose wise aid,
King's thoughts are foolish, and their aims betray'd, Whisper'd—"The chair to pious SUMNER give;
In him shall TILLOTSON and SECKER live."

Go, chosen man! by bright example teach,
Reason like Paul, like Holy James beseech;
So at thy word shall England's Church rejoice,
And bless their Monarch's virtue in her choice.

THE PROCESSION.

This Engraving shows the Procession entering the Choir from the Nave, up the noble flight of steps, through the enriched stone screen—a magnificent work of the fourteenth century.

THE ENTHRONIZATION.

THE ancient Cathedral of Canterbury, the metropolitan see of all England, was, on Friday week (April 28), the scene of the impressive ceremony of the Enthronization of the newly appointed Primate. No Archbishop having been enthroned in person since Archbishop Wake, in 1716, as anticipated, the demand for admission was very great, and many persons who did not apply early for tickets were deprived of the gratification of witnessing the interesting proceedings. The weather was showery; but long before the appointed hour for the commencement of the service, the Green Court and adjacent streets were filled with carriages, admission to the choir being obtainable by that entrance. For this purpose 1038 tickets were issued, besides a considerable number for the reserved seats and gallery over the west screen; yet a great number of applications were unavoidably refused. On the opening of the doors, every available part of the choir was instantly filled. Most of the nobility, gentry, and clergy of this division of the county, and many of West Kent, were present. The Mayor of Canterbury, with other members of the Town Council, went in procession with the mace, and were afterwards joined by the Recorder, who wore his robes.

To preserve order, those provided with tickets were present half an hour before the time of Divine Service, after which there was no ingress. This and other means taken to promote the accommodation of the visitors were highly creditable to the Hon. Daniel Finch, whose anxiety and efforts had been unceasing, that, while affording accommodation to the utmost possible extent, nothing should arise to disturb the arrangements and quiet fitting for so solemn an occasion.

The Dean and Canons met in the Audit-room, at half-past ten o'clock, when the mandate for the enthronization was produced, on which it was, at the request of the Archdeacon Croft, decreed to proceed forthwith. The Archbishop, attended by the Dean and Canons, and the Six Preachers, then proceeded to the cloisters. Here a procession was formed by the Masters of the King's School, the King's Scholars, Choristers, Lay Clerks, Minor Canons, Six Preachers, Auditor, and Canons; the Archdeacons immediately preceding the Archbishop, and the Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, and the Dean and Sub-Dean of the Province supporting his Grace, two on his right and two on his left hand. The Bishop of Litchfield acted as proxy for the Bishop of London, Dean of the Province. The Bishop of Winchester, the Sub-Dean, attended in person. The Archbishop was also attended by his two chaplains and train-bearer. The procession advanced through the nave between two lines formed by the clergy of the diocese in their gowns; the choir chanting the 145th, 146th, and 150th Psalms to a fine old Gregorian melody; and entered the choir chanting "Gloria Patri," followed by the "Hallelujah Chorus;" the effect of which was most sublime. Mr. Jones presided at the organ.

On entering the choir, the procession filed off on each side, to enable the Archbishop to pass up the middle aisle to the Communion table, on the right of which he seated himself, with his two chaplains, while the Dean and Sub-Dean of the Province took their seats on the left of the table. The Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, and the Archdeacon, then returned to their stalls, and the other parties having taken their respective places, the service was begun by the Rev. F. Rouch, Minor Canon. The "Venite" was chanted to Tallis's, and the Psalms to two Gregorian chants. The lessons were read by the Rev. R. Moore, one of the Canons

At the end of the first lesson, the Archdeacon proceeded from his stall to conduct the Archbishop, attended by the Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, and his Grace's chaplains, to the throne: when the Vicar-General presented to the Archdeacon the mandate of enthronization, and requested him to proceed. The Auditor, the Hon. D. Finch, then read the mandate, and the Archdeacon the subjoined form of "induction:"

"I, James Croft, Master of Arts, Archdeacon of Canterbury, do induct, install, and enthrone you, the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bird Sumner, Doctor in Divinity, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, into the Archbishopric and Archiepiscopal Dignity of the see of Canterbury, and into the real, actual, and corporal possession of the same, with all and singular the rights, dignities, honours, preeminences, and appurtenances thereof, and the Lord preserve your going out and your coming in, from this time forth for evermore. Amen."

After which the Archbishop remaining in his throne, the Dean, Vice-Dean, and Archdeacon returned to their stalls. The service then proceeded with the "Benedicite" to Purcell's chant; and the "Benedicta" was by Orlando Gibbons. The anthem was the following prayer by Farrant:

"Lord, for thy tender mercy's sake lay not our sins to our charge, but forgive that is past, and give us grace to amend our sinful life; to decline from sin and incline to virtue, that we may walk in a perfect heart before thee now and evermore."

Tallis's Litany was chanted by the Rev. J. Stratton, Precentor, and the Rev. G. P. Marriott, accompanied by the organ. At the conclusion of the morning service, the Dean and Sub-Dean of the Province descended from the altar and, accompanied by the Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, conducted the Archbishop from his throne to the ancient patriarchal marble chair placed in front of the communion rails; whereon the Archbishop being seated, the Archdeacon repeated the form as above, but addressing his Grace as Archbishop of the Province, inducted him into the Archiepiscopric and Metropolitical dignity of the See of Canterbury. A distinction was thus made between the induction of the Archbishop at the throne, as Diocesan, and his induction at the marble chair, as Primate and Archbishop of the Province; and, on this account, the representative of the Provincial Dean and the Provincial Sub-Dean assisted in this part of the ceremony.

The Dean and Sub-Dean of the Province then returned to the communion table; the Archdeacon, attended by the Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, conducted the Archbishop to the Dean's stall; and, while seated there, the Archdeacon said:—

"I, James Croft, Master of Arts, Archdeacon of Canterbury, place you, the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bird Sumner, Doctor in Divinity, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, in this stall or seat, in sign and token of your taking and having real and actual possession of the See of Canterbury, and of all the rights and privileges thereof."

The Archbishop remained in the Dean's stall, and the Archdeacon having returned to his stall, there was sung Mendelssohn's "Te Deum" in A; a very striking and powerful composition, which was performed with great accuracy and effect, and with which the Archbishop was so much gratified, that he requested it might be again performed on the following Sunday.

The Archdeacon next read the following suffrages, the choir chanting the answers.

"O Lord, save thy servant our Bishop,
Ans. Who putteth his trust in thee.

THE PATRIARCHAL CHAIR.

ENTHRONIZATION OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Send him help from Thy holy place,
Ans. And evermore mightily defend him.
Let the enemy have no advantage against him,
Ans. Nor the wicked approach to hurt him.
Be unto him, Lord, a strong tower,
Ans. From the face of the enemy.
O Lord, hear our prayers,
Ans. And let our cry come unto thee."

And after the suffrages, the Archdeacon read the following prayer:

"Almighty God, the giver of all good things, who by thy Holy Spirit has appointed divers orders of ministers in thy Church; mercifully behold thy servant John Bird Sumner, who is now admitted to the high office and dignity of Archbishop of this province, and so replenish him with the truth of thy doctrine, and adorn him with innocency of life, that both by word and deed he may faithfully serve thee in this office to the glory of thy name, and to the edifying and well-governing of thy Church. Grant, we beseech thee, that he may long live happily to rule this Church, and that, having worthily fulfilled his course, at the latter day he may receive the crown of righteousness laid up by the Lord the Righteous Judge, who liveth and reigneth one God with the Father and the Holy Ghost world without end. Amen."

The Archbishop then pronounced the blessing from the Dean's Stall, which ended the service.

The Choristers, Lay Clerks, Minor Canons, Schoolmasters, six Preachers, Auditor, &c., next left the choir, by the north door, in procession, followed by the Archdeacon, the Archbishop, the Dean and Vice-Dean of the Cathedral, and the Dean and Sub Dean of the province, to the Chapter House, where, the Archbishop being placed in the chief seat, the Archdeacon said:

"Most Reverend Father in God, I, James Croft, Archdeacon of Canterbury, assign and appoint this seat to you, as Lord Archbishop of Canterbury."

The Archdeacon then administered the following oath:—

"My Lord Archbishop, you swear to maintain the rights and liberties of the Church, and to observe the approved customs thereof, and, as far as it concerns your Grace, to cause the same to be observed by others, so far as such customs are not repugnant to God's Word, the laws, statutes, provisions, and ordinances of the realm, or to her Majesty's prerogative, and not otherwise. So help you God."

Then the Archdeacon said:

"I, James Croft, Archdeacon and Canon of this Church, do promise to pay canonical obedience to your Grace, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, as my Diocesan and Archbishop."

Then the Dean, the other Canons, the Auditor, the Six Preachers, the Schoolmasters, Minor Canons, and Lay Clerks, in like manner, promised canonical obedience.

"I, A. B., as C. of this Church, do promise to pay canonical obedience to your Grace, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, as my Diocesan and Archbishop."

The Archbishop was then conducted to the Audit-room, where an act of the proceedings was produced, and signed by the Dean and Canons, the Precentor, and several other persons who had witnessed the ceremony.

The following members of the Chapter and Clergy of the Cathedral were in attendance, and took part in the proceedings of the day:

The Very Rev. the Dean Lyall.

Canons.—The Rev. Robert Moore, M.A.; Rev. J. H. Spry, D.D., Vice-Dean; Hon. and Rev. J. E. Boscawen, M.A.; Venerable James Croft, M.A., Archdeacon of Canterbury; Rev. J. Russell, D.D.; Rev. F. Dawson, B.D.; Venerable Benjamin Harrison, M.A., Archdeacon of Maidstone; Rev. F. V. Lockwood, M.A.

Six Preachers.—Hon. and Rev. W. Eden, Rev. T. Bartlett, Rev. C. Foster, Rev. W. Vallance, Rev. E. Penny, Rev. W. J. Chesshyre.

Minor Canons.—Rev. W. Bennett, Rev. J. Metcalfe, Rev. G. P. Marriott, Rev. J. Stratton, Rev. F. Rouch, and Rev. W. S. H. Braham.

Schoolmaster.—Rev. G. Wallace.

The Archbishop then returned to the Deanery, where a sumptuous collation was laid out of which many of the nobility and gentry were invited to partake.

THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, JOHN BIRD SUMNER, D.D., LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

SATURDAY.

This day the Archbishop paid several visits; and an address was presented to his Grace from the Town Council of Canterbury, by the Mayor and a deputation, to which the Archbishop returned a gracious answer.

During the morning the parochial clergy of the Deanery of Canterbury had an interview with the Archbishop, at which an address was read by the Rev. W. J. Chesshyre, Rural Dean.

The Archbishop, in his reply, delivered with much feeling, expressed his great gratification at the welcome which he had experienced from the clergy, the assistance of whose prayers he entreated, that he might have strength and power to perform the duties of his responsible station. His Grace then paid a well-merited compliment to the virtues of his amiable and benevolent predecessor, and disclaimed any merit for his own exertions to relieve the spiritual destitution of his former diocese, the wants of which were so great that no Bishop could have acted otherwise than he had done. He trusted that the clergy would always look upon him as a friend, begged that they would communicate with him unreservedly on any points where they wanted advice; and assured them that it would give him sincere pleasure to contribute in any way to their comfort and usefulness.

The Archbishop attended Divine Service at the Cathedral; and in the afternoon paid a visit of inspection to the new Missionary College, accompanied by a large body of the clergy. His Grace has appointed Thursday, the 29th of June, for the day on which to consecrate the Chapel and to open the College. We shall give engravings of the edifices in an early number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

His Grace afterwards, accompanied by the worthy rector, the Rev. W. J. Chesshyre, visited the ancient church of St. Martin, which has recently been so beautifully restored, chiefly by the munificence and taste of the Hon. Daniel Finch. His Grace was pleased to express himself highly gratified with the restoration.

SUNDAY.

On Sunday, the Archbishop preached at the Cathedral. The congregation assembled on the occasion was beyond precedent. Every possible accommodation was afforded by the vergers and other officers, and still a very numerous body were unable to obtain admittance. The text on the occasion was taken from the 3rd chapter of Collosians, the 1st and two following verses:—"If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth, for ye are dead, and your life is hid [with Christ in God." His Grace delivered a most eloquent and impressive discourse. His voice is full and sonorous, and he was distinctly heard in all parts of the sacred edifice.

The Archbishop, who had been staying at the Deanery, a guest of the Very Rev. Dr. Lyall, left Canterbury on Monday morning, by railway, for Lambeth.

The throne newly erected is at the angle formed by the upper transept, on the south side of the choir. The design was by Mr Austen, surveyor to the Cathedral, and by his sons; and the carving was executed partly by English workmen, and partly by men from Belgium and Cologne. It is highly enriched, and bears a general resemblance to many of the shrines in Italy, particularly to one at Verona. The total height is nearly 40 feet, the width at the base about 8 feet, and the cost of its erection about £12.0

PLAN OF THE LATE ENGAGEMENT IN SCHLESWIG.

THE WAR IN SCHLESWIG.

In the late edition of our Journal of last week we gave the intelligence of the engagement of Easter Sunday, the 23rd ult. The accompanying plan, with the following brief description of the locality itself, from the Times correspondent's letter of April 27, will make the accounts of the late operations much more intelligible:

"Schlesw g is a long, straggling town of one street, built round the head, and for some distance along the northern bank of the inlet of the sea called the Schlei. It is neither naturally nor artificially strong, for it is commanded by rising ground behind it, and by no defensive works of any kind towards the water. The celebrated 'Old Dannewirk,' which was the strongest position of the Danish army, being always designated by the German word which means fortification or intrenchment, the journals have been misled as to its true character; and, as the hottest of the conflict took place in front of, and as far as the little hamlet of Bustorf behind it, it may be worth while to describe it exactly. From Bustorf, which may be called a suburb of Schleswig, the road to Rendsburg ascends a hill, part of the belt of rising ground that shuts in Schleswig on the land side; on the brow of this hill, and about a mile from the village, the 'Old Dannewirk' cuts the broad high road at right angles. It is little more than an irregular mound or bank, stretching east and west for two or three miles, overgrown with moss and heath, and scarcely to be distinguished from the open plain around it. The point where it was most essential it should be best defended, where the high road crosses it, and whence the village below and the whole road to the town could be commanded by artillery, is left at this time of the year as the left of the road two large gaps have been worn away in it, through which a troop of cavalry might past abreast at charging pace; and there is not a point as far as the eye can reach, each way, that a 'clever body,' used to a pretty open country, would not gallop over with ease. This is a very different thing from the entrenchment repaired and strengthened by the art of the military engineer, and bristling with cannon, which the various accounts of the action shadowed forth. Nevertheless, it afforded a good position against troops attacking from a wide, open, and level plain, and the Danes made the best use of it, as it was only carried after great loss; but once carried, and artillery brought within it by the main road, defence was no longer possible. The Danes retreated down the hill to Bustorf, where the road turns to the left, into Schleswig, passing out to the north-east, and gaining the open country, marched northward through Angeln to Flensburg. The town has not suffered so much from the cannonade as might have been expected; the only traces of the conflict are in the village of Bustorf; the farm buildings, barns, stables, and dwelling-houses which line the descent of the hill from the Danewerk have the doors and roofs riddled here and there with cannon-balls, and one small house, at the foot of the hill, at the very turn of the road to the left into Schleswig, is knocked almost to pieces.

"So unexpected was the attack of the Prussians, that some of the Danish troops were at church, and were brought out from prayers to fighting by the trumpet call at the church door.

"On the road from Hamburg, northwards, the first signs of a state of warfare are met at Rendsburg, which has been put in a complete state of defence by the Provisionary Government. It is strongly fortified, and is now held by a garrison of Hanoverians.

The following are some of the details by an eye-witness, of the movements of the Danes after retiring from Schleswig: "About three miles beyond the town we cannon some colossally strong works which the Danes had thrown up during the night, but left in the morning. Notwithstanding its rapidity the retreat of the Danes till they reached Hellingbeck was made in good order. Most of their cavalry left the Chaussée and went off on the left very early. The direct road to Flensburg, with a part of the infantry, the rest took another way through Angeln."

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The Earl of Cawdor was the director of the third concert on Wednesday evening, and the selection made was of very unexceptionable selection. The objection we have so often urged, of mixing sacred and secular subjects together, applies, however, to this scheme. The selection from Glück's opera of "Alceste," which contains the finest and most truly grand of Handel's "Sing, O ye Heavens," from the oratorio of "Belshazzar," and the "Cum Sancto Spiritu," from one of Mozart's masses. Why not devote the first part exclusively to sacred music, and the second to secular, and thus avoid jarring gleanings? Care should also be taken to avoid pieces following each other in the same key. Sir Henry Bishop is entitled to so much respect as a composer, that we always feel unwilling to be harsh with him as a conductor; but his besetting sin of dragging the time ought now to be amended, after so many protests directed against his slow system. These concerts are of great value and importance, and every effort we can make to witness their decay; but progress in the order of the day in musical art as well as in the political world, and the signs of the times ought not to be neglected. Madame Castellan had great success in Handel's air, "Lascia ch' io pianga" (although unfortunately interrupted in the middle by the audience rising for the entrance of Prince Albert), and also Paisiello's air, "Il mio ben," from "Nina." Our countrywoman, Miss Miran, was most favourably received at her début at these concerts, singing the duo by Winter, "Vaghi colli," with Madame Castellan, remarkably well. In the air of Dr Arne, "In infancy," her rich tones were likewise duly appreciated, but her phrasing is susceptible of improvement. Without style, the most exquisite organ in the world will not achieve much. Madame Caradori delivered the difficult recitatives of "Alceste" artistically, but her voice is scarcely equal to Glück's impassioned declamation. The music of "Alceste" is wonderfully descriptive, and in the accompaniments might be traced the paternity of Weber's "Freyschütz" incantation. Tamburini's fine singing of Mozart's air, "Per questa bella mano," would have been heard to greater advantage if the conductor had taken it a little quicker. Mr. Lockey, who is greatly improving, sang Purcell's "Come if you dare" with energy; and Mr. H Phillips, although in no voice at present, gave the "Lord have mercy upon me" of Pergolesi with impressiveness. The novelties in addition to the "Alceste," were clever but not striking Choruses by Perpoon and Bacchini. The Duchess of Gloucester and the Duke of Wellington were present. Prince Albert remained until the end of the first part. Her Majesty will honour the fourth Concert, on Wednesday next, with her presence, being under the direction of Prince Albert, whose programme is generally the most interesting event of the series, and who has engaged Mdlle. Alboni, Madame Castellan, Miss Birch, and the Misses A. and M. Williams; Mario, Gardoni, Tamburini, Labarre, Lockey, Wetherlee, and Kench.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—Considerable interest was excited by the scheme of the fourth concert. A new symphony by Spohr, expressly composed for the society; a new concerto by Emile Prudent, the pianist; the appearances of Grisi and Tamburini in the vocal pieces. Mozart's Symphony in E flat (No. 8, Op. 33); Cherubini's overture to "Les Deux Journées," and Beethoven's "Leonora," were altogether attractive items, evincing the spirit and intelligence of the Directors; and a numerous assemblage of amateurs and professors was the result. As is, however, almost usually the case, the novelties proved the least source of gratification; the pianoforte concerto, for instance, was a failure, not on account of any deficiency of exertion on the part of the executant, for Prudent possesses first-rate manual dexterity, and a clear brilliant tone, but owing to the utter worthlessness of the composition, a series of fugitive thoughts in admired disorder, gleaned from the noisy conceptions of Verdi down to the gentle sighing of Balfe. The Symphony of Spohr again, although it won the admiration of musicians, as do all his works, for its marvellous treatment, was too barren of ideas to seize the ear of the general auditory. His themes are neither novel nor exciting; and monotony was the basis of his chromatic mannerisms. The Symphony opens with an introductory adagio in G minor, leading to an allegro in G major, followed by an andante in C minor, heavy and gloomy, scarcely relieved by the accompaniment of a scherzo in G minor, in which a very intricate violin obligato in E flat, played by Blagrove, was neither fish, flesh, nor fowl. The finale in G major is most elegantly scored, but the subject lacked interest. The entire work gave the impression of a very laboured effort, and not that of an inspired musician. The clearness and transparency of Mozart's ideas, and the dramatic and majestic grandeur of Beethoven, were grateful comforts after Spohr, the audience encoring the lovely Minuet and Trio in the Symphony, and the Overture with rapture, such was the electric effect of the playing, the first violins coming in with astounding power and precision. The effect of the trumpet bit, played outside the room (by Mr T. Harper, jun.), was very remarkable. The reception of the great Italian artistes was most ardent, both by band and auditory. Tamburini was not in good voice; but sang the "Lieta vola," from Mercadante's "Zaira," with musician-like skill. Grisi gave the "Quando rubarver," from Mercadante's "Briganti;" and the cavatina "Dall' sulla," by Costa, introduced formerly in the opera of "The Siege of Corinth," with fire and brilliancy. The duo "Se la vita," from "Semiramide," between Grisi and Tamburini, was greatly applauded. The fifth concert will be on the 15th of May.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—The programme of the third meeting, on Tuesday afternoon at Willis's Rooms, opened with Mozart's lovely quartet in E, No. 1 of the set of six dedicated to Haydn, in which Molique played the first violin in the most finished style, and was ably sustained by Deloffre, second violin; Hill, tenor, and Piatti, violoncello. Mendelssohn's quintet in A major, op. 18, was executed by the same artists, with the addition of Mr. A. Mellon, as tenor. M Billet, a pianist of great Continental fame, made his début in Beethoven's trio in D, for piano, violin (Molique), and violoncello (Piatti). M. Billet is a fine classical player. The Duke of Cambridge and a host of aristocratic amateurs were present.

MR. G. CASE'S SOIREES MUSICALES.—The first of these Concerts took place last Wednesday, at Willis's Rooms, where one of the small salons was on that occasion filled with a respectable and attentive audience. The peculiar feature at this Concert, as of those that are to follow, is a concerted performance on a number of concertinas, an improved species of accordion. The effect is extremely agreeable, producing most perfect harmony. We shall be glad to hear the experiment repeated next week. The vocal portions of the Concert were confined to Signor and Madame Lablache, the latter of whom sang an air of Kalkwoda, a composer hitherto little known in this country, but whose charming compositions are great favourites in Germany.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—The Noblemen's Catch Club dined on Friday at the Thatched House.—The 62nd and last meeting for the season of the Glee Club will take place this evening (Saturday), Sir Felix Booth in the chair.—At the 4th Concert of the Amateur Musical Society, a very clever symphony by Mr. Lucas, the conductor and violoncello player, was performed.—The Cecilian Society performed on Thursday night Mozart's seventh Mass, and Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum."—Mr. G. Cass gave a Musicale at the Beethoven Rooms on Wednesday; and Mr. Curtis had a Concert at Greenwich, introducing Signor Briccialdi, a new flute player.—On Tuesday night, will be given, at the Hanover Rooms, the annual Concert of the Royal Society of Female Musicians, a most exalted institution. The Directors of the Royal Italian Opera have given permission to Alboni and Mdme. Castellan to assist in this attraction, with Mdme. Thalon and the élite of our native talent, including Misses Birch, Rainforth, Dolby, Bassano, S. Novello, Steele, Duval, Mr. Sims Reeves, Lockey, Weis, Stagnus, &c., and a pianoforte duo by Dr. Wesley and Aldercron and his son, cannot fail to secure a great attendance in aid of the funds.—On Wednesday, the fourth Ancient Concert, and Blagrove's first Quartet Concert at the Mortimer Rooms.—On Friday, the Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Mendelssohn's "Elijah;" and on the same evening the second concert at the Royal Italian Opera, at which Charles Halle, the pianist, will make his first appearance in England. Italian opera on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, at Her Majesty's and Royal Italian Theatres.—English opera at the Princess' Theatre every evening.—It is calculated that there are 80 pianoforte players arrived from the Continent for the season in London: the solo cornists, flautists, violoncellists, &c., are also in great force.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert has composed a Chorale, which will be executed on Saturday the 29th inst., at the christening of the infant Princess.

THE SOCIETY OF ARTS' Free Exhibition of British Manufactures closed with great éclat on Wednesday evening. On that occasion the rooms were placed at the disposal of the Duchess of Somerset and Lady Seymour, the countess of Shaftesbury, and other noble ladies, who invited the guests, and a most brilliant assemblage was the result. The dull old Adelphi was quite alive with the bustle of carriages, as aristocrats and commoners alike thronged. The Exhibition itself has been most successful: it has been visited by above seventy thousand persons; and during the last week upwards of twenty thousand persons were disappointed of admittance owing to the crowds. This exhibition has been practically free to all classes, from the Prince Consort, the President, to the humblest mechanic. The good it will do to manufactures can scarcely be over-estimated.

THE DRAMA AND LITERATURE OF FRANCE.

A letter dated the 14th ult., written by a solicitor from the prison at Furnes (Belgium) to his friends in London:—"Between Dunkirk and Ostend the police inquired for my passport, and because I had not one I was marched off between two soldiers to prison, where I am likely to be till Tuesday, when, in all probability the authorities here will hear from the British Consul at Brussels. You may guess my present place of confinement is not very agreeable, being one fined in the same room with the other prisoners. A gentleman from Flanders was brought here yesterday for not having a passport. Since the Revolution in France they are become very strict." The above is only one of several similar cases which have lately taken place; and, in fact, Belgium has now become very strict in enforcing the production of passports.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

"Il Barbiere" was performed at this theatre both on Saturday and Tuesday with two important alterations in the cast, namely, the restoration of the elder Lablache to the part now essentially his own, that of Doctor Bartolo, and the substitution of the new tenor Labocetta for Gardoni in that of Count Almaviva. Signor Labocetta possesses a very high tenor voice, which, by its remarkable sweetness, compensates for the want of physical power which is sometimes perceptible. His singing of the first beautiful air, "Ecco ridente in ciel," was admirable, as he combines true taste and feeling for music with great flexibility and ease, decided requisites for the due rendering of all Rossini's music, but more especially for that of "Il Barbiere," which in this respect is admirably suited to Labocetta's quality of voice. His acting is good, especially in the scene of the music lesson, where he impersonated to perfection, by turns, the obsequious pupil of Don Basilio and the ardent lover.

Of the other performers in this opera we need not speak, as it would only be to repeat the admiration we have before expressed: we must, however, in justice, note the decided improvement in Mdlle Cruvelli's style of singing shown on Tuesday evening, when, having laid aside the too great vehemence and too abrupt transitions—often the defects of the pupils of the Verdi school, and of which she is at times guilty—she sang with a softness and delicacy of tone which delighted everyone.

The first appearance of Mademoiselle Jenny Lind this season, and the announcement of her Majesty's intention to honour it with her presence, assembled on Thursday night the most brilliant galaxy of rank and fashion that can be met with even in this theatre. Domestic, as well as political events, invest the Queen at this moment with more than ordinary interest, and her reception must have been intensely gratifying to her. Repeated calls were made for her to show herself, and at the end of the first act of the Opera her Majesty arose, and acknowledged the enthusiastic cheering. The company then came forward; Lablache, descending from the private box in which he had been sitting, joined the other singers; and "God save the Queen" was sung, the entire audience standing. Never was a greater demonstration of loyalty exhibited. Mdlle. Jenny Lind received her share of the enthusiasm of the night; she was cheered at every possible moment, and it required all the influence of the quieter portion of the audience to preserve silence during the most beautiful portion of the opera. The last scene only seemed to impress some of the audience sufficiently to keep them quiet. We imagined Mdlle. Lind to be a little fatigued or agitated, for in the first scene her voice was uncertain; but in the following scenes she recovered herself and sang as charmingly as ever. Gardoni suffered evidently from a severe cold, and the rest of the performance requires no notice, being as nearly as possible the same as last year.

Mdlle. Lind was called for twice at the end of each act, when the stage was covered with bouquets.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The long-promised performance of "La Cenerentola" took place at this house last Tuesday, introducing Mdlle. Alboni to a London audience in a part in which she has had great success in Paris. She proved on Tuesday to all present that so far from her powers being impaired since her departure from hence last autumn, as was absurdly asserted, she was never in better voice, or appeared more eager to impart pleasure to her audience. Her performance was one continued triumph; from the first view of her as Cinderella, from the first gush of liquid notes, in the half plaintive, half joyous "Una volta c'era un re," to the concluding "Non più mesta," all inspired the audience with a perfect enthusiasm for the gifted singer. Whether in solemn patriotic strains, as Tancredi, in young lovelorn agony, as Romeo; or in the fiend but beautiful music written for this part by Rossini, in the beginning of his career as a composer, Alboni is equally charming in all. While hearing her you forget that "La Cenerentola" was originally written for a soprano, or that her figure is not exactly calculated to represent the gifted favourite of the good fairy: all minor matters are swallowed up in the pure delight inspired by her voice. The music is exuberant in fioriture, giving her ample opportunities for shewing the consummate scientific skill with which she executes the most difficult bravura passages, as well as the extraordinary flexibility of her voice. She was most rapturously received, and the encores were more frequent than they ought to have been, considering her arduous task and her late indisposition. She was called before the curtain between the acts, and at the conclusion of the opera was, much to her discomfiture, we observed, she was compelled to receive the shouts of applause unsupported by her companions Signor Tamburini, notwithstanding a severe cold, acquitted himself admirably in the part of Dandini, which he has long made his own. Savi sang well as the real Prince, but his acting wants vigour; Rovere shows in Don Magnifico that he is indeed a buffo, albeit a little too broad for an English audience; and the failure of the piece must be attributed to some error of the management if he be placed in a false position by having to appear as Leporello, the music of which part is decidedly above his best, and which London audiences have so recently spelt by Lablache as to bear patiently hearing mangled. The weak parts in the cast, on the present occasion, were the Wicked Sisters. Some of the music given to them is very good, and they bear an important part in the concerted pieces, so that the inferiority of the ladies representing them created a sad vacuum. We think that in so numerous and excellent a company as that united at Covent-garden, better representatives for these obnoxious parts might and ought to have been found. The house was very full.

On Thursday "La Donna del Lago" was produced.

Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia will make her first appearance at this theatre on Tuesday next, in "La Sonnambula."

ST JAMES'S. M HOUDIN

The old saw that teaches us "one story good until another is told," may be parallelled by saying "one conjurer is clever until another is seen:" for, much as we have thought of MM Dobler, Philippe, Hermann, &c., we must confess that M. Robert-Houdin is superior to any of them. He has for a long time enjoyed a Parisian reputation, and is the originator of most of the clever tricks with which we have been made acquainted by other "wizards:" none of whom, however, perform them with the same inimitable dexterity. From a very good programme, the best experiments were those called "The Fans and Cannon-balls," "Robert-Houdin's Portfolio," and "Autrol and Dubureau." The last, which was entirely mechanical, was a clever pantomime of two dolls closely representing the Clown at the Circus and the late Pierrot at the Funambules, whose life-like antics, when apparently left entirely to themselves, caused the greatest diversion. The "Second Sight" was also exhibited, and the performance concluded with the "Suspension Ethérienne," of which we gave a detailed account some weeks ago. The child appeared supported in the air, at right angles to a walking stick, as at the Harmonic. The trick is of Indian origin, and has been practised for many years by the wandering jugglers of Hindostan and China. The performance gave the greatest satisfaction to a very elegant audience, and we expect M. Robert-Houdin will create some sensation.

LYCEUM

A two-act comic drama, called the "Schoolmaster," brought out here on Monday, is a translation of the French one by Mr. Bunhouse de Cordier," and is certainly amusing, as everything must be in which Mr. Buckstone plays: but has scarcely sufficient interest in it for its length: the action being barely enough for the shortest one-act farce. The cast included Mrs Stirling, Mr. T. Thomas and Mr. Selby, with the gentleman above-named, and it is done very justice to, but we do not think that it will achieve any very great popularity. The dresses, of the last century, are in perfect character, and the getting up, generally, unexceptionable. The applause at the end of the piece was unqualified.

In consequence of a severe domestic calamity, Madame Vestris was prevented from playing on Monday; and the burlesque on "Thesens and Ariadne" was taken by Mrs. Leigh Murray, who, upon a short notice, contrived to learn all the words, and sing nearly all the music most creditably. The house was quite filled, not a seat being vacant in the dress circle after the commencement of the extravaganza.

HAYMARKET.

The farce of "Lola Montes" was suddenly withdrawn from the bills at the beginning of the week, to the astonishment of all who had witnessed its complete success, until they heard that the Lord Chamberlain had prohibited its future performance—it was said, on the representation of the Bavarian Minister.

On Tuesday, in its place, a trifle was brought out, called "A Confidence," which, although neatly written, is too slight to do much service to the theatre. It is translated from the French one of Mons. Scribe's vaudeville setting forth the lights and shadows of married life, which abound in the Maguera Theâtral, and which require the most finished style of acting to keep them from becoming tiresome and monotonous. It cannot be denied that it is at the Haymarket, and will answer its purpose until a piece of more decided point is found to take its place. Its reception was perfectly favourable.

THE OLYMPIC

An apropos farce, called "The Special," and written by the editors of "The Man in the Moon," who have undertaken the revival of many favourite pieces, with a new and humorous point, was brought out at this house on Wednesday evening, with entire success. Strict probability and polished writing are not so much looked for in bouffonerie of this kind as a rapid succession of comical situations arising from the events which suggest the piece; and, if the unceasing laughter of the audience be taken as the criterion of excellence in this respect, then the authors of "The Special" must be perfectly content with their success.

The dialogue is very smart, and abounds in humourous allusions, and the dress on the bills, of the "Specials" badge and staff, associates the piece at once with the present time of April. The principal part is played by Miss Kate Howard, to the great satisfaction of the habitues of the Olympic. We have no doubt that "The Special" will reverse his duty, and cause large crowds to assemble together—in the theatre—instead of dispersing them.

A piece called "Domestic Bliss" met with anything but a happy reception at the Princess', on Wednesday evening.

The drama of "The Three Red Men," about which all the minor theatres are busy, is the translation of a heavy piece, "La Fils du Diable," played last September at the Ambigu Comique, and founded on a novel of the same name by M. Paul Féval, an author who, under the name of "Sir Francis Trollope," wrote an eight-volume romance called "Les Mystères de Londres," without ever having been here, abounding in amusing mistakes.

THE NEW REFORM PARTY.

During the Easter h[illegible]s a meeting of M.P.'s and others connected with this political body held a private meeting in Manchester, at which it was resolved that th[illegible] following circular should be addressed to most of the parties who had given the [illegible] support to the great free-trade movement:—

"3, Newall's-buildings, Manchester, April 27, 1848.

"Dear Sir, A number of gentlemen have met here to day to consider what steps should be taken to promote a cordial union of all classes of Reformers in favour of an improvement in our mode of Parliamentary representation. They feel that increasing public expenditure and increasing taxation are causes of the deepest anxiety, and they doubt the possibility of any permanent remedy being applied while the tax-payers have so little power. A reform of Parliament, which would exclude the most parts excluded from direct influence in Parliament. I have been requested to address this circular to you to ascertain how far you think the establishment of the franchise to all householders with the protection of the ballot, the more equal distribution of the electoral power by means of electoral districts, and the shortening of the duration of Parliaments to a period not exceeding three years, would afford a system of representation such as the middle classes, now partially enfranchised, would generally acquiesce in, and which the unenfranchised classes would accept as a substantial admission in their legitimate place in the Constitution. I shall be glad also to know whether you think that at the present time a movement is desirable in favour of the changes I have indicated, and if you are disposed to co-operate with an association founded for the purpose of promoting them. I shall be glad also to know what, so far as you have ascertained, is the prevailing feeling of the inhabitants of your town or district on the subjects to which I have referred. The replies to this circular will not be published; and I will thank you to favour me with an answer at your earliest convenience.

"I am, dear Sir, faithfully yours, "GEORGE WILSON."

It is also intended that district meetings on the same subjects shall be immediately held in Manchester, in order that public opinion in that town shall be clearly ascertained. Liverpool, Leeds, and other populous towns in the north are expected to follow the example thus set by Manchester.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.—The preparations continue to be forwarded as quickly as possible. On Tuesday, at Woolwich, the Enterprise, Capt. Sir James Clarke Ross, took on board a cargo of provisions consisting of prepared potatoes, boiled mutton, pork, beef, peas, and other preserved victuals, with a large supply of flour, oatmeal, and biscuits. The quantities of provisions taken on board the Enterprise and Investigator will not only be amply sufficient for the officers and crews of these vessels, but they will also have plenty to spare for the officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror, should they be so fortunate as to meet with any of the parties who proceeded to the Arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin. Captain Sir James Clarke Ross is indefatigable in ensuring that every preparation is made for the comfort of his officers and crew, who are a fine body of hardy men. The vessel has been greatly strengthened by projecting timbers of considerable thickness, gradually rising from below her water line, and the interior has been fitted with pipes to circulate hot water through all parts of the vessel. A roof similar to the roof of a dwelling-house is constructing at Blackwall for each of the vessels, to be put up on deck between the masts, in the event of having to winter in the Arctic regions, and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have afforded every facility for the comfort of every person to be engaged in the expedition in search of Captain Sir John Franklin, and the officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House re-assembled on Monday, after the Easter recess.

THE WEST INDIES.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the House resolve itself into a committee of supply for the purpose of granting £5960 to defray the advances made for the purpose of relieving destitute persons in the island of Tobago, consequent upon the hurricane of last year, which had desolated that island. The motion was agreed to.—After a short discussion, a further grant of £34,003 l., way of loan to the planters of Tobago, to enable them to restore their properties to the state in which they were previous to this visitation, was also agreed to. The right hon. Baronet next proposed that a sum not exceeding £200,000 be granted to defray the expense of the transport of labourers from the East Indies to the colonies of Trinidad and Guiana.—A debate on this proposition ensued, in the course of which Mr. HUME moved, on the ground that the money had been spent without first having received the sanction of the House, that the vote be postponed until the committee of inquiry into the state of the West Indian colonies should have made its report.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER intimated that he had proposed the sum of £200,000, thinking it better to avoid occupying the time of the Committee by long discussions, when one would suffice; but, rather than go to a division, he would take a vote for £170,000: this amended proposition being received with loud cheers. Mr. HUME again interposed, contending that it was unconstitutional for any Colonial Secretary, as had been the case in the present instance, to pledge the House of Commons to the payment of £200,000, without its sanction. As a matter of principle, therefore, and in order that time might be given for the consideration of the papers in reference to the subject, he moved that the Chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he could not accede to this proposition. The money had been actually voted by the Colonial Legislature, and would eventually have to be repaid by the colonies in question.—The Committee divided. For the grant of £170,000, 76; against, 21: majority in favour of the grant, 55.

IRELAND.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then, in an explanatory speech, in reference to the public works carried on in Ireland during the last two years by means of loans and grants made for that purpose, moved for powers to re-advance any sum not exceeding three years' instalments, or £945,000, limiting the re-advance in all cases to the amount actually repaid into the Exchequer for the purpose of continuing the public works already commenced, with the view of giving employment to the people during the ensuing autumn and winter; which motion, after a short discussion, was agreed to.

THE BILL.—On the House resuming, Sir G. GREY, in a speech declaratory of the necessity which existed for the adoption of the measure, proposed the second reading of the Removal of Aliens Bill.—Sir W. MOLESWORTH, on the ground that the powers proposed to be conceded by the bill had not been required to be granted in the most dangerous period of English history, and that they were exceptional in every point of view in which they could be considered, moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. The speakers in favour of the amendment were Lord D. Stuart, Mr. W. J. Fox, Mr. Urquhart, Mr. Hume, Dr. Bowring, and Mr. Ewart. The subsequent debate, in addition to the right hon. mover, the Attorney-General, Mr. H. Drummond, Lord Arundel and Surrey, and Captain Harris. On a division, the second reading was carried by a majority of 119: the numbers, 141 to 22.—The Lords' Amendments to the Election Recognisances Bill were then agreed to.

THE FRANCHISE (IRELAND).—Sir W. SOMERVILLE obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate the elective franchise, and for the registration of parliamentary electors in Ireland. The principal features of the measure being to abolish the existing franchises requiring occupation, and in lieu thereof to adopt the more simple principle of being rated to the relief of the poor in the net annual value [illegible] and upwards, and that the [illegible] should [illegible] to equalize the several parties. With regard to registration, it was proposed that the clerks of Poor Law Unions should transmit to the Clerks of the Peace, annually, lists of the parties rated in the different baronies, who would add the names of the owners, and, upon publication, this would be the list of voters. It was not intended to interfere with the qualifications in towns as at present existing, further than to make the test of having paid the poor-rates only a necessary consequence for the exercise of the franchise. The right hon. baronet also obtained leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of additional polling places in wards in towns in Ireland, and for limiting the period for holding elections in counties to two days.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER also obtained leave to bring in a bill extending the period for five years within which repayment is to be made of the hurricane loans to the West India Islands. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

There being only twenty-five Members present at five o'clock, the House stood adjourned to Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House of Commons met at twelve.

THE RIOTS IN LIMERICK.—Sir G. GREY, in reply to Mr. Hamilton, stated that he had received official information of the fact that Messrs. Smith O'Brien, Mitchell, and Meagher owed their personal safety, when the meeting called by the attorney was attacked by the people of Limerick, to the interposition of the military and police, which announcement was received with cheers.

THE FAILURE TO MAKE A HOUSE.—The subject of the "no House" of Tuesday was [illegible] the attendance of Members at 4h. 45m. it [illegible] on the one hand that it was the business of the Government to take care that a sufficient number of members were present to make a House, and on the other that the responsibility of doing so did not rest with them.—Mr. HORSMAN urged that a systematic attempt to prevent the House from meeting had been made. As the House had consented to give up Thursday to the Government in consequence of the pressure of public business, the least that could be expected from them in return was that they should take measures to make a House on the only day that was now left for independent motions to be brought forward. Sir G. GREY denied that any systematic attempt, as alleged, had been made on the part of Ministers to prevent forty members being present at four o'clock on Tuesday. The Government was desirous of doing justice to the subject, but the bringing forward of independent motions, but it was too much to expect ministers to charge themselves with the duty of making a House for them.—Sir J. WALMSLEY thought it due to Mr. M'Gregor (whose motion respecting the customs stood first upon the paper on the day in question) to state, that that honourable member was down at the House and in the library looking for members to make the House, at 4.30 time the Speaker took the chair and counted. The subject then dropped. The Poor Removal and the Joint Stock Companies Bill passed through Committee.

SMALL DEBTS.—Mr. B. COCHRANE moved the second reading of the Small Debts Bill, its object being the simplification of the law with respect to the powers given to judges of county courts to imprison debtors, and also to prevent debtors so imprisoned from being put on the felons' side of the prison. The Attorney General opposed the bill, as calculated to interfere with the due security of the creditor, and moved that it be read a second time that day six months, which proposition, after a short debate, was agreed to, and the bill was consequently lost.

THE GREAT YARMOUTH FREEMEN DISFRANCHISEMENT BILL was also committed.—Mr. A. STAFFORD, who strongly opposed the measure, having moved that the Chairman report progress, the committee divided: for the motion, 16; against, 107. The bill then passed through committee. Mr. HUME asked, by motion on the effect of the measure would be to increase the number of electors, whether the government would consent to reduce the franchise from £10 to £5 in this borough, with a view to replace the void occasioned by the disfranchisement of the freemen.—Lord J. RUSSELL was understood to say he did not think it would be expedient to introduce any such clause into the bill.

STAMFORD ELECTION.—Mr. W. P. WOOD intimated that, as the opportunity had been afforded him by the government, he should bring the subject of the proceedings at the Stamford election before the house on Friday week.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their Lordships met for the purpose of further adjourning their recess.

AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.—Lord BROUGHAM gave notice, for the 18th inst., of a motion on this subject, which should embrace the whole subject of the state of the legislature and law of this country, and the administration.

The BISHOP of LLANDAFF gave notice of his intention to move for leave to bring in a bill to impose limits to the time during which livings in the gift of the Crown might be kept vacant. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Lord MANDEVILLE was introduced by Mr. FREWEN and Sir R. INGLIS, and took the oaths and his seat for Bewdley.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.—Mr. HORSMAN inquired if any steps had been taken to furnish a residence to the Bishop of Manchester in his diocese?—Sir G. GREY replied that no steps had yet been taken by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for that purpose.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN.—In reply to Mr. URQUHART, Lord PALMERSTON stated that the Danes and Prussians had each agreed to accept the good offices of Great Britain, with a view to the amicable adjustment of the question in dispute between them; and that communications were now going on between both parties and her Majesty's Government for that purpose.

JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL.

On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

Mr. TRELAWNY moved as an amendment that it be read that day six months. He would resist the Jews with Christian subscription, but he would not give them any vantage ground, by admitting them into a Christian Legislature.

Mr. TALLAMACH supported the bill.

A lengthened discussion ensued, which was brought to a close by Lord J. RUSSELL, who, in an able speech, contended in support of the bill that any persistance in the system of religious exclusion from the Legislature was in direct opposition to the spirit of the constitution and the liberal ideas of the present time.

The House then divided, when the third reading was carried by a majority of 234 to 73.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—Two cases of French Testaments, which are intended for gratuitous distribution by the British and Foreign Bible Society, have arrived by a steamer from Antwerp, and the Lords of the Treasury have given directions to the revenue authorities to permit their delivery free of duty for that purpose.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

GENERAL DALYELL.

MAJOR-GENERAL DALYELL was third son of the late Sir Robert Dalyell, Bart., of Binns, Linlithgowshire, and brother of Sir James Graham Dalyell, the present Baronet. This family of Dalyell represents the ancient Earls of Menteith: its Baronetcy was conferred on the son of one of its most renowned ancestors, the famous Cavalier General Dalyell, Commandant in Scotland during the wars of the Covenant. Robert Dalyell, the subject of this notice, emulated the military reputation of his forefather: he served in the British army during the whole of the late war, from its breaking out to its glorious close in 1815; he obtained much personal distinction at Kioge, at the reduction of Copenhagen, and at Vittoria and Toulouse. Major-General Dalyell died on the 24th ultimo, at an advanced age, at Edinburgh.

HENRY VANSITTART, OF KIRK-LEATHAM, COUNTY YORK.

THE decease of this gentleman took place a few days since. He was only son of the late Henry Vansittart, Esq., nephew of Lord Bexley, and grandson of Henry Vansittart, Governor of Bengal. The extensive estates he possessed in Yorkshire were held in right of his wife, Teresa, second daughter of Charlotte, Viscountess Newcomen, and widow of Sir Charles Turner, Bart. By this lady he had one daughter, Teresa, who wedded, 11th May, 1841, Arthur Newcomen, Esq., of the Royal Horse Artillery.

Mr. Vansittart was a magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant for Yorkshire, and served as its High Sheriff in 1820.

MISS HESTER ROGERS, OF DOWDESWELL COURT, COUNTY GLOUCESTER.

THE decease of this estimable lady occurred at Dowdeswell House, near Cheltenham, on the 18th ult., at the advanced age of eighty-seven. She was the eldest daughter of the Rev. Richard Rogers, LL.B., of Dowdeswell, and inherited her estates from her uncle, Edward Rogers, Esq., in the year 1810.

The family of Rogers, originally of Bryanston, county Dorset, has long been established in Gloucestershire, and seated at Dowdeswell since the reign of Elizabeth. To the memory of one of the Gloucestershire Rogers Dryden wrote the following beautiful epitaph:—

"Of gentle blood, his parent's only treasure,
Their lasting sorrow, and their valued pleasure—
Adorn'd with features, virtues, wit, and grace,
A large provision for so short a race:
More moderate gifts might have prolong'd his date,
Too early fitted for a better state:
But knowing Heaven, his home to shun delay
He kindly here ... and took the nearest way."

Miss Rogers was [illegible] and her manners [illegible] her regretted brother, Richard Rogers Coxwell, Esq., a Magistrate and Deputy-Lieutenant of the county, eldest surviving son of the Rev. Charles Coxwell, of Abbington House, Rector of Dowdeswell, by Anne, youngest sister of the deceased lady.

EMILY ELIZABETH BULWER LYTTON

It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of this young lady, the only daughter of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart., of Knebworth Park, Herts. The melancholy event occurred on Saturday, the 29th ult.

Miss Bulwer Lytton was, through her father, descended from the Bulwers of Norfolk, one of the oldest families in that county, the Robsmons of Gwersyl, and the Norreyses of Speke, as well as from Anne Tudor, sister of Sir Owen Tudor, grandfather of King Henry VII. Through her mother, Rosina Wheeler she deduced descent from the noble house of Massy.

MR. TATE.

MR. WILLIAM TATE was a distinguished author in that valuable branch of literature which relates to commerce and accounts. He wrote several excellent works on exchanges, book-keeping, and arithmetic. He was himself one of the best mathematicians and accountants of the present day, and his demise may be regarded as a loss to the commercial world. One of Mr. Tate's productions was the "Modern Cambist." Mr. Tate departed this life at Charles-square, London, on the 26th ultimo, having just completed his 67th year. Mr. Tate leaves, to deplore his death, a widow and five sons, William, John, Frederick, Henry (of Liverpool), and Edwin; the eldest succeeds him in his business.

THE LITERARY ASSOCIATION OF THE FRIENDS OF POLAND.—The sixteenth annual meeting of the members of this association was held on Wednesday, at Sussex-chambers, Duke-street, St. James's. Lord Dudley Stuart occupied the chair. Lord Beaumont proposed, "That the political aspect of Europe offering at the present moment a fairer promise of the restoration of Poland than at any former period since the formation of this association, the members are now more than ever called upon to fulfil the chief objects of its institution, viz. to furnish the English public with sound information respecting the progress of events in Poland, to urge the justice of her claims to independence, and to point out the benefit that would be derived from its re-establishment, as well by England as by Europe at large." The Rev. Dr. Worthington seconded the resolution, and, after a few observations from Mr. Fyler and Count Valerian Krasinski, the resolution was agreed to. Mr. W. J. Bickbeck, the honorary secretary, then read the report, which stated the income of the association to be something above £1400, arising chiefly from the balls given for the purpose during the season.

INFIRMARY FOR FISTULA AND DISEASES OF THE LOWER INTESTINES.—On Monday, the anniversary dinner of this institution took place at the London Tavern. The Lord Mayor occupied the chair. After the usual loyal and complimentary toasts had been honoured, his lordship called especial attention to the toast of the evening—"Prosperity to the Fistula Infirmary." He observed that the objects of this meritorious Institution well deserved to meet with the decided support, once and to it by the public. Though but in its 19th year of existence, the Infirmary had afforded permanent relief to nearly 3000 sufferers, of whom upwards of 1600 had undergone surgical operations. It was regretted, however, that although the charity had suffered no retrograde movement, yet the accommodation was still far too circumscribed to afford assistance to all who are eligible objects of its solicitude. The governors of the infirmary, therefore, entreated not only a continuance of pecuniary, but also a bestowal upon it of moral support, by enlisting the sympathy of friends and connexions in the praiseworthy cause,—a cause, it was considered, that every one who values the enjoyment of existence, the alleviation of human suffering, and the happiness of his fellow-creatures, is called upon to promote. Sir James Law Lushington, in proposing the health of Mr. Salmon, the founder of the charity, bestowed a warm eulogium on the exertions of that gentleman. Mr Salmon acknowledged the compliment in a graceful address, observing that if his friends and the public would only make their subscription of any services he had been able to afford to the cause of charity and the suffering poor, the best mode they could adopt was to continue their support to the institution. The donations of the evening amounted to nearly £400, which, with the annual subscriptions, made a total sum of about £500 as the produce of the anniversary festival.

A DEPUTATION on the subject of the introduction of railways into Australia, consisting of Mr. S. H. Marsh, Mr. William Prosser, and Mr. John W. Brett, had an interview with Earl Grey, yesterday, at the Colonial-office.

THE IRISH PRELATES IN ROME. Private letters from Rome announce the arrival in that city, on the 16th ult., of his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam and the Right Rev. the Bishop of Ardagh. The Bishop of Cork (Dr. Nicholson) had not, at the date of these letters, arrived in the imperial city. Dr. M'Hale and Dr. O'Higgins were in excellent health.

NEW GRAVING DOCK, AT SOUTHAMPTON.

THE Southampton Dock Company have recently opened another Graving Dock, for the repairs of large ships and steamers of the second class. The length of this Dock, shown in our illustration, is 280 feet, width of gates, 51 feet; and the depth over sill, 14 feet. It is built almost entirely of brick, upon a novel and economical plan, from the designs of Mr. Alfred Giles. The work was contracted for by Messrs. W. Cubitt and Co., the eminent builders, and was completed in less than twelvemonth, at a cost of little more than £19,000.

The accompanying Sketch shews the New Dock in part, active, with another larger Graving Dock adjoining, which was opened in 1846; and the Engine House in the distance.

The Docks at Southampton being the depôt for the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company, and for the Peninsular and Oriental Company, are rapidly increasing their business, and few Ports in the Kingdom afford similar facilities to shipping.

They consist of a Tidal Basin, sixteen acres in extent, with Warehouses round the Quays, and lines of railway leading directly from the South-Western terminus to the water's edge; together with two Repairing Docks, the larger of which has already accommodated the greater part of the Royal Mail, and the Oriental fleet. Workshops for making first-class boilers, and powerful shears capable of lifting fifty tons

Nine years ago a mud bank occupied the site of what may now fairly assume the title of this "National Work."

THE DRAM-DRINKER.—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

CHARACTERS ABOUT TOWN.

DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

THE DRAM-DRINKER

BY THOMAS MILLER.

THERE are few places in London where so great a variety of characters may be seen popping in and out in a short space of time, as at the bars of our modern gin-palaces. Even respectable men who meet each other by chance, after a long absence, must drop in at the nearest tavern, although they have scarcely a minute to spare, to drink a glass together at the bar, and enquire about old friends. Married women, we are sorry to say, many of them the wives of clever mechanics, also congregate here, generally in the morning, when they go to market, and at a time when they ought to be providing the dinner for their families. Such things are thought but little of among those who are far from being numbered with the lowest orders of society. Then there are your itinerant vendors of almost every imaginable thing—these are, also, constant members of the bar, confining themselves generally to pennyworths of gin. The costermongers, who come wheeling and shouting from opposite directions, with their barrows, if they chance to meet near the door of a tavern, must, after a little gossip, go in and have their "drain." Added to these, there are the poor, the old, and the miserable, who look and feel "half-dead," as they themselves express it, unless they are "lighted up" every two or three hours with a glass of spirits. Many of these have become so habituated to drink that they care but little for food, and very rarely partake of a substantial meal: a pennyworth of boiled shell-fish, such as whilks or mussels, an oyster or two, or a trotter, and sometimes a fried fish—all of which are borne into these places by hawkers every hour of the day—may be taken as fair samples of the food consumed by these regular drinkers.

Nor is it at the front of the gaudily fitted-up bars alone where such quantities of spirits are consumed. Women and children even are coming in with bottles; some of the latter so little, that, like the one which our artist has so truthfully sketched, they are scarcely able to reach up and place the bottle upon the zinc-covered bar. If the weather is cold they are generally sent out in their mothers' shawls and bonnets, the one trailing upon the ground, and the other completely burying their little dirty faces. Even these young miserable creatures are fond of drink, and may sometimes be seen slily drawing the cork outside the door, and lifting the poisonous potion to their white withered lips. They have already found that gin numbs and destroys for a time the gnawing pangs of hunger, and they can drink the fiery mixture in its raw state.

Poverty and misery, and a want of the proper necessaries of life, have driven and are still driving hundreds to drink in this vast metropolis. Better food, better wages, and more employment are the only remedies that can be applied to this crying evil. They would sooner disperse a mob than all the police force with their staves. But your downright, thorough dram-drinker is a strongly-marked character. When you have once seen him, you are sure to recognise him again, for he belongs to a class which you are able to identify at a glance. He is generally well known in the places he haunts. He comes in almost noiselessly, invariably rubbing his hands and shrugging up his shoulders, as if very cold. If known, he seldom speaks; a nod on both sides is sufficient; and the accustomed glass is handed to him in silence. But watch the intensity of his countenance while the glass is filling: there is a grim desperate smile all over it, as if he knew that it was slowly killing him, and loved the cause better than the effect. Observe how his hand trembles as he raises it towards his lips, with what silent delight he gulps down the fierce liquor, his eyes apparently closed, so intently are they rivetted upon the glass, watching the last drop as it slowly trickles down the up-turned vessel, and gives a long-drawn "Ah!"—an indefinite kind of interjection expressing something like pleasure or regret, or, it may be, pain. He is generally alone, and seldom exchanges a word with any one.

Sometimes you are inclined to think that he is a man who has seen better days, who has "sat at good men's feasts," who has held some respectable situation: then Charity whispers in your ear that he has met with many troubles, lost or buried all who were once dear to him; that ever of the same Lethe he still drinks, for "his heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains his sense," and he strives in vain to steep his memory in forgetfulness. Or it may be that drink itself was the first cause of all his sorrows—that he began timidly, selecting the most out-of-the-way places at the commencement, and looking cautiously around before he ventured in; and that this stealthy habit of taking his glass still remains unchanged. But few know where he lives, what he does, or in what hidden haunt his time is passed.

Sometimes you fancy that you have seen him in the day-time in the darkest and remotest box of a low coffee-house, as if asleep, with his head resting upon the table, and his face buried in his hands. At others, in a tap-room—but this is in the very last stage of his decay—where he has become a kind of hanger-on—a something less respectable than the pot-boy; and here he is at everybody's "beck and bid," and ready to do anything for this destructive drink. Or he may know a few old friends whom he visits by stealth, and rom whom he occasionally obtains a shilling, only expressing their wonder that he is not yet dead. Perhaps one of these is kind enough to pay for his lodging, a truckle-bed in some dirty attic, where the only misery he finds is retiring to it sober. Even the very cabmen know and pity him, calling him by some peculiar name of their own; and frequently they invite him to drink.

For years he wears the same old suit of clothes; as one garment drops off, another but little better is given to him by some old acquaintance, whom in former days he used to meet in a quiet old-fashioned parlour. When he dies, if buried at all, it is at the expense of the parish; if no one owns him, his remains are often, in the night, borne to some hospital.

MR. FOX.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSON FOX, M.P. for the borough of Oldham, is the son of a Suffolk farmer, who, in after-life, became a cotton-weaver in Norwich. The hon. member was born at Uggeshal farm, near Wrentham, in Suffolk, in 1786, and was educated for the Dissenting Ministry, at Old College, Homerton, under the Rev. J. Pye Smith, D.D. He has since become the Minister of an Unitarian congregation.

MR. J. W. FOX, MEMBER FOR OLDHAM.

MR. FOX has been much before the public, and is well known as a lecturer and political writer of ability. In politics, he professes the extreme of Liberal or Radical opinions. During the Anti-Corn-Law agitation he was a very frequent and also a very able and attractive speaker at the meetings of "the League" in the metropolis. His political profession of faith embraces "Free-Trade" in its fullest extent, separation of Church and State, abolition of religious endowments by the State, &c. Among his most popular productions are his "Letters, chiefly addressed to the Working Classes," 3 vols.; and "Letters of a Norwich Weaver Boy," published in the League newspaper.

ARTISTS' AMATEUR PERFORMANCE OF "THE HEIR-AT-LAW," ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—THE EPILOQUE.

In public speaking, the style of Mr. Fox appears studied and laboured, and full of effort to produce antithetic point; but, despite of his mannerism, he sometimes approaches eloquence.

In 1820 he was married to the daughter of James Florance, Esq., of Chichester, barrister; and was first returned to the Imperial Parliament as member for Oldham, in 1847.

The accompanying Illustration is from the Epilogue, showing nearly the whole of the characters in the "Heir at Law":—

Old Dowlas: Pray, is there no'er a chandler here? because Old Daniel Dowlas axes his applause.

The comedy was well acted throughout; and the farce was equally as successful; Mr. Cruikshank, in Pedrillo, being irresistibly droll. Both pieces were admirably dressed: the Artists, as might be expected, proved themselves proficients in matters of costume.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE Royal Academy Exhibition, opened to the public on Monday last, is the nineteenth annual exhibition since Sir M. A. Shee's election to the office of President; the eleventh since the removal of the academy from Somerset House to the National Gallery; and the ninth since an Octagon Room was opened as a sort of lumber apartment for all sorts of pictures. We could have wished that the Academy had acceded to the recommendation of an anonymous writer in the Times, who recently threw out as a suggestion to the council, that the Octagon Room should cease to be used as a place for the interment of pictures, but should be opened as a refreshment room. The hint, we are assured, was actually made a Council Chamber matter of, but the suggestion was set aside, and the Octagon Room re-opened as before.

The Exhibition (one of average merit) consists of 1474 works of art, contributed by 840 different exhibitors. Ten of the forty Royal Academicians are absentees, viz. the President, Sir M. A. Shee, Mr. J. M. W. Turner (whose yellows and blues are really missed), Mr. R. Cook (who is always absent), Mr. Dyce (the newly elected member), Sir Richard Westmacott (the sculptor), and the five architects, Barry, Smirke, Hardwick, Cockerell, and Deering. Mr. Eastlake exhibits but one picture, No. 92, "An Italian Peasant Family on their way to a Village Festival prisoners with banditti." Mr. Edwin Landseer has five pictures; Mr. Etty, seven; Mr. Herbert, one; Sir William Allan, two; Mr. Hart, two; Mr. Lee, six; Mr. Charles Landseer, two: Mr. Mulready, four (all small); Mr. Maclise, four; Mr. Pickersgill, eight (all portraits), Mr. D. Roberts, three; Mr. Stanfield, five, Mr. Uwins, two; Mr. Webster, two; and Mr Cope, three. All the associates (twenty in number) are exhibitors. Danby has sent two; Redgrave, four; Watson Gordon, five; Creswick, six; Hollins, four Frank Grant, six; Elmore, one; Sidney Cooper, five; Frith, three; E. M Ward, two; Frost, one; Poole, one; and F. R. Pickersgill, two.

All the great works of the year are by the members and associates of the Royal Academy. This used not to be the case, but the Academy has, of late, strengthened its ranks materially by the introduction of as many young men as vacancies would enable them to introduce. Within the last eight years, for instance, the following names have been added to the list of associates:—John Watson Gordon, Thomas Creswick, Frank Grant, C W Cope, W Dyce, W C. Marshall (the sculptor), Alfred Elmore, T. Sidney Cooper, W P Frith, E M. Ward, W. E. Frost, P. F. Poole, F. R. Pickersgill, and Sydney Smirke Here are fourteen excellent men—sufficient of themselves to found and establish a little academy of their own

The great works of the Exhibition are Herbert's "St. John the Baptist reproving Herod," and Gibson's statue in marble of "Aurora stepping upon the Earth scattering Dew." There is, however, much to see that is good. The visitor should by no means omit to examine, and with care too, Mr. Cope's large picture of "Death of Cardinal Wolsey," a commission from Prince Albert; Mr. E. Landseer's "Alexander and Diogenes," and, indeed, all his works; Mr Roberts's "Interior of St. Paul's at Antwerp," painted for Mr. Vernon, to be added to the Vernon gift to the British nation; Mr. Mulready's "Butt," a boy shooting cherries into the mouth of another boy; Mr. Webster's "Card-Players," and his little sketch of the "Internal Economy of Do-the-Boys Hall;" Mr. Uwins's "Vintage in the South of France;" Stanfield's "Mole de Gaeta, from the Appian Way;" Maclise's portrait of "Mr. John Forster as Kitely, in Ben Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour;'" Mr. Lee and Mr. Sidney Cooper's joint representations of English scenery, Mr. Eastlake's "Italian Peasant Family;" Mr. Redgrave's "Country Cousins," another of Mr. Vernon's gifts to the British nation; Mr. Watson Gordon's three-quarter portrait of Sir William Nowbegging, Mr. Creswick's "Chequered Shade," engraved in our present Number, and his 'Greenwood Stream,'

"The shady pool,
Where trouts sup when the day is cool."

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.—"THE SCOTCH FAIR."—PAINTED BY PHILLIP.

Mr. Frank Grant's portrait of Mrs. Charles Lamb; Mr. Marshall's statue of "A Dancing Girl reposing;" Mr. Elmore's "Death-bed of Robert, King of Naples;" Mr. Sidney Cooper's several cattle pieces; Mr. Frith's "Stage-Coach Adventure in 1750," and his "Trial of the Witch;" Mr. Ward's "Highgate Fields during the Great Fire of London, in 1666," and his "Interview between Charles II. and Nell Gwynn"—the scene in St. James's Park witnessed and described by Evelyn. Nor should the visitor miss Mr. Danby's "Evening Gun—a Calm on the Shore of [illegible];" or Mr. Frost's "Enjoyment;" or Mr. Poole's imitation of Mulready on a large scale, "Arlète, a Peasant Girl of Falaise, in Normandy, discovered by the Father of William the Conqueror washing Linen in a Stream."

There are pictures, too, by artists without the pale of the Academy, which the visitor would be wrong to overpass: for instance, among others we could name, we would mention Mr. W. D. Kennedy's scene from the favourite "Merry Wives;" Mr. T. M. Joy's portrait of Miss Forbes, of Callandar; Mr. Egg's admirable illustration of "Queen Elizabeth discovering that she is no longer young;" Mr. H. W. Phillips's portrait of Mr. Lawyer, the Persian traveller, Mr. Lance's "Prize Fruit grown at Blenheim;" Mr. H. O'Neil's "Catherine of Arragon appealing to Henry VIII.;" young Mr. Carpenter's "Charles II. in Holland before the Restoration;" Mr. F. Goodall's "Departure of the Emigrants;" Mr. Arnald's "Battle for the Standard;" and Mr. Phillip's "Scotch Fair," which we have this week engraved. Nor should the miniatures be overlooked: Mr. Thorburn and Sir William Ross each finishing an even battle for pecuniary distinction, and Mr. Carrick catching the expression of the poet Rogers with admirable precision. Some of the Architectural Room drawings will be found to repay attention. Mr. Sydney Smirke's sketch of the new building lately in the Temple is correct Elizabethan; and Mr. H. Shaw's drawing of the Ancient Funeral Pall belonging to the Fishmongers' Company quite a miracle of fidelity and tasteful mintrene.

There are some of the Royal Academicians who are not seen this year to any very great advantage. Leslie, for instance, is quite unrepresented in the two inferior pradications he has exhibited; and Eastlake is nowhere as well hardly be recognised in his portrait of Sir Moses Montefiore, or even, better still, in his "Meditation." The Ettys, one and all, are provokingly poor—with fine colours, it is true, but black and woolly, and poorly drawn. The Maclises, too, are indifferent—finely drawn, it is true, but cold to a North Pole degree in point of colour. How curious it is, the best colourist, Etty, is the worst draughtsman; and the best draughtsman, Maclise, the worst colourist. These two really great artists should live in the same house and take lessons of one another. The sadly-loaded brush of Etty, with what he has just produced, a piece of flesh equal to Titian and Nature, would, if transferred to the hand of Maclise, produce nothing but a raw cruddy

Having thus pointed out the chief work[illegible] of arts which visitors should make a [illegible] till next week.

EXHIBITION AT THE OLD SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THE Forty-fourth Exhibition of the Old Society of Painters in Water-Colours was opened to the public on Monday last, on the same day with the Royal Academy Exhibition in Trafalgar-square, and the collection of Ancient Masters, but still a good one, and admirably suited for Mr. Bentley's purposes and pencil.

27. "Nottingham." P. De Wint. A long, narrow strip of a picture, but wonderful for its truth of nature, and the consummate ability of its treatment throughout. Mr. De Wint clothes in long ranges of level count

32. "Going to the Hay field." D. Cox. Another capital specimen of Mr. Cox's style. But there is not an inferior example of the master in the whole Collection, though one feels (unwillingly, however) that

"His hand has lost the sprightly ease
Which marks security to please."

38. "A Valley in the Sussex Downs." Copley Fielding. Downs painted as none but Copley Fielding can paint them. This accomplished artist must know every inch of the Sussex Downs, so often has he represented them, and always with so much feeling and fidelity.

47. "Lympne Castle, Kent." P. De Wint Very good. All the sixteen De Wints were sold on the day of the private view, with the exception of one. Good pictures are always bought. It was not so once.

64. "Hollybocks." W. Bartholomew. Charmingly grouped and coloured.

79. "Crossing the Ford." W. Shayer, Sen. An old Englishman and his dead deer on a white pony, and numerous Highland attendants. This, to our taste, is more like nature and Edwin Landseer than even Mr. F. Taylor's clever compositions in the same style.

83. "Washing Scene at Nuremburg." 93. "A Market-place at Strasbourg." S. Prout. A pair of enviable Prouts; firm and masterly in every touch.

88. "Rory O'More." F. W. Topham. Rob and his wife in the cabin, most carefully painted, with Rory looking into Kathleen's face, and saying (holding a ring before her),

"Arrah, Kathleen, my darlint, you've teased me enough."

This fine picture deserves the post of honour it has received, in the very centre of the room.

112. "The Orphan." W. Hunt. Not Otway's, or Sir William Allan's orphan, but the last of a litter of pigs, being fed with a wisp-like leaf by a country girl, who is evidently thinking of "cracking" all the time.

146 "Interior of a Highland Larder. Weighing the Stag." F. Taylor. An ambitious and clever picture—full of subject, and in parts very carefully painted. So much so, indeed, that the resources of the art of drawing in water-colours seems carried to the highest pitch.

147. "Lincoln." P. De Wint. Another of Mr De Wint's long and thoroughly English landscapes. Less woolly, too, than usual.

167. "On the Wharfe near Bolton Abbey." George Fripp. Broadly and yet carefully executed.

177. "North Aisle of Westminster Abbey." F Nash. Taken from the Ambulatory (one of the best views in the Abbey), and showing the rich elevation of the tomb of Henry III. in the foreground. In scenes like these Mr. Nash is quite at home.

205 "Gillingham, on the Medway." E. Duncan. Most carefully and characteristic, and perfectly true to the spot and its peculiarities.

210. "Scene on the River Bratmay, near Ambleside." Copley Fielding. A Westmoreland scene, small in size, and yet most charmingly treated in the rich full manner of Fielding.

295 "Refectory—Grace." G. Cattermole. A Norman interior—archæologically correct, with figures of monks grouped with the skill of Paul Veronese.

312. "The Youthful Artist." Sir William Allan. Not to be compared to G. Cattermole. Many figures in Mr. Cattermole's characteristic manner—but far from equalling the "Refectory," on the same screen.

321. "May Blossom." W. Hunt. A branch of May, exquisitely real. There are other examples on the same screen of Mr. Hunt's careful attention to Nature.

324 "A Soap and Water Bubble." W. Hunt. A boy watching a soap bible, which he has just blown from a tobacco-pipe. The expression admirable.

328 "A Hawking Party going out" F. Taylor. Small and picturesque

341. "Prayer for the Absent." Alfred Fripp A lonely Irish scene, with two Irish girls kneeling in prayer. The faces full of sincerity and faith.

340. "Hot Cross Buns." W. Hunt. A hungry boy, with a face furthenware dish of boiling hot bread and milk before him. The contest is happily decided between hunger and prudence—the craving belly and the fearful tongue.

We shall probably re-visit this Exhibition with a view to another notice.

HER MAJESTY'S LATE STEAMER "AVENGER." The committee are to meet this day (Saturday) at the Mansion House, Plymouth, to pay money to such persons residing in the neighbourhood as they consider deserving objects for continuing to participate in the fund so subscribed, and also to vote the remittance of sums to those living in different parts of Ireland, Scotland, &c. The committee have obtained the full particulars of the cases of 161 of those who are supposed to have perished in the Avenger. The whole number is officially stated to be 234.

THE OLD WAR OFFICERS OF THE ROYAL NAVY.—Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to grant a silver medal to each of the officers of the Royal Navy, as a proof of her estimation of the valuable services which these gallant veterans have rendered their country. The medal, which has just been issued by the Admiralty, is in size about the size of a half-crown piece, and bears on one side a sea-car, with a trident, decorated with olive branches, drawn by seahorses, symbolizing at once the exertions of the heroic Nelson, and their successful results: and on the other, a bust in relief of those of the illustrious donor

The basin for war-steamers built in the Portsmouth Dockyard by Mr. Pete Rait, the Government contractor, will be opened, according to present arrangements, on the 24th instant (her Majesty's birthday). The only hindrance to its being opened before arose from the iron caisson buildings for the mouth having been partially broken in upon by the water to the depth of twelve or fourteen feet. They were only recently cleared. The work is now going on rapidly, and, to expedite it, twenty men from the shipwrights' department had been put upon it. The caisson is being coated inside and out with Hay's anti-corrosive composition

OXFORD, May 2. The Duke of Wellington has appointed the Rev. Philip Bliss, formerly Fellow of St. John's, to be Principal of St. Mary Hall, vacant by the resignation of Bishop of Hereford. This day was appointed for the admission of the new Principal. The appointment has given very great satisfaction

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Monday being observed as a close holiday at the Bank of England, the Stock Exchange was also closed. On Tuesday the English market opened buoyantly, Consols quoting 83¾ for money. This was the favourable change in the week, the confirmation of the triumph of the moderés in France, and tranquillizing accounts from Ireland, tended to promote a rise. The market advanced to 83¾ to ⅞, and closed firmly at that rate. The general feeling prevailed on Wednesday and Thursday, and a new impulse was given to it by the accounts of the collision between the moral and physical force repealers. Consols were done as high as 84¼, but prices from Paris quoting lower on the receipt of advices verifying a civil war in France far from improbable, a reaction occurred, making the closing quotation 83¾. The market was well supported on Thursday, Consols advancing to 83¾, but on the arrival of the Continental news, a fall of nearly ¾ per cent. resulted. This decline originated from the tenor of the Italian news, rumours being in circulation that the French had advanced into Savoy. During the week, Exchequer Bills have ruled steadily. This department, at present, is favourable to mortgages reduction in price. Bank Stock had receded slightly from sales, but is now at last week's rate Reduced continues nearly 2 per cent. below its relative value. Prices, at the middle of the week, were not quite so firm, but the following list will show:—Bank Stock, 189; Three per Cent. Reduced, 81¾; Three per Cent. Consols, 83¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents., 82¾; Long Annuities, [illegible]; New Three per Cents., [illegible]; India Stock, [illegible]; Ditto under £1000, 2l p; Consols for Account, 83¾; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 4l p.; Ditto, £500, 3l p.; Small, 3l p.

There was some activity at the Foreign Market at the beginning of the week, attended with an advance in prices Brazilian on Tuesday improved to 7, for the large bonds; small, 6¾; Mexican, 16 to 16¼; Portuguese Three per Cents, 17¾; Four per Cents, 25; Russian, 96 to 96½; Spanish Five per Cents, 18¾; Ditto for money, Three per Cents, 23½ to 23¾; Belgian Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 3¼; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 48. Our closing list, it will be perceived, marks some changes, selling prices generally, however, prevail. Even without realising Belgian, it will be seen, is better, from the favourable progress of affairs in that country, and the same cause has induced an advance in Dutch. The last quotations are, Grenada Bonds, 1 per cent, 13; Ditto, Deferred, 2¼; Mexican 5 per Cent, 1846, 16¼; Ditto, Account, 16¼; Peruvian Bonds, 6 per Cents, 31; Portuguese 5 per Cents, 17¼; Ditto, 4 per Cents, 18; Russian Bonds, 86¼; Spanish 5 per Cent, 1840, 19¼; Ditto, Account, 19¼; Ditto, Passive, 5¾; Ditto, 3 per Cents, 4¾; Ditto, Account, 23¼; Venezuela Bonds, 2¾ per Cent, 20¾; Belgian 2½ per Cent, 36¾; Dutch 2½ per Cent, 12 Guild., 42¾; Ditto, 4 per Cent Certificates, 63; Ditto, Bonds, 61.

The Share Market is considerably firmer, particularly with respect to all lines in which the capital account is about to be closed. From this cause, Brighton, Eastern Counties, and Great Western have made decided advance. Eastern Counties have improved £1 10s per share, and Norfolks about 5 per cent.: the amalgamation of the two lines has contributed to this change. Caledonians have also risen about £3 per share. But little, except speculative business is, however, doing in the new lines, or in shares but partially paid up. At the close of the week, prices were—for Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 14; Bristol and Exeter, Thirds, 7¾; Caledonian, 31¾; Chester and Holyhead, 24¾; East Anglia, £35, 5½; Eastern Counties, 4¾; Ditto, Extension, Five per Cent., No. 2, 4¾; Ditto, Bonds, 4¾; Eastern Counties and Hastings, 2¾; Ditto, New Quarters, 4; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 43; Great Northern, 3½; Great South and West (Ireland), 24½; Great North of England, 230; Ditto, New, £40, 34; Great Western, 99½; Ditto, Half Shares, 49½; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 16¾; Ditto, Fifths, 9¾; Ditto, New, £17, 8¾; Hull and Selby, 78; Ditto, Half Shares, 39; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 72¾; Ditto, Fifths, 8¾; Ditto, Thirds (Leeds), 7¾; Ditto, Extension, 8¾; Lancaster and Preston and West, Leeds and Thirsk, 18½; Do. New, 5¾; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 32¾; Do. Consol. Eighths, 2¾; Do. Pref. Bristol and Birmingham, 6 per cent, 11¾; Norfolk, 67; Ditto guaranteed 5 per cent., 49; North British, 23¾; Ditto Half Shares, 11¾; Ditto Quarters, 5¾; Ditto Thirds, 4¾; North Staffordshire, 7; Ditto, Other Kinds, 3; Northampton, 22½; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 7¼; Scottish Central, 27; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 3¾; Ditto, Ditto, Class B, 1¾; South-Eastern, 24¾; Ditto, Separation, 3¾; Stockton and Darlington, 41¾; Ditto, New, 20½; Ditto Extension, No. 1, 17¾; Ditto, Ditto, No. 2, 10¼; Ditto G.N.E. SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols opened with some heaviness yesterday, influenced by the foreign and Irish news. The first quotation was 83¼, but on the arrival of the French express, an improvement to 83¾ was [illegible]. There was nothing of moment in the other markets.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A very moderate supply of English wheat has been received up to our market this week; owing to the present fine weather, the millers were very cautious in their operations, and the demand must be considered heavy, at barely Monday's quotations. Either a large or small quantity of foreign wheat was on show. Fine descriptions sold at full prices, but the middling and inferior kinds were 1s per quarter lower, with a very dull inquiry. The few samples of barley on show were not readily disposed of, as the long season has now—and justly so—caused but a downward tendency. We have no alteration to notice in the value of malt, but the trade was decidedly heavy. The supply of oats was very small. The best samples produced 26s per quarter more readily. Other kinds were unchanged in value. Beans, peas, Indian corn, and flour were neglected.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 3810; barley, 1440; oats, 1920. Irish: oats, 4970. Foreign: wheat, 6666; barley, 1160; oats, 690. Flour, 3250 sacks, malt, 4350 quarters.

English. Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 48s to 50s; ditto, white, 50s to 52s. Foreign. Barley, red kind, 30s to 32s; white, —s to —s; oats, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 28s to 31s per 196lb.; Baltic, —s to —s per barrel.

The Seed Markets. A few parcels of clover seed of foreign production have sold at full prices In all other seeds so little is doing that our quotations are almost nominal

Linseed, English, sowing, 48s to 52s per quarter; Baltic crushing, 36s to 38s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 46s; canaseed, 30s to 32s per quarter, coriander, 18s to 20s per cwt.; brown mustard-seed, 6s to 10s; white ditto, 8s to 9s per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £30 to £34 per last of ten quarters; linseed cakes, English, £7 10s to £8 0s; ditto foreign, £6 10s to £7 0s per 1000; rapecake, 90s to 95s; hempseed, 38s to 40s per quarter; tares, 2s to 3s per bushel.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6d to 7d per 4lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 49s 6d; barley, 31s 10d; oats, 19s 5d; rye, 29s 0d; beans, 34s 9d; peas, 34s 7d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 7s; barley, 2s 0d; oats, 2s 0d; rye, 2s 0d; beans, —s 0d, peas, 2s 0d.

Teas.—Small public sales have been held this week, and at which a fair quantity has been disposed of at full prices. Privately, the demand is in a sluggish state, and we can quote nothing like an increase.

Sugar.—There has been more activity in the demand for all kinds of sugar since our last report, and prices have advanced from 6d to, in some few instances, 1s per cwt. Standard lumps are selling at the 54s per cwt.

Coffee.—No change worthy of notice has taken place in the demand for, or value of, this article.

Rice.—There is less activity in the sale for this article, and prices are with difficulty supported.

Provisions. Dutch butter is still in good request, and, in some instances, prices are well supported. Fine Friesland is selling at 102s to 104s per cwt. Other kinds are unchanged. Fine Irish is 98s to 99s per cwt. The best Irish butter is firm, at full rates of currency, but old parcels are a slow inquiry. Cork, first, 88s to 90s; Belfast, 90s; and Limerick, 90s to 92s per cwt. English bacon sells at 60s to 62s per cwt. Hams are in moderate request, at 60s to 70s per cwt. Irish are in fair demand, and prices are firmly supported, at 58s to 70s per cwt. Prime singed sides, 56s to 58s per cwt.

Tallow.—P Y C on the spot is selling at 49s for small parcels, and for delivery, 48 per cwt Town tallow, 42s 9d to 43s, net cash.

Oils.—This market is heavy, and in most instances the quotations are a downward tendency.

Spirits. Scarcely any business is doing in rum, the prices of which are with difficulty supported Proof Leewards may be quoted at 1s 9d, and East Indies, is 7d to 1s 7½d per gallon. Brandy dull. British spirits are unchanged, at 19s 3d, per gallon.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 to £4; clover ditto, £4 to £5; and straw, £1 8s to £1 12s per load

Wool.—Pubic sa[illegible] about 20,000 bales are now on Up to the present time, the biddings are somewhat [illegible] and prices rule a shade lower [illegible] of fair prices. In all other [illegible] The best qualities [illegible] [illegible] to nothing is doing [illegible] [illegible] 1s to 1½d per lb more [illegible] (Friday).—Seventh sale, Saturday, 8d, Salisbury, 1s 8d; Tees, 1s; Haswell, 1s 8d; Hexham, 1s 3d; Stewart's, 1s 3d per lb.

Hops (Friday).—An favourable change in the weather appears to have had a beneficial influence on the hop plant The accounts received from [illegible] Kent to-day are to the effect that the bine has made some progress during the present week, notwithstanding the coldness of the nights and the cutting effect of easterly winds. On speculation there is nothing to doing in our markets. However, the best sorts are selling at full prices, but the other sorts are neglected —Sussex pockets, £3 0s to £3 5s.; Weald of Kent ditto, £3 3s to £3 10s.; Mid and East Kent ditto, £3 3s to £3 8s.

Smithfield (Friday).—Although our market to-day was but moderately supplied with beasts as to number (though their general quality was exceedingly good), the beef trade was in a very dull state, and, as dealers in the country are few, a slow sale of from 2s to 4d per 8lb.—the highest figure for the best Scots is reached to[illegible] Scots and, scarcely 300 Scots came fresh to hand. For sheep the demand was steady, but flat from brisk, at unaltered currencies. Prime old Downs is the only sold at 5s per 8lb Lambs, of both fat and inferior supply, moved off slowly, at very full prices. From the Isle of Wight 500 head were received per rail way Calves were in moderate request, at late figures. In pigs exceedingly little was doing. Beasts sold at from 2s 2d to 2s 4d per 8lb., including their sinking offals

THE FETE OF FRATERNITY.

In our Journal of last week we illustrated some of the most striking portions of this Fête. This week, by the aid of our Parisian Artist, we are enabled to present our readers with a picture of the stupendous whole, showing in detail the grand pageant before the Arc de l'Etoile.

In George Sands' paper, La Cause du Peuple, has appeared a very graphic picture of this Fête, from which we detach these extracts —

THE HEALTH OF TOWNS.

Lord Morpeth's bill for the Improvement of the Sanatory Condition of Towns has got into Committee of the House, but it seems to be doubtful whether any real progress will be made with it this session. As a measure it is very obviously incomplete. In an age which has been called, not inaptly, "the age of great cities," a bill has been introduced into Parliament, after a grand preliminary flourish of trumpets, to provide for the better drainage, ventilation, and general health of the great cities and towns of the empire; but London, the metropolis, and Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dublin, the three next largest cities, have been omitted, with all the towns of Scotland and Ireland, from its operations! This is odd enough as a commencement; and the only excuse offered for the omission is as odd as the fact itself. London and the metropolitan boroughs are too mighty to be included in any bill. They must have a bill of their own. Scotland and Ireland are in precisely the same condition, being too important to be governed by the same act as that which shall govern the greater and more important division of the Empire, which goes by the name of England. The truth is, that Lord Morpeth has not courage and energy enough to grapple with the local interests that may be injuriously affected by the operations of a general measure. He tries his 'prentice hand upon the small cities and towns; reserving the larger ones for a future opportunity, when he shall have acquired more skill, and when he shall be better instructed in the necessary workmanship. In the meantime opposition has arisen in various quarters. The towns to be affected are in arms against it; and the towns and cities not immediately menaced join the opposition, in the hope that if they succeed in defeating the partial measure, the whole question may be adjourned indefinitely.

For our own parts we cannot but regret that Lord Morpeth and the sanatory reformers did not bring forward a complete measure, which, without interfering too much, or in any way unjustly, with local management, would have secured an object of which it is impossible to over-estimate the importance. The sanatory improvement of large towns is a question as interesting to the rich as to the poor. If the poor live in filth and misery, and fever be engendered from the union of that prolific pair, the poor are not the only sufferers. The vitiation of the air that begins in the hovels of the humble spreads to the palaces of the proud. The malaria that decimates the population in the over-crowded dwellings of the needy takes a tithe in the abodes of the wealthy. The well-being of one portion of society is intimately connected with the well-being of all, so that no class can be independent of the sufferings of another. This truth is confessed. The rich and the powerful have not shown an indifference to the question, but, on the contrary, have taken much interest in it. We are convinced that all classes, high and low, would have cordially supported the Government in a measure that would have been effectual without being arbitrary, and that would have secured one central control without annihilating the local and municipal management, to which the people are accustomed, and which enters so intimately into the spirit of our institutions.

We do not join the outcry against "Centralisation"—an outcry in which many persons take part who are ignorant of what is meant by it. Centralisation is considered in the light of some terrible and vague evil; something despotic, as well as incomprehensible; dreadful, and not to be defined; and totally subversive of the free-agency to which we have been accustomed. Much of the odium heaped upon Lord Morpeth and his coadjutors in the task of Sanatory Reform has had its origin in this feeling. Yet we think, without agreeing with those who are always crying out against Centralisation, and making a bugaboo of the word to scare the unthinking, that there is a limit to it which it is not prudent and desirable to overstep. Local management should not be entirely fettered by a Board sitting at a distance. It is sufficient that local management should be responsible to a central authority for errors or neglect of duty. It is not fitting that local management should be entirely superseded. To its alleged defects in this particular the measure owes much of the opposition it has excited; and if, even as this advanced period of the session, the Government would boldly meet the two great and only real objections to Lord Morpeth's bill by extending it to London, the metropolitan boroughs and to Scotland and Ireland, and affirm the principle of local management, subject to central control, they would rally around them so vast an amount of support from all ranks and conditions of the people, as to render certain their success in carrying it.

There are various matters of the utmost importance to the well-being of the community which centralism must originate, before localism can administer. Sanatory Reform is one of them. Occupied in the exclusive pursuit of wealth—each individual for himself—the pursuit of the public health has never been the business of society. People have swarmed into towns in the search for employment, and have been huddled together at the cheapest rate. The increase of the general wealth has but increased this particular evil. As long as the traffic of the town was duly cared for, and no obstruction existed to the thoroughfare, the least possible attention was paid in any place to drainage and cleanliness. There are thousands and tens of thousands of people in all our large towns who have no idea of the benefits from which they are shut out, in being deprived of fresh air and fresh water. There are thousands and tens of thousands who were born in filth and live in filth, without a knowledge of the blessings of cleanliness. Unaided and undirected localism can do nothing for such people as these. It has neither the means nor the authority for reforms and alterations so extensive as would be required to drain a whole parish, and build houses where the essentials of health and the decencies of civilisation might be placed within the reach of the poorest of the population. It requires more power than they possess to demolish the old dwellings—more money than they can command to construct the new. A national system, directed by a central authority, is absolutely necessary to set in motion the local machinery which would be adequate to the task of effectually improving the sanitary state of London, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, Birmingham, Bristol, Merthyr, Cork, Dublin, Limerick, Galway, Paisley, Edinburgh, Dundee, and such busy conglomerations of the people as exist in them. No local effort could be entrusted with a task so utterly beyond its power. Parliament, which is itself a centralisation, must delegate authority for this purpose to some other central body, before a reasonable hope of success can be entertained. Such a central body should aid and strengthen, not supersede and destroy local agency. If this be no more than this, the foolish outcry against centralisation, as being "un-English," would die out, and people would acknowledge that a Board of Health was as necessary as a Board of Privy Council, a War Office, an Admiralty, a Court of Chancery, or a House of Commons; and that one was no more "un-English" than the other.

For our part, without adopting the silly word, we think that [illegible] meaning thereby cant and control, be "un-English," that filth is "un-English," fever "un-English," and the physical and moral debasement of a teeming population still more decidedly "un-English." [illegible] "un-English." [illegible] ence to the sanatory condition of the people which it would be very much for the advantage of the English to introduce. A tax upon windows is an exclusively English [illegible], which is exceedingly prejudicial to the public health. It would be very desirable if the Government could do without it, and give us an "un-English" exemption from its operation. The excise duty upon soap is also a very English impost, which is highly prejudicial to the public health. We should be very grateful to the Minister who would relieve the people of it, although Lord Granby perhaps might object to the relief's being quite [illegible].

The truth with regard to this measure seems to be, that the Government have been too car ful of vested interests in [illegible] places, like London, [illegible] in other quarters, where no such powerful opposition was to have been feared; and that in steering timidly a middle course, they have [illegible] The [illegible] is an amiable Minister; but in such a question as the Health of Towns, a bold and strong hand is required. The reform desired must be as vast as the evil that rendered it necessary; but honesty of purpose, and firm determination, would enable a Minister to carry a plan much vaster, were it but wise and well considered.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The news from our lively neighbours across the Channel this week is generally of a more cheerful and reassuring character. The commencement by the National Assembly of its Herculean task of re-organising the government of the country had created almost universal satisfaction. At all these elections of officers the number of members who voted was 747.

M. Buchez, the newly-elected President, returned thanks for the honour conferred on him. At the close of his observations the whole Assembly rose en masse, amidst repeated cries of Vive la République!

There was much excitement exhibited throughout the sitting.

SATURDAY, May 6.—The Chamber met at one o'clock, Citizen Buchez presiding, and was occupied for some time in examining into the validity of the election to the vacant office of the department of the Seine, a new election was ordered, in the room of one of the members, whose election was [illegible] invalid.

The President then announced that the Citizen Minister Lamartine was about to make a communication from the Government, when that gentleman ascended the tribune, and proceeded to read a document which purported to be a report of the acts of the Provisional Government in their ensemble—the restoration of order, organisation of the National Guard, Mobile Guards, the army, &c., enumerating what had been done in the midst of two months of a crisis during which not a drop of blood had been shed. Many portions of this report were much applauded, and at the close there was great enthusiasm.

He was succeeded by Ledru-Rollin, the Minister of the Interior, who read a report of the acts of his administration, which he read with great volubility, but without exciting applause, except of a very partial kind from a small minority. If the temper of the Assembly indicates their intentions with regard to the Ministers to be appointed, M. Ledru-Rollin can have but little chance.

The Minister of Justice (M. Crémieux) next ascended the tribune, and proceeded to read a report of his official acts, which he recounted at full and elaborations applied to the administration of justice, the abolition of capital punishment for political offences, abolition of the pillory, &c.

The next member of the Government who ascended the tribune was little Louis Blanc, who excited a smile by his first act—which was to stoop and arrange a cabaret on which to raise himself high enough to [illegible] The voice that came from this pygmy form was firm, clear, and loud enough, instead of reading, to harangue an eager audience in favour of his Organisation du Travail, to which he said the Government stood committed by its promises to the people assembled before the Hotel de Ville the day after the revolution. The Assembly received his oration with a coldness which augured ill for his ministerial prospects.

M. [illegible] Minister of Public Instruction, was afterwards heard; and was [illegible]

M. Garnier Pagès, the Minister of Finance, who confined himself to a recapitulation of the financial position of France, on the 24th of February, published in the Moniteur shortly after his accession to power.

M. Bethmont, Minister of Commerce, deposited on the table the exposé of the state of his department; and the Assembly afterwards adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY.—The President took the chair at twelve o'clock. M. Garnier Pagès, Minister of Finance, concluded his report on the financial condition of the country, in the course of which he announced that a postage reform [illegible] would be presented to the budget of 1849; as also a bill relative to the purchase of canals, and another for the establishment of progressive taxation. With regard to the railways, the Government had considered the question too important to act on itself to decide it; but, in his opinion, the existence of such a financial [illegible] was incompatible with the Republican form of Government. He would, therefore, present a bill on the subject. The new measures adopted, or to be adopted, would raise the receipts equal to the expenses of the present year, and even considerably [illegible]. The receipts of 1848 would, he calculated, amount to 1,546,000,000 francs, and the expenses to [illegible],500,000 francs. He concluded by declaring that the Republic had saved France from bankruptcy.

M. Arago, the Minister of War and Marine, who followed, stated that, on the 24th of February, the army was in so neglected a condition, that the regiments of infantry could not have supplied two war battalions of 800 men each; those of cavalry only four squadrons formant [illegible] other a force of 50 horses; and the regiments of artillery, only one battery. There consequently existed a necessity to augment the army, and he had thought proper to call out the conscripts of 1845, 1844, 1843, 1844, and 1846, who had been allowed to remain in their families, and to order all the military men absent on leave to return forthwith to their respective corps. The levy of 1847 alone augmented the military forces of the republic by 85,300 men. Contracts for the supply of 20,000 horses had been concluded. Several armies were organised: 27,000 men were brought back to France from Algeria, 12,000 of whom were now stationed in the valley of the Durance, forming part of the Army of the Alps, which would soon be increased to 50,000 men. The young men of the classes 1843 and 1844, born in the southern departments of France would shortly have 70,000 French soldiers, 10,000 marines, and between 17,000 and 18,000 cavalry. The department of war had delivered, in two months, 446,000 muskets to arm the National Guards of France, 130,000 of which were distributed in Paris alone. In the event of a war, France would be able to bring into the field 500,000 men of infantry and 85,000 [illegible] M. [illegible] also referred to the re-organisation of the navy, and stated that the [illegible] had been sent to exhibit the flag of the Republic to the ports and roads in Italy, on the coast of Africa, Morocco, and Cadiz to Salonica.

M. Marie, the Minister of Public Works, next presented the situation of his department, and was succeeded by M. Lamartine, Minister for Foreign Affairs, who took a short review of the aspect of affairs throughout Europe. The general tone of his remarks was pacific, and in accordance with the principles of his address some time back to the diplomatic agents of France.

In the course of the sitting a note from Marrast, the poet, resigning his seat for Paris, was read; but the Assembly unanimously refused to accept the resignation of the poet.

A stormy discussion then arose on the motion of M. Dornès, offering the thanks of the Assembly to the Provisional Government for their conduct in the administration of affairs, and now naming a commission of five to act as a [illegible] of lazaroni, until the permanent government should be constituted. Subsequently, after fearful uproar, the motion was moved for the withdrawal of the latter part of it, and the Assembly voted that the Provisional Government had deserved well of the country. The vote was almost unanimous, M. Barbes, M. Durrieu, and another rising alone against it.

On Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, M. Buchez, the President, took the chair. Some apprehensions were entertained that the result of [illegible] would occasion disturbances. The workmen met in several quarters of Paris, and in the wood of Boulogne, and were understood to have declared that if [illegible] Rollin was excluded from the Government, they would take arms. Large [illegible] precautions had accordingly been adopted round the hall. A large force was stationed in the adjoining garden, and invitations had been sent to the National Guards to hold themselves in readiness to march at the first signal.

THE TEMPORARY COMMISSION OF GOVERNMENT.—M. Pempin, Reporter of the Committee charged with examining the different propositions relative to the constitution of a temporary executive power, having been called to the tribune to present his report, said, that two propositions had been made: one to the effect that the National Assembly should appoint a commission of five members, who should name the Ministers and exercise the Government; and the other that the Assembly elect directly, and by ballot, the Ministers of the Nine Departments, and a tenth, without a portfolio, who should preside at the council. The advocates of the first mode contended that an intermediate power between the Assembly and the Minister was indispensable, that the Assembly could not govern; and that Ministers would be unable to attend to their [illegible] executive functions. The partisans of the second mode stated that the National Assembly, uniting the executive, legislative, and constituent powers, was called upon to elect directly a Ministry, and that until the people of the State were organised and disciplined, the Assembly only should remain in the hands of the Assembly. After much discussion, the Committee decided, by a majority of fourteen to four, that the National Assembly should appoint directly, by ballot and by an absolute majority, nine Ministers, responsible and revocable, united under the presidency of a tenth minister, also elected by the Assembly, who should form an executive council, and render an account of its proceedings to the Assembly. An animated discussion took place on the project of the Committee, which was ably combated by M. Jules Favre, the Abbé Lacordaire, M. Lamartine, &c. At its close the President consulted the Assembly as to whether the different propositions should be put to the vote. "The majority of the country," he said, "had recommended the direct election of ten Ministers by the Assembly, and the minority the establishment of a provisional Commission." A third proposition had been made to the effect of continuing the Provisional Government in office until the proclamation of the Constitution." The greater portion of the orators. M. Barbès insisted on every amendment being voted publicly. M. de Vogué seconded the motion; but the President observed that every vote be public, he could not perceive its utility. The proposition of the Count was then put to the vote, and two trials proving doubtful, a ballot commenced, and at five o'clock the National Assembly rejected, by a majority of 411 against 369, the proposition of the Central Committee, that Ministers should be directly appointed by the Assembly.

After some discussion as to the formation of the ad interim executive, the Assembly decided that an executive committee should be nominated, and that the number of the members should be five.

M. Louis Blanc announced that the President (himself) and Vice-President (M. Albert) of the Committee of Workmen having resigned their functions on the day that the National Assembly met, did not intend resuming them, and had to call on the Assembly to appoint persons to replace them in (Movement)

The Assembly then decided unanimously that the nomination of five members of the executive committee should take place by ballot, and by an absolute majority.—Adjourned

He trusted that the Assembly would invite the Executive Committee to take into consideration the prayer of the memorialists. He entreated, moreover, the Assembly to address, without delay, an appeal to the German nation and the Frankfort Diet to join France in reinstituting ancient Poland.

A member asked M. Lamartine if he saw any inconvenience in giving the Assembly any information on hand respective to his diplomatic agents on the situation of Italy, or if he preferred that the Assembly should fix a day to hear those explanations.

M. Lamartine replied that he was ready to give those explanations, if the member insisted, but that it would be preferable to appoint a day for the purpose. He, however, would state beforehand, that when the co-operation of France was necessary to Italy it should not be denied, and the member need not apprehend that the events of 1831 should occur again in 1848.

Monday next was fixed to hear those explanations.

SPAIN.

From Madrid we learn that on the 22nd inst. the religious ceremony in honour of the victims of the insurrection, on the 2nd of May, 1808, against the French, and the procession round the Commemorative Monument, in the Prado, took place and terminated without any unpleasant incident. The Gazette published a Royal decree authorising the sale of the property belonging to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, which is supposed to be worth from 80,000,000 to 90,000,000 of reals. The property is to be paid for in specie, the fifth part immediately, and the remainder by eight annual instalments

The island, with its seven villages and the forts, mounted with 124 pieces of cannon, fell into the power of the Queen's troops. More than 450 of the pirates were put to death. The Queen had rewarded General Chacon, Captain-General of the Philippine Islands, with the Grand Cross of the Royal and Military Order of St. Ferdinand.

The Spanish Government, in order to restore the credit of the Bank of San Fernando, had ordered that the Government Commissaries should receive as cash in payment of [illegible] toms' duties throughout the Peninsula.

Accounts of the 4th mention that the state of siege had been removed from Madrid by a proclamation of the Captain-General. The Duke and Duchess de Montpensier had left Aranjuez for Seville.

The Madrid Gazette of the 6th publishes a decree authorising the issue of [illegible] bonds, in four series of 1000, 5000, 10,000, and 20,000 reals each, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

A difference was said to have arisen between General Narvaez and the Marquis of [illegible] Flores, when threatened to break up the Cabinet.

The Queen had determined that the entire Court should proceed to Aranjuez on the 8th inst.

The King has published an address to the army, in which he exhorts it to devote its energies to the unity of Germany, and to consider that it is the arm and the defence of the whole of Germany, whose colours it now wears by the side of those of Prussia. ## MR. RUSSELL'S NEW MANSION, PARK-LANE.

THIS highly embellished addition to the Street Architecture of the Metropolis is now being finished for Charles Russell, Esq., at No. 19, Park-lane, from the designs of Mr. W. B. Moffatt, architect, 9, Spring-gardens. It is in the later perpendicular style of Gothic; and we are glad to be able to speak favourably of the taste and ability displayed in the composition. Although the frontage is narrow—not more than from twenty to twenty-five feet—the design is extremely pleasing, and clearly proves that an artistic mind can start beauties out of dimensions which would be considered by many as quite unmanageable.

MR. RUSSELL'S NEW MANSION, PARK-LANE.

The noble oriel which occupies the first and second floors stands out boldly upon a carved corbel, finely proportioned and elaborate in detail. Indeed, the greatest care appears to have been bestowed upon the whole front, so as to produce an unity of composition combined with a pleasing and picturesque effect. How different this is from the endless iron railing, two windows and a door style of street architecture; and how different, also, from many buildings of much greater pretensions, where immense sums have been lavished, and the result has been anything but satisfactory. We often see an attempt made to hide poverty of intention by a redundancy of ornament, and elaborate bits here and there going hand in hand with utter meagreness. It is a well-known fact that London, the wealthiest city in the world, is behind many a third-rate continental town in the beauty and style of its street architecture.

The interior is alike meritorious. As we enter the hall, we have a view through the archway of a massive stone staircase, elaborately wrought and carved, having foliated terminations to the newels, and flowing enriched tracery for the balustrades. We are informed that the staircase window is to be filled with stained glass in the best style, with heraldic shields and appropriate devices, which will, no doubt, have a gorgeous effect. The suite of rooms on the first floor consists of the drawing-room, picture-gallery, and dining-room. The roof of the latter is entirely of solid wood, beautifully wrought and carved; and the ceiling of the drawing-room is of plaster, with foliated points to the cusping, and elegant Gothic enrichments to the cornice. The Oriel is not only a beautiful object in itself, but it also possesses the advantage of giving an additional space of ten feet by five feet to the room, as well as to the library above; and this we think a matter of importance, where every inch of space is valuable. The whole of the interior is carried out in the same style and spirit as the exterior, the greatest attention having been paid to convenience, arrangement, warming, and ventilating; and the building is rendered thoroughly fire-proof. The forms, combinations, mouldings, and other details are beautifully executed; yet we understand that the building is much less costly than might be imagined from the richness of its appearance. The clerk of the works, Mr John Jones (Talhaearn), and the builder, Mr John Kelk, of South-street, have ably seconded the architect. The work throughout is substantially and beautifully done, and the most careful finish has been bestowed on all the carvings and enrichments.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH AUSTRALIA.—Facility and quickness of communication with the important colonies of Australia have of late years much engrossed public attention, and the subject is one of great interest. We subjoin the report of the Hydrographer of the Admiralty, founded on which the route through Torres Straits has been sanctioned by the Lords of the Admiralty for large steamers conveying the mails to these colonies:—"It is now acknowledged by every one that a direct intercourse by steam between England and that group of colonies of which Sydney is the centre, would in a short time double her capital, her population, and her produce, and the only questions are, which will be the best line to carry it, and how it can be most economically maintained? Three-fourths of the whole distance are already performed by the Hong-Kong mail to Singapore, and if the Sydney mails were to branch off from that port, and take the eastern line by Batavia and the Torres Straits, they would traverse smooth water seas, where a passage is certain at all seasons, they would at once supersede the steamer which the Dutch now run from Java to meet our packets, and they would likewise produce direct communication between Australasia, China, as well as the three presidencies of India, which will be as beneficial to all those places as lucrative to the carriers. From Sydney the mails would be forwarded to the neighbouring settlements without delay, as there is a regular overland post to Melbourne, and another from thence to Adelaide. Steamers now ply regularly between Sydney and Port Philip and Launceston, and easy contracts might be made for the furtherance of the mails to Swan River and New Zealand. Whereas by the scheme proposed in Mr. Sharpe's and the other letters, the steam-vessels from the day they quitted Point de Galle would avoid all collateral aid in feeding their line, they would have to run direct for those miserable coral reefs called the Keelings or Cocos, which can scarcely be said to be inhabited, and which are so low and small that there would be a constant difficulty in finding them, and where the continual surf would much impede the business of coaling. From thence to Australia they would cross an open ocean, where the heavy western swell is notorious, and peculiarly unsuited to steam navigation, and throughout which they would, during the winter season, be sure of tempestuous weather; and, finally, by this process, Sydney, the seat of Government, would be the last place to receive her Majesty's mails. If, therefore, Government is inclined to make any sacrifice in favour of these thriving and important settlements, by facilitating their rapid communication with the mother country, I would urge their lordships to recommend that it should be effected by a sufficient number of steam-vessels, of competent power, and by the Singapore and Batavian route. (Signed) F. BEAUFORT."

THE 5th of May being the anniversary of the death of Napoleon, a grand funeral service was celebrated at Paris, in the Church of the Invalides. Several members of the Imperial family were present, namely, Jerome Buonaparte and his two children; Napoleon Buonaparte, deputy for Corsica; and Princess Mathilda Demidoff; Joachim Murat, deputy to the National Assembly; and Pierre Buonaparte, son of Lucien, and deputy of Corsica. Among the others present were—Marshal Molitor, governor of the Invalides; General Petit, deputy-governor; Generals Fabrier, Gourgaud &c.

PROCESSION OF THE MEMBERS OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT TO THE HALL OF THE ASSEMBLY.

OPENING OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRANCE.

THURSDAY, the 4th instant, being the day fixed for the opening of the National Assembly, the rappel beat at an early hour, and the National Guards soon afterwards assembled at their respective places of rendezvous. At eleven o'clock, all the battalions had assumed the stations assigned to them, and round the Palace of the Assembly. The first battalion of the Garde Mobile was drawn up in front of the Palace, and on the sides were stationed detachments of the troops of the line, mixed with the National Guards. The cavalry occupied the Esplanade of the Invalides and the Champs Elysées. The entire force under arms was estimated at about 30,000 men. The crowd assembled on the Place de la Concorde and in the neighbourhood of the palace was considerable. The blouzes were in a great majority, but their attitude was perfectly inoffensive.

THE PROCESSION.

The appearance of the streets resembled that on a fête day, with the addition of a grand military festival.

At half-past twelve o'clock, the National Guards shouldered arms, and, at a quarter to one, the members of the Provisional Government issued from the Hotel of the Ministry of Justice, in the Place Vendôme, and proceeded on foot to the Chamber of Representatives, preceded and followed by a grand military escort. They were everywhere received with testimonies of respect and popularity. Our artist has depicted this impressive scene on the previous page.

Looking from the Church of the Madeleine, at the moment when the cortège had reached the Place de la Revolution, the whole of the distance displayed little else than a surface of red tufts (pompons) and bayonets, except where some of the legions had inverted into their muskets Lilliputian tri-colour flags, which, waving in the air, gave to the scene an animation it would otherwise have wanted.

The cortège had scarcely passed the Bridge of the Revolution in front of the Chamber, when the National Guards began to retire to their encampment. They had taken their places with the determination that the whole 900 representatives of the nation were to pass before them.

THE HALL OF ASSEMBLY.

The edifice specially constructed for the Assembly occupies the centre of the Court of the Palace of the Chamber of Deputies, with which it communicates by two glazed galleries. It has been built with extraordinary rapidity, so that there was little time for the choice of the design; and that adopted presents a striking contrast with the solidity of the surrounding structures. The façade is plain, even to meanness, and the imitative buttress-like portions of the wings do not improve the effect. We scarcely need describe the lofty doorway, flanked with groups emblematic of the mechanic arts and agriculture; above are the everlasting faces and classic wreaths, and immediately beneath the pitch of the gable the triple group of "Liberté, Fraternité, Egalité." There is a sort of draped frieze; and high up on the apex waves the flag of the Republic.

EXTERIOR OF THE HALL OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

The interior of the Hall is of rectangular form, but the portion facing the table of the President is circular. It is about 40 yards in length and 27 in width; ten rows of seats with backs extend on both sides and in the circular part, and in the centre an open space has been reserved sufficiently spacious for the passage of the representatives. The seats are separated by a number of staircases, communicating with a gallery which ranges round the hall; and about three yards above the last row of seats are the public tribunes. The hall is lighted by windows opened over those tribunes; and on the same level and in the circular part is a second tier of tribunes, destined for the public, and large enough to accommodate 200 persons. Those underneath may contain about 1500 more. The internal decoration of the hall is extremely simple. It consists of a basement, adorned with large panels, supporting a series of pilasters, on which the ceiling rests. The frieze is decorated with lions' heads and shields, on which are inscribed the words "Liberté—Egalité—Fraternité." A little above the public tribunes are suspended to each pilaster trophies of tri-coloured flags. The wall behind the President's chair and the tribune is decorated with a large painted drapery, several groups of flags, and the following inscriptions: "République Française"—"Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité."

The benches are wood, covered with green baize. The representatives of the Republic are seated less comfortably than in the theatres, they are separated from each other by a rail, covered with baize. The decorations of the tribune and the ensemble are pale green and yellow. About the chair of the President is suspended a sort of drapery resembling the curtain of a large theatre. To the reporters of the public press are assigned 50 places in the tribunes, and those places are the nearest to the bureau of the President. The tribunes of the "Litterateurs" will hold 42 persons. The places reserved for the public without tickets are at the end of the Hall in the most elevated part; they are isolated from the other tribunes, and are entered by a separate staircase.

THE PORTRAITS

In addition to the portraits of the men whom the first wave of the revolutionary tide thrust forward in February last, we this week give those of some of the more prominent characters that have since appeared.

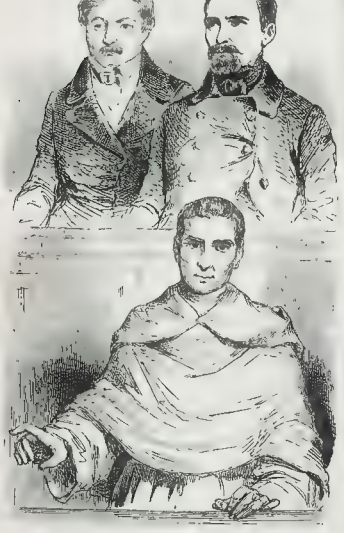
FLOCON.

Ferdinand Flocon is one of those who, immediately after the events of the 24th of February, became a member of the Provisional Government, in the capacity of one of its secretaries. He was one of the violent ultra-minority, and a partizan of M. Ledru-Rollin, whose ambitious designs and anarchical views he aided and abetted as far as his subordinate capacity admitted of. M. Flocon was formerly, and it is understood is still, the editor of the Réforme newspaper, which is the unflinching advocate of M. Ledru-Rollin's policy.

ALBERT (OUVRIER).

M. Albert was also a member of the Provisional Government, in which he filled the office of Vice-President of the Industrial Commission of Workmen for the Re-organisation of Labour, which, sitting in the ex-Chamber of Peers at the Luxembourg Palace, under the Presidency of that visionary enthusiast, Louis Blanc, endeavoured to reduce to a practical system the Communist views and opinions of that mistaken but well-meaning gentleman. Their exertions have ended, as was, of course, all along expected, in complete failure; and, on Tuesday, in the National Assembly, M. Blanc announced the resignation of both his colleague (Albert) and himself, and their intention of not resuming their impracticable task.

Albert, who on the formation of the Provisional Government was ostentatiously mentioned as being a workman (ouvrier) and the representative of men of his condition in the Government, is said to have been foreman in a factory in the Faubourg St. Antoine, other accounts represent him as the proprietor of a small factory in the same quarter of the city. He is a native of Lyons, in which town he was formerly chief of the Sociétés des Devoirs de l'Homme, and in the year 1834, he attempted, but in vain, to restrain the insurrection which broke out there, with a view to its being retarded for a time, only the better to secure its success. Since that period he has been a most active Republican, and has endured prosecution and imprisonment for participation in the Republican schemes and conspiracies.



FLOCON. LACORDAIRE. ALBERT.

BARBES. LAMENNAIS. PAGNERRE

CORMENIN. DUVIVIER. AUDRY DE PUIRVEAU

LACORDAIRE.

Of this extraordinary man we have already given a memoir and portrait, remarkable for the excellence of the likeness, in our Number of April 15.

We have only to add to that notice, that he has since been elected a member of the National Assembly, in which he took his seat on the day it was opened last week, and excited not a little attention, by his being clothed on that occasion in the white robe of the Dominican Order of Friars Preachers, just as if he were about to enter the pulpit of the Church, rather than the tribune of Legislature.

LAMENNAIS.

The Abbé de Lamennais is a native of the old province of Brittany, and is not more remarkable for genius, eloquence, and learning, than he is for a proud and violent disposition and most visionary views in politics. He was formerly a working member of the Roman Catholic clergy of France; and, in conjunction with M. Lacordaire, edited a journal called L'Avenir, which advocated very extreme views socially and politically; but, his writings having been condemned by the Pope, he refused to bend to the decision, and seceded from the ranks of the clergy. He has since supported himself as a public writer. He has been elected to the National Assembly.

GUINARD. DAVID (D'ANGERS.) BERANGER.

BARBES.

M. Barbès, known as Le Beau, or the handsome, has led a very troubled life. Ever since the Paris courses of 1839, in which he was mixed up, he has been perpetually in prison, or under prosecution for conspiracy.

In 1839, having deliberately shot a soldier on guard during the disturbances, and having been convicted of being one of the most active of the firebrands on that unfortunate occasion, he was condemned to death; but Louis Philippe, yielding to the entreaties of the Princess Clementine, sent to his own inclinations, spared Le Beau's life.

Since the Revolution of February, he has distinguished himself at the head of one of the clubs of Paris, by his socialist and anarchic views. He has been elected to the National Assembly; and, short a time as he has yet sat, he has found opportunities of displaying the utmost violence of temper, and of expressing the most dangerous political views.

landscape, somewhat in De Wint's manner, but with enough of nature to make it Mr. Davidson's own. It has been bought by Mr. Lewis Pocock not without a struggle, for there were two other competitors at the private view, and at the same moment, who had determined to buy it.

393. "The Seven Ages of Woman." Henry Warren. Seven pictures in one, with an ornamental border surrounding the seven subjects. The story of woman's life told with great beauty, and some of the groups are infinitely superior to anything Mr. Warren has yet done. The Bridegroom is almost worthy of Stothard. The border is too much in Mr. Owen Jones's manner, and quite oppresses the subjects it surrounds.

The woman's expression is good; the colouring and execution, like all that Mr. Wehnert sends forth, ex[illegible] top-heavy.

We have engraved one of the Highland scenes which Mr. Robert Carrick has contributed to the collection 82 "The Wounded Cateran." The composition of the group, and the expression of the faces, are admirable; the accessories are skilfully disposed, and the colouring of the whole is harmonious and truthful. It is, altogether, as are Mr. Carrick's other productions, of great merit.

EXHIBITION AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SECOND NOTICE.

THE two Academy Pictures Engraved in our Paper of last week were two clever specimens of the classes of art to which they respectively belong. No painter ever had truer feeling for cool chequered shades than Mr. Creswick; and Mr. Phillip in his "Scottish Fair" has given us an almost living illustration of a general gathering in the North, with all the incidents and circumstances most characteristic of the occasion, and best adapted for the purposes of Art. The "Scottish Fair," in many parts, reminds us of Mr. Edwin Landseer's "Highland Drovers" (the celebrated picture in the possession of Mr. John Sheepshanks), and still stronger of Wilkie's early but not very well known work of "Pitlessie Fair," a fair in Fife, which he painted before he left Edinburgh for London. Mr. Phillip has only to take care of himself, and by giving his days and nights to Ostade and Teniers, Wilkie, Edwin Landseer, and Mulready, may paint a picture not only worthy of our National Gallery, but of our national reputation. He has evidently an eye keenly alive to the pictorial beauties of subjects at British Country Life.

The two pictures in our present number are of a different stamp, and both clever. Mr. E. Hildebrandt supplies in No. 621, "Susses Nichtsthun," a charming sea-shore scene, in the manner of the late W. Collins, R.A., whose recent loss Mr. Creswick and Mr. Hildebrandt seem destined to make good. In pictures like Mr. Hilbebrandt's "Susses Nichtsthun," much depends on the simple truth of an adherence to the actual in nature and this, indeed, he seems to have had unremittingly before him. The picture is hung in the Octagon-room, and must unworthily so hung, but our Engraving will perhaps induce others to examine it with more attention than the Octagon-room pictures generally receive.

Mr. Elmore's picture (his only picture, by-the-bye) is entitled "The Death-bed of Robert King of Naples, surnamed the Good and Wise." He has taken his story from Mrs. Dobson's "Life of Petrarch." "Perceiving," says this very agreeable writer, "that he drew near his end, he (the King) assembled his nobles, and dictated his will in their presence. By this will, he made Joan, his granddaughter, his heir; and her sister Mary was to succeed her. . . . . After this Robert desired they would bring to him the two young persons he had named for his successors. He addressed himself to them with the greatest dignity and tenderness; discovered to them the dangers which threatened them, and informed them in what manner they ought to conduct themselves towards their enemies, their friends, and their subjects. . . . 'He died,' says Petrarch, 'as he lived, acting and speaking like himself.' He chose to die in the habit of the Third Order of St. Francis, an act of zeal at that time in fashion." Such is the memorable incident which Mr. Elmore has selected for the purpose of his art. It must be confessed that he has made the most of it, and contended with equal skill and ability against the difficulties of a subject which hardly allows—in part, at least—of pictorial representation. Our artists are not often clear in making the necessary distinction between [illegible] subjects better adapted for the resources of art. It is quite evident that there are descriptions in Clarendon and Hume (to confine ourselves to English historians), which are in the highest degree picturesque and moving, but not well adapted for the purposes of art. On the other hand, it is equally true that there are many subjects painted which no words can describe. It is Spenser who says

"The poet's wit surpasseth painter's far
In picturing the parts of beauty daynt."

This, however, was a poet's judgment, and painters may appeal to Raphael and Guido, to Reynolds and to Lawrence, for the superiority of the pictorial to the poetic art in perpetuating "the parts of beauty daynt." But, it [illegible] consider a little closer than many do, what art can accomplish, and what her means actually are, and in what way poetry differs from painting and painting, too, from p[illegible] Mr. Elmore's subject [illegible] of pictorial points: he has revived a scene of great historical interest, and almost persuaded us to think that we are actually witnessing the scene so unmistakeably put before us. Yet there are points in the description which no art can reach. How could Raphael represent the good old King discovering to his successors the dangers which threatened them, or informing them in what manner they ought to conduct themselves towards their enemies, their friends, and their subjects. Yet these not to be represented last words are actually a part of Mr. Elmore's undertaking. The King looks good, and wise, and almost admonitory. He is heard with attention, but that dangers which threatened his successors is confined to Mrs. Dobson. Art itself (not Mr. Elmore's art alone) is quite unable to reach what language alone can represent. When a committee proposed to Chantrey to place his fine statue of Grattan, not on a pedestal, artistically correct, but on "The Rock of the Constitution," Chantrey observed, "But how am I to represent 'The Rock of the Constitution?' One rock is like another rock; and, unless I turn to another art, and actually write on the rock itself, 'This is the Rock of the Constitution,' the pedestal will be a mere piece of fancy rock-work, attempting a difficulty which no art can succeed in giving."

These general remarks on the resources of an art—boundless in its own resources—have led us somewhat away from the walls of the Academy. Here, however, we must close for the present, not without a promise that our growing arrear of criticism shall be considerably reduced in our next week's paper. In the meantime we may remark, in justice to Mr. Elmore, that there is much excellent painting throughout his picture. Some of the heads, both in character and execution, are astonishingly fine.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—[illegible]

MADAME PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA.

PAULINE GARCIA is born of a musical family, which for three centuries has illustrated the lyric stage. Her father was the famed tenor, Emanuel Garcia; and her mother, Joaquina Sitchès, was a celebrated actress, under the name of

MADAME PAULINE VIARDOT GARCIA.

Briansk, on the Madrid stage, who sang the part of Hédelma in Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto," with Madame Fodor and Madame Camporese, in 1817. The sister of Pauline was the lamented Malibran, and her brother, Manuel Garcia, now the Professor of Singing at the Conservatoire, in Paris, who has written one of the best standard works on the art of singing, was master to Jenny Lind. The school of Garcia in vocalization is in fact European.

Pauline Garcia was born in Paris, on the 18th of July, 1821. At four years of age she spoke with fluency four languages—Spanish (her maternal tongue); French, that of the country in which she was born; English, which she acquired in the family travels; and Italian, destined to be the study of her future art. At a later period, when invited to appear on the great lyric stages of Germany, she made herself thoroughly conversant with the Teutonic language. Her genius in painting and drawing was as soon developed as her facility for languages, and her aptitude for music. Her surpassing talents for sweet sounds were displayed from her earliest infancy. At seven years of age, she accompanied, on the pianoforte, her father's pupils, when he gave his singing-lessons. Such was her manual dexterity, facile fingering, and poetical touch, that at first it was proposed she should pursue the career of a pianist, and she became one of the most accomplished scholars of Liszt. After having accompanied the family migrations, first to England, then to New York, and afterwards to Mexico, Pauline returned to Europe, in 1826, and completed her education in the Belgian capital. At sixteen years of age her voice became fixed. Like the organ of her sister, in quality it combined the two registers of the soprano and contralto, having that soul-stirring tone which exercises such a potent spell on her hearers. In compass, her voice had three octaves. In the month of May, 1839, before she had attained her eighteenth year, she made her first appearance on any stage, at the King's Theatre, in this capital, in the character of Desdemona, the same reason that Mario first made his debut in this country. Her success was most brilliant. She sang an aria composed by Costa, introduced in "Otello;" she was recalled several times during the progress and at the end of the opera. In the month of October following, engaged for the Italian Opera in Paris, then playing at the Odéon, she created equal enthusiasm, by her debut in the same character in the month of April, 1840, she was married to M. Louis Viardot, homme-de-lettres, at that time Director of the Italian Opera, who, on his marriage, resigned that post. M. Viardot is a distinguished publicist in Paris, and was recently offered the post of Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid, by the Provisional Government of the Republic.

The appearance of Pauline Viardot Garcia was, indeed, quite a musical event, and European managers were eager to offer her engagements. Her last appearance in London was in the season 1841, when she sang in Cimarosa's "Orazi et Curiazi," with Mario. Her health was not in the best state, and her physical strength not sufficient to answer to the calls upon her ardent nature, in giving vent to the dramatic excitement of the scene, as the peculiar characteristic of Garcia is, her stage abstraction is so perfect that all traces are lost of the artiste in the character she is so vividly presenting. It was for this reason that she declined to receive the offers made to her by the Académie Royale de Musique in Paris. She preferred to travel, and visited Spain, singing in Madrid and Grenada, and then passed another season in Paris, singing with Grisi and Persiani. Her next engagement was for two seasons in Vienna, where her triumph was immense, singing every school of music, so as to satisfy the exigencies of the most classic musician, as well as to astonish and delight the general body of amateurs of Italian music. When Rubini formed the troupe at St. Petersburgh, Madame Viardot Garcia was the selected prima donna, and there, by the side of Madame Castellan and Mdlle Alboni, she had three triumphal seasons, the rigour of the climate alone compelling her to try a more congenial atmosphere. Finally she appeared at the Italian Opera in Berlin, and when Mademoiselle Lind had quitted the German Opera, Madame Viardot took her place in the répertoire.

Hamburg, Dresden, Frankfort, Leipzig, &c., were cities in which she created unparalleled enthusiasm. Her last engagements were at Berlin and Hamburg, in German Opera, completing her career, in March last, in the former capital. She is engaged at the Théâtre de la Nation, in Paris, for the next winter, having been expressly selected byMeyerbeer as the prima donna for his new opera of the "Prophète."

The following are the operas in which Madame Viardot Garcia has sustained characters:—Desdemona, in Rossini's "Otello;" Rossini's "Cenerentola;" Rosina, in "Il Barbiere;" Camilla, in Cimarosa's "Orazi et Curiazi; Arsace, in "Semiramide;" "Norma;" Ninetta, in "La Gazza Ladra;" Amina, in "La Sonnambula;" Romeo, in the "Capuletti e Montecchi" of Bellini and Vaccai; Lucia; "Maria di Rohan;" Leonora, in Donizetti's "Favorita." In Mozart's "Don Giovanni," she has been equally successful in Zerlina and Donna Anna. In Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" she has doubled in one night the parts of the Princess and Alice, the latter being one of her best assumptions. In Berlin, latterly, she took the amateurs by storm in Gluck's "Iphigenia en Tauride," and in Halevy's "Juive." Her Valentine, in Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," has been also the admiration of the Berlinese connoisseurs.

In every relation of private life Madame Pauline Garcia Viardot is endeared to her family and friends.

MADAME TADOLINI.

AFTER many fruitless efforts to engage her, made in former years, this celebrated prima donna has at last arrived in England. Her name and reputation are familiar not only to all dilettanti who have visited Italy or Germany, but to the musical world generally. The reason is very simple, her name is found on the title-page of the most celebrated morceaux of the more modern operas. "Il Campo dei Crociati" was expressly written by the celebrated Mercadante for Madame Tadolini, was finished, rehearsed, and on the point of being produced, when the revolution broke out at Milan. The theatre was of course immediately closed—the lyrical appeared destined the first of all the arts to suffer; the battle raging with special fury in the courtyard of the celebrated Conservatoire of Music; more than eighty cannon-balls traversing the dormitory of the fair pupils of the establishment, the future prime donne of the operas of Italy, and of all the stages of Europe. They were with great difficulty extricated at the beginning of the affray. It was this Revolution which delayed so long Madame Tadolini's arrival, first by illness excited by fear, and next by the breaking up of roads and bridges by the hostile armies.

The maiden name of Madame Tadolini was Eugenia Savorani. Her father, Filippo Savorani, was one of the most wealthy and respected citizens of the town of Forli, in the Pontifical States. He lavished every means of education on his daughter, whose beauty and intelligence, at the earliest age, were the admiration of all her friends and townsmen. Having shown great aptitude for music, the services of two celebrated professors of the hour, Favi and Grilli, were secured, and, under their able tuition, was rapidly developed that soft, tender, impassioned voice which has so long since rendered Madame Tadolini the most celebrated of Italian prime donne in Italy and in Germany. Filippo Savorani, desirous to give the musical education of his daughter the utmost finish, took her to Bologna, to study under the well-known Maestro Tadolini. This celebrated professor found that all that he could teach her was soon exhausted, and in his admiration, from a master he became a lover, and ultimately married his fair pupil. But this occurred only after much resistance, for the father of Madame Tadolini never contemplated her adopting a professional, still less a theatrical career; and this marriage was, in this respect, to seal her fate.

She shortly after her marriage left for Paris, her husband having been named conductor of the Théâtre des Italiens. Here the young singer made her debut, with the utmost success. She could, however, but bear a separation from her native land, to live and to achieve triumphs amongst her countrymen having at all times been the object of her greatest predilection. Hence her resistance to so many offers of engagement to the more distant countries. Amid the number of theatres from which she had offers, she chose La Scala, at Milan, as the most glorious arena. Her efforts were crowned with the utmost success, and engagements poured in for short or long periods from every quarter. She went from Milan to the grand theatre La Fenice, at Venice; from thence to Trieste, Turin, Genoa, Reggio, Bologna, Sinigaglia, Rome, Florence, Naples, Lucca, and ultimately to the Grand Imperial Opera La Carintzia, at Vienna, every remove being marked by a fresh triumph. The frequent renewals of her engagement at Vienna, up to the very last season, as well as her first success as a débutante at Paris, show that it is not in her native land, from indulgent countrymen alone, that she has achieved her great reputation; the most critical of audiences in other lands have confirmed the award.

As to the voice of Tadolini, it is sweet, pure, limpid, and resonant, stretching from the lowest up to the highest notes with an ease and agility truly surprising All the barbarous innovations of the new Italian school the straining and forcing of voice, as well of action, to produce effect—she has eschewed. Hers is the true Italian school of singing, which accords with her own natural genius, and that of her native language. The consequence is that her voice is matured, but not affected, by her long career of success; and when we heard her sing a cavatina, but a few days since, power, certainty of intonation, and boldness and brilliancy of embellishment, were not less remarkable than the sweetness of her voice.

Madame Tadolini will make her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre, on Tuesday next, in "Linda di Chamouni," one of the many operas expressly composed for this distinguished singer.

SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

THE fête season at this very popular place of amusement may be said to have commenced on Monday evening; when a splendid picture model of Rome painted by Danson, was first exhibited to the public. Towards nightfall the city is brilliantly illuminated; fireworks are showered from the Castle of St. Angelo; and there is also a pyrotechnic display upon the lake, or ideal Tiber. The scenic effect of the picture is strongly heightened by a variety of lights, managed so as to throw forward the massiveness of the buildings; and the spectacle is altogether very successful.

Prominent among the other novelties is a new orchestra, built on the left of the lake: it is very capacious, and will accommodate fifty performers. It is painted in appropriate style, and several busts of celebrated musical composers are introduced among the accessories. We have engraved this new attraction, which must be regarded as indicative of the good taste and enterprise of the active proprietors of the establishment.

DENMARK.

Holmsland deserves to be accounted a valuable appendage to the English [illegible] and it is expedient as at the present moment, when the unfortunate differences between Denmark and Germany threaten to involve the north of [illegible] in a war. Into this contest, if it must come, we are not unlikely to be dragged because old treaties bind us not to sit still and see Denmark mutilated. We may hope the best from diplomacy well directed. The Germans are a serious people, where the dream of nationalism does not interfere to cloud their judgment. But they are an obstinate people too, and there is no knowing into what absurdities their present leaders may hurry them. Under all these circumstances it is well for us, and probably for Europe, that we continue to hold a point where, if the worst came to the worst, our fleet may assemble.—Fraser's Magazine.

DR. CHALMERS.

It is the large white head. A large, broad-chested, old man of middle stature he seems; sixty years of age probably. Somewhat specially there is about the neck and head which attracts interest. The neck thick and powerful, assuming towards the chin and mouth t[illegible] massive contour seen in the portra[illegible]s and busts of Luther and Benjamin Franklin; the head turning on it slowly as on a pivot. The features large, rough-hewn, archaically cut, forming a whole of the noblest beauty and worth as sculptured marble. The forehead wide and expansive; the eyes small and far apart; the mouth close and sincere, as if the upper lip were drawn forcibly down over the upper teeth. No appearance of baldness; but the hair white hair parted from the crown, and clustering about the noble scott [illegible] head, compared by more than one who has seen it at that of the aged father in "the Cotter's Saturday night"—"The hyart haffets wearing thin and bare."—Lowe's Edinburgh Magazine.

WHAT ARE "LIBERTY TREES?"

The united wisdom of Gotham—the dis-united freedom of France, Germany, Denmark, Poland, Austria, Bohemia, Hungary, Lombardy, Piedmont, Naples, and Sicily—not to speak of the Courts of Rome and St. Petersburg, and the alleys of Spitalfields—seem alike unable to give a definition of what is Liberty [illegible] may be, such as may suit each honest and honest gentleman as desire to make it grow, but who have an aversion to genius, by mistake, the Gimp wear Tea Pound, or to the scattering of Indian shot too freely "within our borders," and who love the Useful and the Undiscussed from that which is slowly or ephemeral. Those who object to [illegible] would neither wood nor fruit or to such as struggle underneath our own [illegible] hours' wal[illegible] and at the foundations—or to such as labour [illegible] to [illegible] or the damp—or to such as "poison the children and the cattle"—yet all the while like to have "the new things" as well as their neighbours, would be very [illegible] of some settlement at the matter.—Dunbar Jerrold's Shilling Magazine.

CHARLES LAMB.

Lamb's repartees were often brilliant, and were greatly [illegible] by his stammer, which delayed and kept the mind in suspense for the joke [illegible] [illegible] them forth. Here is a story which has not yet been printed. On one occasion he was very unwillingly invited to a party where the room was crowded with coldrum. Their noise and tricks plag[illegible] [illegible] supper, when toasts were flyi[illegible] one man—much [illegible] Lamb's anticipation of the famous joke which [illegible] the King of New Zealand, with respect to the civilities he would receive from his new parishioners, who would offer him [illegible], saying, "there is old clergymen on the sideboard." Lamb, dissuading Manning from going to China, said, "Some say they are cannibals, and I can conceive a Turtar fellow eating my friend, and adding the cool seasoning of mustard and vinegar. I'm terrified to be trotted out at Kneepecker the second." British Quarterly Review.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

The locality of the Place de la Concorde was singularly appropriate for the commencement of the Revolution. The Pont de la Concorde is formed of the stones from the demolished Bastile, and the Place, which at first bore the name of Louis XV., afterwards took that of the Revolution, for which its present name, restored on it at the Restoration, we believe, again to be exchanged. Here, moreover, it was that the crowning sin of the first Revolution was perpetrated, for "near where the southern fountain secures eternally to have a pavement," the head of poor King Louis XVI. in the centuries [illegible] Pale Death, [illegible] its glorious obelisk, brought some years ago from Luxor, after many difficulties, and mounted with great skill. How strange has been the lot of that block of stone—through how many changes has it passed! How many human passions has it witnessed round it since it first emerged from its quarry on the Nile! What waves of moral destinies has it vo[illegible]led by it! On its native shore, the Pharaohs, Cambyses, Alexander, the Ptolemies, Cæsar, Omar, Saladin, Selim, Ali Osem, successively passed under its shadow; and here, from its base, Louis Philippe stepped out to exile! North British Review.

STREET MUSIC.

The first music is heard at early morning, whilst we are dressing. It is a harsh organ, and must be played primarily to the servants who are cleaning the door-steps its invariable air, "We may be happy yet," suggesting anticipations of the evening kitchens, swept up and clean for tea, possibly a vision of a man at noon in the general [illegible] you can [illegible] thought of the poor German or Italian soldier. The sound vanishes, and at breakfast-time a mighty instrument drawn on wheels, reminding one of a quantity of trumpets shut up in a book-case and [illegible] two minds, takes up its place, with two attendants, before the window, and bursts forth into the prayer from "Moses in Egypt" with a force perfectly [illegible] Has it been a small affair, for there is a capture in the [illegible] the case [illegible] Hither he calls [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] down his head gravely, and [illegible] another cup in the middle, which is never lifted up at all, but this constant trick, and makes it more mysterious. There is a singular circumstance [illegible] with this instrument which will be worth looking after. The one we [illegible] is accompanied by a black dog, who usually comes from the house from which former incidents have been made. He takes up on his hind legs and barks at the upper windows until the expected halfpenny is thrown out: when [illegible] one. He eats his bread [illegible] [illegible] and reserves [illegible] [illegible] up from the servants [illegible] "Curiosities of London."

COST OF MORAL AND PHYSICAL FORCE.

Moral revolutions occupy time and empty men. A thousand persons assemble in a hall—hear speeches for an evening—become convinced that they [illegible] an unwilling opponent a committee and [illegible] a few hours pleasantly, they separate. We do not debit these few thousand hours. The committee assemble at intervals—superintend the preparation of petitions—circulate tracts—obtain honorary [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] new appointments, and wearing watch guards or purses—[illegible] their aid next to selling them—determine on holding soirees—superintend the buying of tea, or the making of toast [illegible] do not trade evils these items [illegible] the slaughter of a great number of men [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

Our readers will, doubtless, recollect (more particularly from the illustrations of the event given in this Journal), that in 1845 her Majesty's sloops Erebus and Terror left our shores on their attempt to explore the north-west passage into the Pacific, and to take a series of magnetic observations required to complete the set which has been obtained from every other part of the globe. The Expedition, under the command of Captain Sir John Franklin, sailed from Greenhithe, May 19, 1845. The vessels are engraved, with a portrait of the intrepid Commander, in our Journal for May 24; and, the expected intelligence of the voyagers not having been received, we now, at the distance of three years from their departure, have to illustrate the last of three expeditions, which has just sailed in search of Sir John Franklin and his gallant companions.

About a year since, it was publicly stated that great fears were entertained as to the fate of Franklin and the officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror. These apprehensions were somewhat quieted by this assurance in the Church and State Gazette, "that the friends and relations of the officers and crews of these vessels are as yet under no apprehensions as to their safety, and it may be satisfactory to the public, and the means of allaying all uneasiness, to know that Captain Sir John Franklin, previous to leaving Woolwich, desired his officers and crews to inform their friends that they could not expect to hear from them after they entered the ice until the month of October, 1847,—when he trusted they would be successful, and vessels would meet them after accomplishing the objects of their voyage of discovery."

As these hopes were not realised, in the autumn of last year, Government resolved to send out three expeditions in search of Sir John Franklin and his party One was forthwith dispatched to Behrings Straits; the second has just sailed for Baffin's Bay; and the third consists of an overland Expedition under the direction of Sir John Richardson.

Sir James Ross, whose whole life may be said to have been passed in the Arctic and Antarctic seas, has superintended the fitting out of the two vessels which have just sailed—the Enterprise, under his own command; and the Investigator, Captain Bird an experienced officer on the Polar voyages.

The ships, from their build and internal arrangements, are eminently calculated for the service in which they will be engaged, especially in great strength, admirably disposed for resisting the pressure of the ice The Enterprise is the larger ship, being of 450 tons, and having a draught of water 15 feet 3 inches; it is of teak-wood, and the builders are Messrs. Wigram. The Investigator is of 400 tons, with a draught of 15 feet, and was built by Messrs. Green. The last of these vessels is to remain on the edge of the ice, whilst the Enterprise is to enter it; for this purpose the bow is of extra strength, the cutwater or stem is filled up, and is quite sharp, in order to cut through the ice, and not to hold it; and the bow has upwards of 7 feet solid thickness of timber.

To show the policy of this extra strength, we have engraved the keel of the Terror, with the injury she received in one of her voyages, by the crushing of the ice, when upwards of 20 feet of the keel and 10 feet of the stern-post were driven over on one side, leaving a frightful chasm astern, for the free entrance of the water; when the vessel would have sunk, had she not been run on shore.

Both the Enterprise and Investigator are fitted alike; and a roof, similar to the roof of a dwelling-house, has been constructed for each ship, to be put upon deck, between the masts, in the event of having to winter in the Arctic regions. All the officers have cabins, which, though small, are very conveniently arranged, and each contains an iron tube, which, in very cold weather, will be filled with heated air, to proceed from a furnace, placed in the hold of the ship, and from which branches proceed all round it. We have engraved this furnace, which is remarkable for consuming a very small quantity of coal. In the Illustration is shown the main-pipe, and the flat air-chamber, whence the air, after running beneath the upper deck, is diffused through the cabins by small tubes.

The men sleep in hammocks hung up on the lower deck, and it is calculated that when the thermometer "above" is at 40° below zero, there will be a temperature "below" of 40°, or 8° above the freezing point. Each ship is stocked with three years' provisions, consisting of pemican, preserved meats, and vegetables, and the usual salt junk of the Navy.

We have also engraved the implements provided for cutting out the ice, the forms of which sufficiently denote their respective uses.

There have likewise been constructed two steam launches, for keeping up communication between the ships These launches were built by Mr. Thomson, of Rotherhithe, and they are fitted with engines of five-horse power, by Mr. Beale, of East Greenwich. Each launch is fifty-three feet long, by six feet beam, three feet three inches deep, draws seventeen inches aft, thirteen inches fore, or fifteen inches mean. Diameter of her paddles six feet five inches, propelled by one rotary engine which has a pinion wheel on the outside of the shaft of the engine, driving a larger wheel upon the shaft of the paddle wheel, so that when the engine makes 270 revolutions in a minute, the paddle-wheel makes sixty. The total weight of the engine, condenser, pumps, paddle-wheels, boiler and its contents, is about 2½ tons, and the power of the engine, at a pressure of forty-five pounds to the inch, would be about twenty-three horses, calculated power; nominal power about that of eight horses. Her speed may be stated at twelve miles per hour, upon the surface of a still lake, such as the smooth water between the icebergs of the Arctic regions.

WARMING APPARATUS.

The warm clothing for the expedition has been supplied by Messrs. Silver & Co., Cornhill, and Mr. E. B. Roberts, of Moorgate-street. We have here engraved one of the Weather Helmets, which covers the head, throat, and neck, so that the face only is exposed. The Snow Shoe is, in the outer part, of wood: the interior of the skin of moose deer, cut into strips, and the feet, after being covered by blankets, are fastened by sandal gartering. The Caps are of seal-skin, lined with fur; and the Gloves, or Gauntlets, are of the same. The Snow Spectacles have wooden frames: in the engraving the inside and exterior of a pair are shown. There are, also, Weather Garments, consisting of helmet, coat, and trousers, the latter with soles to them; all made from impervious cloth, covered and seamed, so as to be waterproof as metal, and thus to encase all except the face.

The ships are to be towed by two Government steamers clear of the land; and, at about 300 miles north of the Orkneys, they will be left to pursue their way alone, towards and among the ice. The route to be taken has already been published; but the following are a few additional particulars. Should the Expedition not discover the Erebus and Terror in the neighbourhood of Davis's Straits, Baffin's Bay, or Lancaster Sound, the Enterprise, under the command of Sir James Ross, will proceed on towards Melville Island, where she will winter; and the Investigator, under the command of Captain Bird, will pass the winter in Wellington Inlet, and by means of the steam launch, fitted with a screw propeller, communicate with the whalers, and explore the adjacent coast. Constant communication will also be kept up between the two ships by means of the Enterprise's launch.

STEAM LAUNCH.

Early in the summer of 1849 two parties will start from the Enterprise, in different directions, for the continent of America; and, if practicable, touch at places previously agreed upon in the neighbourhood of the Mackenzie River, where they expect to meet with Sir John Richardson and his party Should they succeed in reaching the land, and not fall in with Sir John Richardson, they will make for Cape Bathurst, Cape Parry, and Fort Good Hope, where Sir John has been directed to leave bags of pemican for the use of the parties While those proceedings are being carried on by parties detached from the ship, those remaining behind will search in that immediate neighbourhood the probable places where Sir John Franklin may be hampered; and, from the systematic plans that will be adopted, there is little doubt but their efforts will be crowned with success, and our gallant countrymen in the Erebus and Terror rescued from their perilous condition.

The following are the names of the officers of the ships:—

WEATHER HELMET AND CAP.

It should be added that a reward of upwards of 100 guineas has also been offered to any of the whale ships which may bring information of the expedition, the actual amount of the reward depending upon the authenticity and value of the information conveyed. They have also been invited to look out for any of the copper cylinders which Sir John Franklin was directed to throw overboard daily on reaching 65 deg north.

"We believe," says the Athenæum, "that the other measures taken by the Admiralty, in a more liberal spirit, are efficient for their purpose; but the fears of a wife have naturally outrun official fears; and Lady Franklin has herself occupied the ground which the Admiralty treats as a superfluage—taking her scale from the

She has issued a notice offering a reward of £2000, with the view of inducing any whaling ship which, returns to Davis's Straits or Baffin's Bay to make search in ports not within the scope of the expedition sent out by Government. Her lady-ship intimates that in order that there may be no misunderstanding about the rewards, the matter shall be referred to the following gentlemen, whose decision shall be final, three gentlemen having kindly consented to act as referees in the matter.—Admiral Beaufort, Capt. ## THE COMMUNIST INSURRECTION IN PARIS.

The ultras of the French Republic, including the partizans of Louis Blanc, Cabet, and the Communists, as well as the violent Clubbists, who own the leadership of Blanqui, Raspail, and Sobrier, have made and failed in an attempt to overturn the existing Government. Anything more wild and abominable than the invasion of the National Assembly by these organised mobs, it is impossible to conceive. Upon the pretext of a demonstration in favour of Poland, they surrounded the Chamber, took forcible possession of it, and proclaimed the deposition of the Government, the dissolution of the Legislature, and a new Provisional Government, composed of the leading Communists. During the whole of the forenoon of Monday, it seemed as if the very daring of the deed had made it successful; but in the afternoon the National Guards and the Gardes Mobiles, called together from all quarters of Paris and the banlieue, and aided by the troops of the line, changed the aspect of affairs, drove the intruders out of the Chamber, re-established order, and arrested Barbès, Raspail, Blanqui, Sobrier, and other leaders; together with Courtais, the Commander of the National Guard, who had proved false to his trust, and aided instead of repressing the the insurrection. The result is that the Government is more firmly fixed than ever. The most formidable attempt that has yet been made against it has proved powerless. The violent party has received a blow from which it cannot recover, and the friends of order have shown that they are in a majority so overwhelming as to leave not the slightest chance for those extreme and dissatisfied politicians who desire a new convulsion. All this affords matter for rejoicing, both for France and Europe. It would, indeed, have been a scandal, if a legislative Assembly elected under such auspices as that which has just commenced its sittings at Paris, and representing, as it does, the whole people, should have been dispossessed of power by the people before it had even commenced the mighty task for which it was called together. The mere attempt to overawe and to dissolve it shows how large a proportion of the mob of Paris are utterly ignorant of the meaning of the liberty which they so loudly proclaim. At the same time, the speedy and bloodless, but most effectual manner in which the insurrection was quelled, shows that the bulk of the French people are wiser than these noisy and reckless mobs, and that there is much reason to hope for the peaceful consolidation of a strong and free Government in Paris. One truth is rendered very apparent by these events—which is, that no insurrection can ever attain the dignity and success of a revolution, unless it be aided by the middle classes. The mob of Paris could not have overthrown the Government of Louis Philippe, without the moral as well as the physical support which they derived from the bourgeoisie. Wherever a movement of this kind is successful, the middle classes participate in it. So it was in Paris, in February; in Milan, Berlin, and Vienna, in March; and so it will ever be. When the middle classes are justly dissatisfied with a Government, and the labouring classes share their dissatisfaction, the change of that Government is not far distant; but when the labouring classes, without the aid and sympathy of the great bulk of the industrial, trading, and professional community, attempt a revolution, they can do no more than make an insurrection, which is sure to be quelled to their disadvantage. Physical force cannot make revolutions in our day, unless there be a moral force to back it. Of this moral force the Clubbists and Communists of Paris have not a particle. Hence their failure. The lesson, we trust, will not be thrown away either in France or elsewhere.

The singular weakness of the insurrectionary party is shown by the utter absence of even a rallying cry on the memorable morning of Monday. They knew perfectly well that Communism was unpopular with most people, and detested by many, and that there was not the slightest chance for a movement having for its object the "organization of labour" as desired by Louis Blanc, or the establishment of an Icaria upon the plan of M. Cabet, in which property should be abolished, and men should live and labour together like bees in a hive, or beavers in the mud-banks of a river. They knew that the strong common-sense of the great bulk of the nation was against them, and that any of the watchwords of Communism would weaken their demonstration, and bring it into contempt. Hence it was necessary to find or make some cry which would touch the chord of popular sympathy. As a pis aller they adopted that of Polish independence; a matter which, however interesting to the French, has nothing to do with the great practical questions that now clamour for solution in France itself, and which consequently failed to create enthusiasm. The cry of "Vive la Pologne!" was soon discovered to be a sham; and Barbès and his friends, throwing off the mask, avowed themselves what they were by circulating lists of a new Provisional Government, in which none but Communists appeared. This was sufficient to unite the mass of the bourgeoisie and people against them, rendering easy of execution the task of putting them down. Barbès, Courtais, Albert (ouvrier), Raspail, Blanqui, and the rest, will have leisure to reflect, in the solitude of their captivity at Vincennes, upon the mistake they have made as regards the temper of their countrymen, and upon the heinous crime they have committed against the representatives of the people. Whatever individually may be their fate, their party cannot fail to see the powerlessness of violence, and to stand for the future in salutary awe of a Government that is supported with such enthusiasm by an armed people.

Hitherto, M. de Lamartine, and the enlightened and courageous men who act with and support him, in and out of the Legislature, have derived their strength from their moderation. They have proclaimed the principle of the Revolution to be the fraternity of humanity, and its object the peace and happiness of all men. They have abolished the punishment of death for political offences; they have allowed the utmost liberty of discussion; they have affirmed every right that is valuable to individuals and communities; and have testified, in every possible manner, and upon every fitting occasion, their desire for peace abroad, and order and tranquillity at home. They have desired to rule by reason, not by the sword; and to persuade, rather than to coerce. It is difficult in all circumstances to adhere to such moderation; and if, in the face of events such as the insurrection of Monday, the Government should overstep a little the non-coercive portion of their policy, they will not greatly merit blame. Already, impelled by an overwhelming necessity, they have departed from one principle which they were the means of establishing in February. They have practically abolished the right of free discussion by closing the Clubs. There was, however, no alternative. The right of free discussion was abused, and the safety of the Republic was imperilled by the conduct of men like Blanqui, who preached daily and hourly the duty of insurrection and the holiness of violence. But having taken this step under the pressure of imperative necessity, it is to be hoped that the Government and the Assembly will not allow themselves to go further. They have possession of the persons of the ringleaders, and must bring them to trial and to punishment. If they will forget the immense provocation received, and the suicidal wickedness of the crime, and spare the lives of the criminals, the triumph of the moderate party will be a glorious one. The insane conspirators, in one of their proclamations, demanded the "guillotine" as the purification for French political society; and the fanatics of the party look upon the "Terror" exercised by Marat and Danton, and afterwards by Robespierre, Collot d'Herbois, and others, as a wholesome system which it would be advantageous to revive; but the Government and the Assembly will, there is little fear, continue to hold as sacred the life granted by the majority by M. de Lamartine, that the punishment of death shall be obliterated from the political code of France. That the lives of even these desperadoes should not be declared forfeited, would be indeed a moral victory of which the Revolution would have just reason to be proud.

Though it has been a great price to pay, the cause of order and stability has, doubtless, gained greatly by the event of Monday. The strength, good sense, and good feeling of the majority have been shown; the weakness and folly of the extreme party have been demonstrated, and the most violent and dangerous of the theorists and fanatics have been deprived of future opportunities for mischief and confusion. These are great results. It is to be hoped that all parties in France will combine to turn them to good account, and to the peaceful consolidation of a firm and equitable Government.

THE WAR BETWEEN GERMANY AND DENMARK.

(From a Correspondent at Copenhagen.)

It is said that when discussing, a year or two ago, the chances of war or peace with a foreign diplomatist, the cunning old Louis Philippe unfolding a map of Europe, and pointing at Schleswig, said, "From this little spot will come the spark which is to put Europe in a blaze." These words have only partially been true. The Government of the King of the Belgians has succeeded in averting a general outbreak in Europe; but the actual war, the arming of one nation against another, which is every day appearing more unavoidable, as well on land as at sea, has received its impetus from the very same ground out of which the King of the Barricades. It is, however, more than questionable whether these strange and sinister forebodings would have been realised, had it not been for the ambitious views of several treacherous princes (those of Augustenburg and Gluecksburg), established in Schleswig, and nearly connected with the reigning King of Denmark by the ties of blood and allegiance, by whom the standard of revolt was raised, the Duke of Glucksburg pretending to be very severely used by a long time, and the Prince, his younger brother, executing the final plan in the following manner. On the 24th March (on the very day that the King of Denmark called a liberal Ministry into office) the Prince of Noer left Kiel with a couple of hundred soldiers of the garrison for the town and fortress of Rendsburg. On arriving there he got the garrison convoked (although having no command whatsoever), and told them, in a seemingly excited state, as the Liberal party had paid violent hands on the King at Copenhagen, and secured his person, he had thought it his duty to put himself at the head of the Government in the King's name. Lieutenant-Colonel Hedemann, who found, that the latest and most positive news affirmed that the King had chosen a new Ministry, agreeable to the principles which he had always advocated, which proved that his Majesty was fully free, &c. &c., and that, consequently, then, false it is a revolt," the Prince got pale, and said with a trembling voice, "You may call me a scoundrel if I do not lay down the command in the hands of the King as soon as [illegible] have three Duchies of Denmark has shown himself at the head of [illegible] in Schleswig, the Prince of Noer continuing in the command of the insurrectionary troops, supported by Prussia and other allies.

What are the real points at issue between the King of Denmark and his Duchies of Schlesw ; and Holstein (a country called "Schleswig-Holstein" does not any more exist, than one called "Scotland-Ireland"), and where is the injustice on the part of King Frederick, calling citizens and vassals over his head from all Germany? These questions have repeated, y been most ably discussed answered in the English Parliament and by the Times and Morning Chronicle. I will take another direction, and briefly, very briefly, explain what, [illegible] has been most terribly confused by the philosophical smoke of German professor- tracts are from a short and concise pamphlet now much read at Paris, en- Verité sur la Question de Schleswig, par L. E. Herring, Gerant de la République Universelle des Lettres, Paris, April, 1848, rue Lebègue." The arguments of this brochure, which is chiefly addressed to a foreign people to enlighten their views on a matter now much talked of, but little understood, run as follows:

"A civil war is now ravaging the Duchy of Schleswig, appertaining to Denmark. The German newspapers, through whose columns the first news from that quarter is spread, have undertaken to prove that the majority of the inhabitants of Schleswig consists of German elements. This is false: it is proved by the latest census returns, made in 1845, under the auspices of the treacherous German officials, that of 320,000 inhabitants in the Duchy, 180,000 are speaking Danish, 25,000 are the so-termed Frisians, formerly on the Western Islands, speaking a peculiar dialect of their own, and 115,000 speak German. Nevertheless, the papers of Hamburg and Germany generally have spread the report that Schleswig is desirous of separating itself from Denmark for the purpose of entering in the German Confederation, and that this present war is the result of a popular movement. Nothing could be further from the truth: it is a gross imposition, originating with parties whose ambitious views and personal and pecuniary interests are thereby furthered. It is, in reality, a revolt, headed and directed by a batch of ten of the most insignificant princes in the world (those of Gluecksburg and Augustenburg), who, having scarcely any territory of their own, try to get some importance by conquering a dukedom. The Schleswig Danes, the lower and working classes, are mostly mariners or agricultural labourers; their income and fortune small—no one thinking about them as voters in the only exclusive electoral law of the Duchies; the elections we - in the hands of the nobl- and their dependents and the rich commercial people. The Deputies of the Provincial States reunited, therefore, mostly but the higher classes in our circumstances, speaking the German language; they were the mouthpieces of the German minority, and the German Diet has been sadly mistaken in believing its plan for the annexation of Schleswig secured by a majority of the people of Schleswig. Let the electoral law be reformed, and based on the principle of universal suffrage of those who have attained the age of thirty years, which is now becoming the law of Denmark, and Europe will see that the result will be very different.

"There exists no kind of right - ride for the German Diet or any other power to interfere in favour of the German Prince. The right, by treaties, is clearly in favour of Denmark. England and [illegible] once have at different times guaranteed Schleswig to the Danes, viz. in 1720 and 1743: these treaties have never been broken, the present Ministers of foreign affairs in England having lately acknowledged their full validity, and the treaty of Vienna has likewise guaranteed the integrity of the Danish Monarchy. But putting the treaties aside, the Salic law is likewise in favour of the Danes. Schleswig was, from the most remote times, Danish. History proves, that when the German ecclesiastics in the 16th century came to preach the Reformation in Schleswig, nobody could understand them or their language, and that they had to teach some of the inhabitants German, in order to use them as interpreters for their sacred mission. The names of the villages and towns of the duchy prove most clearly their Danish origin. Skarby, as it is written, is composed of Vig, which is the Danish word for gulf, bay; and Skarby, the name of the river or inlet, where the principal town is built. Hadeby, Arnbeck, and an hundred other names of villages on the west borders of Eider, prove their Scandinavian origin and nomenclature.

"But, say the German enthusiasts, 'the German Fatherland' extends itself [illegible] German tongue is spoken: if that is to be the law of Europe, why [illegible] Alsace and the Lorraine? A considerable minority of the inhabitants [illegible] speak but Danish; and in all well organised associations it is [illegible] rity, and not the minority, which decides. It is, however, a fact of [illegible] nage which constitutes the nationality, but the habits, religion, and laws, and above all, the historical ties and associations are important elements. The [illegible] law on the whole judicial organisation of the Duchy now in force is King Waldemar's Law of Jutland,' given in the year 1340, whereas in Holstein [illegible]

"The Schleswig-Danish population of Schleswig repudiate the idea of an incorporation in Germany, and consequent separation from Denmark; it is proved [illegible] number in which the war-fund was going on in the Duchy, the peasants [illegible] to give it [illegible] with reluctance, and [illegible] to defend themselves against their tyrannical masters.

"The inhabitants of the Danish Island Alsen, where the insurrectionary Duke has his principal seat and property, are all in arms, and supporting the Danish cause with the utmost zeal, and mostly as volunteers, their only fear being the idea of ever seeing their former Lord of Augustenburg again. It is also a notorious fact that the 11th battalion of infantry, consisting only of Schleswigers has been the most indefatigable of the heroic Danish army, fighting against the German Princes at Flensburg and Schleswig, with the greatest courage and with unshaken fidelity; whereas the Prince of Noer fled with his followers when hearing the report of the first Danish cannon. It may also be mentioned that the Danish recruits which were ordered to join their regiments from the Duchy, came in great numbers, though prevented by the fluctuations, who embraced the cause of the revolt.

"Let, therefore, all those who sincerely embrace the cause of the people and of nationality, unite to combat this insurrection of Princes, and the much more dangerous and unwarrantable aggressive plans of the Germanic Diet, which are now beginning most seriously to endanger the political equilibrium of Europe. Schleswig is but a small country; but it has fine ships, ports, and mariners, and the idea of a 'German Navy' is the rage, particularly of the inland states of Germany, who have not even salt water or ships, and think that a navy may be created as a railroad, or other similar institution of commerce or necessity, on subscription, or by shares, no other mode offering. The German nation is now pretending to establish itself into one solid mass, and one of its first resolutions tends to destroy the nationality of a neighbour; let other neighbours then beware, and join the Danes in repulsing such arrogant and brutal conduct of numerically superior forces against a smaller state. The Danish race counts people of two millions, but they cling most faithfully to their nationality. ion at least sympathy for their just cause, and the moral support of all who are not blinded by pride, ignorance, and fanaticism. From that brotherhood in the North—descendants of the trusty and warlike Scandinavians they expect a more tangible mark of sympathy: as their 'Fatherland,' in bygone times, used to mingle their blood in sign of the inviolable fidelity in life and death, so their warriors may now make it their common cause to put a stop to the aggressive violence of modern Germany."

The annexed Illustration presents a striking picture of Danish troops leaving Copenhagen for the seat of war. The enthusiasm animating the Danes in the defence of their country and the rights of their King, is a spectacle well worthy of notice. The lord and the peasant have enrolled themselves as volunteers in the ranks of the different regiments, and their valour has been proved at Bau, Flensburg, and Schleswig. The King of Denmark—perhaps the most popular Prince on the Continent at the present day—has visited the battle-fields in the Duchy, and administered comfort and consolation to the dying and sick. Returned to his residence at Copenhagen, his first act was to dismiss all household troops, and confide his person to the love of his faithful subjects.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Peace and quietness must not, it appears, be hoped for under the Republic—at least not for some months to come. We have had another outbreak a gigantic demonstration—an invasion of the National Assembly—even an overthrow of the Government, and the establishment of another Government instead; in short, we have had nothing less than a regular revolution. Fortunately, however, the revolution of Monday is the reverse of inspecting many criminals an hour. The audacious leaders of it were, at the end of that time, ignominiously seized by the collar, and as ignominiously walked off to durance vile, where they still remain. All this is a sad sunset to some sacred peaceable folk. We have had quite enough of demonstrations, tumults, and their attendant anxieties —enough of the marchings and counter-marchings of National Guards and troops—enough of émeutes, and more than enough of bristling bayonets. But, as the old adage says, "it is an ill wind that blows nobody good;" and what to [illegible] dreadful bore at best, and at times a most serious subject of alarm, proves [illegible] subscribers to the journals by the expense of inspecting many criminals an hour. Happy creatures they! They see all that passes in Paris without the misfortune of being in the midst of it!

Among the mass of works which have issued from the press within the last few days, I observed one called "Medicine in a Republican point of view," another the "Republican Gardener," a third "On the Diseases of Horses, by a thorough Republican," and there are several more of the titles equally absurd. Do the political zealots who connect them endeavour to vie in solemn absurdity with Cromwell's fanatics and the old Scotch Presbyterians?

The clubs are crying out against the decree of Monday being allowed to exist in public places; and as Lyons the people have already had the brazen image of one monarch removed. But though France has become Republican, she has not forgotten that she was for a long succession of years governed by so many despots; and to disarm those of her Monarchs as for instance Henri IV. and Louis XIV., who contributed greatly to her power and glory. Neither is she disposed to deprive them of the honours which, after all, for most of them, are the only ones [illegible] mortal) of being allowed to figure in public places in marble and in bronze.

It is curious to see what complete extinguisher the Revolution has put on the smallest [illegible] of literature. Before the Revolution, the readers of newspapers and periodicals were continually occupied with the sayings, and doings, and scribblings of Jules Janin, the Théophile Gautiers, the Alexandre Dumas, and other of the illustrious writers of the day, who, according to the men, to be sure; but they puffed each other so outrageously, puffed themselves so impudently, and got up such a noise so constantly before the public, that, even in spite of the contempt one felt for them, one read what they wrote, and talked about what they said. But, poor fellows! their "glory," as they used to call it, has completely departed. Nobody cares a fig for their productions—nobody even knows if they write feuilletons at all. The Revolution has done for them. Lord Byron told us that he once went to bed obscure and rose famous: these people went to bed famous on the 23rd February, rose on the 24th; and obscure, no doubt, they will remain to the end of their mortal existence.

But though it was enormously ridiculous to see such insignificant scribblers as these referred to, speaking of each other as if they were men of the greatest genius, and gravely recording what they did and said, and how they lived, as if anybody cared a straw about them, yet it is impossible not to admire the spirit of perseverance which they displayed. No doubt it is they gave one to the other to struggle into notoriety anon in a great measure, perhaps wholly, from selfish motives; but, even with that drawback, it was better to see good-will manifested, than their bitter spirit of envy and detraction which is so common—one may say universal in the literary circles of England.

Little change, generally speaking, has taken place either for the better or the worse in the city. The theatres, restaurants, and even cafés, together with shops of all kinds, are doing a very indifferent business. There are few great families at Paris, and what there are live in a very modest manner. There is little or no gaiety, and none of the public amusements, with the exception of the dancing-gardens, and they are triste.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

The already detailed account of the occurrences of Monday in Paris render it unnecessary, under the head of "National Assembly," to do more than mention what occurred in the Chamber up to the moment when the mob burst in.

The President took the chair at twelve o'clock.

M. Derance presented the proposition of a decree to the effect that "Algeria henceforward forms part of France, and the French subjects in Algeria shall be governed by the same laws and constitution as those on the Continent." He should call on the Assembly to have this matter considered in the public sitting of the next day. (Cries of "No, no.") Finally, it was referred to the committee on Algeria.

The President read a letter from M. Béranger, declaring that if there was anything due to him as a member of the late Provisional Government, which he had received from the President, declaring that the National Assembly refused to accept his resignation of his seat amongst them. He had, however, again to entreat them to allow him to remain in his privacy, and from a distance contemplate their labours for the welfare of France.

The Chamber, being consulted, decided that his resignation should be accepted.

The order of the day was the interpellations relative to Italy.

M. Bastide, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, ascended the tribune, and read, in a very indistinct voice, the following declaration, which he made before the Chamber. He believed that the Government felt the greatest sympathy for Italy, and that if its aid was required, it would certainly think itself bound to afford it. No intervention had been demanded by Italy, consequently the French Government had not been in the position to grant it or refuse it. The Government now established in France wished to carry out a system of moderation; it aimed at no conquest; its greatest ambition was to be strong at home, and to see French institutions organisators of the country. It would endeavour, as much as possible, to avoid war; but if, from the course of events, such an event was unfortunately to take place, it would act with vigour. The treaties of 1814 and 1815 had been destroyed for ever; but France did not intend, on that account, rushing unnecessarily into war. Her conduct would depend on the course of events.

It appeared that the question which the Minister had not spoken explicitly enough on the question before the Assembly. What he (M. d'Aragon) wanted to know was, if the Provisional Government had taken steps to show Austria that she must make no attempt on Piedmont, or would order Du Taillis. For his part, he should not be satisfied if a single Austrian soldier remained in Italy. He must again ask the honourable Minister to give more precise information to the Assembly.

M. de Lamartine said, that since the questions of Italy and Poland had been brought forward for the same day, he would ask permission to reply at the same time to both. When the question of Poland was unfortunately brought forward, he had endeavour not to leave the slightest doubt in any man's mind about [illegible] and wishes of the Government on those to- [illegible]

" Wolowski then ascended the tribune, and spoke on Poland. Just as the honourable Member began to speak, a sound reached the interior of the Chamber of shouting outside. The sound became every moment louder and louder, and in the [illegible] on a stormy day, but nothing else. After a while, the [illegible] sound assist violent [illegible] ing, and said: Let the doors of the hall be closed [illegible] from the efforts of men outside to get in. Suddenly the doors of the Chamber were pushed open, and a number of representatives, who had been in the committe- rooms, hurried in and took their places.

The President: I must request every member to keep his seat. The utmost order is necessary.

M. Wolowski attempted to go on, but every member was evidently occupied with the noise coming from outside.

The tumultuous scene that ensued has been described in another column.

TUESDAY.—Extraordinary precautions had been adopted for the protection of the Assembly. All the streets leading to the palace, the quays, and Place de la Concorde, were occupied at an early hour by the National Guard and the Garde Mobile, and the thoroughfares were stopped for half-a-mile around. Nobody was permitted to cross the Place de la Concorde, except members of the Assembly and reporters, on exhibiting their cards, and cantonniers, carrying provisions to the detachments stationed at the extremity of all the streets and avenues. The palace and gardens of the palace were defended by a numerous garrison, and two pieces of artillery were pointed on the bridge. These precautions were not unnecessary, for at the very hour the Assembly met, the masses were deliberating in the neighbourhood of the Bastile, under the presidency of the notorious Huber, who, having been arrested and deprived in one of the municipalities, escaped through the culpable connivance of one of the municipal officers. Huber proposed either to march in arms to Vincennes to deliver the prisoners, who had been removed to the Castle during the night, or to proceed to the Palace of the National Assembly, and require their immediate liberation.

The Hall of the Assembly bore marks of the damage committed by the rabble on the previous day. The panels of several doors had not yet been repaired, and the decorations soiled by the filthy visitors still exhibited traces of their passage

At eleven o'clock, one of the Secretaries read the procès verbal, describing the scenes and violence of the previous day, which were listened to in solemn silence. The President afterwards rose, and said that he wished to give the Assembly some personal explanations. Yielding to the entreaties of a number of friends and members of the people, and with a view to protect their lives ("Say your own," exclaimed a member), which he had every reason to consider in the utmost danger, he had written to the officer in command of the National Guard to prevent the arrest of the municipal officers of Paris. Orders had been issued to the morning to arrest a number of persons, and in the evening other measures equally energetical had been taken. The house in which Sobrier resided had been surrounded and entered, and that individual, with 76 of his men, arrested, and the warlike stores illegally placed in his possession: seized by the National Guard. The Club of the Rights of Man, which assembled at the Palais Royal, was closed, and its papers seized. The club over which Blanqui presided had likewise been closed, and the Committee was determined not to allow, in future, any seditious meeting to deliberate in arms. The prisoners had all been transferred to the Castle of Vincennes. Among these were Barbès, Blanqui, Albert, Sobrier, Raspail, father and nephew, Colonel Saisset, and others. The brave and glorious army, with which the members of the Executive Commission had fraternised, had been called to Paris; and all the regiments quartered in the neighbouring towns had already arrived. The Government had, moreover, pronounced the dissolution, dispersion, and disarmament of the Corps of Montagnards. As to the Firebrands of Rome, they had found in its chief a complete obedience, but had thought proper to change the personnel with whom he was surrounded. They had entrusted the command of the National Guard and army to the celebrated General Oudinot and to General Bedeau. Full satisfaction should be given to public opinion and to the National Assembly. M. Garnier-Pagès said that he might enter into other particulars which it would be well to communicate to the Chamber, but that the responsibilities of the nation might rest assured that the Executive Council would neglect nothing to respond to the confidence they had placed in them.

After an interrogation of M. Recurt, Prefect of Police, by several members, then followed, in explanation of many of the circumstances of Monday and the days preceding, connected with the disorders. M. Caussidière's explanations do not appear to give the Assembly satisfaction.

WEDNESDAY. On this day the same military precautions had been adopted round the legislative palace, but on a less extensive scale than on Tuesday, and the public generally were quite tranquil. The Quays and the adjoining streets. A battery of artillery was stationed in one of the courts, and the hall was placed under the exclusive protection of the troops of the line and two battalions of the National Guard of Melun and Montereau, who arrived during the night.

At twelve o'clock M. Buchez, the President, took the chair.

The President read a letter from M. Caussidière, the Prefect of Police, tendering his resignation as Member of the Assembly. After some conversation, the resignation was accepted

M. Caussidière had also resigned his functions of Préfect of Police of Paris, but was to remain in office until his successor was appointed.

The Assembly afterwards proceeded to elect a committee of 18 members, specially charged with drawing up the constitution.

SPAIN.

Accounts from Madrid, of the 9th inst., referring to the insurrectionary movement, and its consequences, mention that the Danish Minister had been recalled, and the authorities were preparing to enter that of the Belgian Minister, when the latter protested against that violation of his domicile. The police had arrested Christino Martinez and Salamanca, and sent in a very unsettled state, no confidence being placed in some of the troops.

The Gazette contains a decree countersigned by Senor Bertran de Lis, and dated the 14th inst., by which the Queen is to sell 25,000 quintals of quicksilver at home or abroad, on account of the Government. The decree states that the contract entered into with the Fomento Company in June last has now been rescinded, and that the quicksilver is to be put up again, but in the meantime the present measure is necessary to meet the urgent necessities of the present monetary c-.

On the 13th, a decree was published, ordering the dissolution of the regiment of Espana. The corporals and sergeants are to be reduced to the ranks. The superior and subaltern officers are to be placed on the retired list.

The drum-major of the regiment of Espana was executed on that day.

It is the opinion of the best informed military authorities that considerable disaffection prevails in the Spanish army

Several persons have been ordered to quit Madrid. Amongst others, General Zabala, M. Buschental, and an Englishman named Samson

A further correspondence of an unsatisfactory nature was s to have taken place between Mr. Bulwer and the Duke of Sotomayor.

AUSTRIA.

At Vienna, up to the 18th, tranquility continued undisturbed. The committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the working classes had appealed to the citizens to furnish supplies for the relief of their distressed fellow-citizens. The committee consisted of 40 members (one female), as well as the order of Jesuits, is definitively suppressed in Austria. Count Hoyos, the Commander of the National Guard, remains in office, in accordance with the wishes of the majority.

The following are the more important provisions of the law which has been just published in Vienna for regulating the elections of the first Austrian Parliament:—The Chamber is to consist of 383 members. The number of the members of the Senate is not to exceed 200, to consist of the Princes of the Blood, 150 chosen from and by the chief landed proprietors for the duration of the Upper or Lower Chamber, in case of those parts of the monarchy which are enumerated in the document proclaiming the constitution

The Ministry had ordered the elections in Bohemia for the German Parliament to be suspended until [illegible]

[illegible] excitement had been caused in Vienna by the announcement that Palacky, one of the chief leaders of the Schwarzlan party in Prague, was to be appointed Minister of Public Instruction. In consequence of the strong feeling manifested against it, the appointment was withdrawn. Baron Doblhoff has been nominated to the Ministry of Trade and Agriculture, and Herr Andreas Baumgartner to that of Public Works.

PRUSSIA.

The Assembly for deliberating on the new Constitutional Code has been convoked according to the following:—"We, Frederic William, &c., have resolved that the deliberative assembly of the Prussian constituent, shall, after the conclusion of the elections of the deputies, chosen according to the basis of the new electoral law of the 8th of April, be opened on the 22d of May, in our capital and residentiary city of Berlin. We hereby summon the elected representatives of our faithful people for th- 22d of May first; and charge our Minister of State to make the further r

" Potsdam, May 13, 1848." (Countersigned by the Minister.)

According to the latest advices from Berlin great excitement continued to [illegible] and respecting the return of the Prince of Prussia. A deputation of the Berlin students had waited upon the Minister Camphausen, and another from the burghers upon the Minister Von Schwerin, to protest against the recall of the Prince of Prussia, as a measure calculated to endanger the peace of the capital. M. Camphausen promised to submit the prayer to the King. Similar addresses had been presented from Cologne, Dusseldorf, &c.

POLISH PRUSSIA

Accounts from Posen, of the 12th, state that the disarming of the insurgents was beginning in good earnest. The whole of the artillery taken from the Poles, namely 11 small cannon and 3 howitzers, had been brought to Posen. Mieroslawski has been taken, and conducted to Posen. The incorporation of Posen with Germany was celebrated in that town on the 13th instant

ITALIAN STATES

LOMBARDY.—The operations of the hostile armies at the seat of war have been, according to the advices received this week, more brisk than hitherto

On the 8th, an engagement had taken place in front of the city of V... Complete success attended all the operations ... drawn about 4 or 5 o'clock, all the Piedmontese army retired in position on the hills overlooking the plain of Verona, from Busselengo on the Upper Adige, to Vallegio on the Mincio. The loss on the part of the Austrians was unknown, but was considered very heavy; and the Sardinians suffered severely, and it was said that they lost no less than 1200 men in killed, wounded, and missing. It was supposed that the attack was made in the expectation that it would be assisted by a movement within the city, but nothing of the kind took place, and the general feeling among the troops was that the movement had been unnecessary and profitless. No attempt was made to cross the Adige, as was at one moment expected

It was expected that the siege of Peschiera would be at once commenced, as the heavy artillery had been placed in the batteries.

Gen. Nugent was advancing upon Treviso.

The Minister for Foreign Affairs of Piedmont announced to the Chamber of Deputies, on the 13th instant, the accession of Piacenza to the Sardinian dominions. The Provisional Government of Milan had ordered the opening of registers throughout the country to receive the votes of the population relative to the ... union of Lombardy to Piedmont. This decision was adopted in consequence of an energetic manifestation to that effect, made by the National Guard and the people, followed by a demand in which it was stated that the intrigues of Metternich, Guizot, and Louis Philippe in London, the hostile attitude of Russia, the friendly disposition of Germany, the avowed neutrality of Switzerland, and other diplomatic communications tending to cause an apprehension of a general conflagration in Europe, render it more necessary to increase the force of Italy by union. A fusion with Piedmont would render it possible to collect an army of 200,000 Italians

From that portion of the seat of war remote from the operations of the Sardinian army, we learn that the Crusaders of Bassano had taken by surprise a body of Croats on the 8th, in the village of Jasiro, near Arsia, and made a great number of them prisoners; General Durando had defeated two columns of the same body and forced them to retreat from Corunday, after sustaining severe losses. The armed population of Brenta are described as ardently devoted to the holy cause, and well decided to beat the enemy.

ROME. The news from the Eternal City in the commencement of the week represented tranquillity as restored.

The new Liberal Ministry is thus definitively organised:—

Ecclesiastical Affairs—Carlina. Ciacchi

President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs—Count Marchetti.

Interior—Count Mamiani. War—Prince d'Orta Pardi

Justice—M. Pasquale de Rossi. Commerce—The Duke de Rignano.

Finance—M. Lunati. Police—M. Giuseppe Galetti

The Senate of Rome had forwarded an address to the Pope ... [illegible] ... Italian revolution and renders justice to the sentiments that dictated the allocution pronounced by Pius IX. in the Consistory of the 29th ult. At the same time, however, that it concurred in those principles of charity, the Senate declared that his Holiness should not forget that he was a Sovereign as well as a Pontiff. The Senators say:

"The people do not expect that you, a messenger of peace, should declare war; they only desired that you should not prevent those to whom you have confided the direction of temporal affairs to undertake and conduct it. They do not desire the sacrifice. Mr Baring married 3rd August, 1828, Anne Louisa, eldest daughter of William Bingham, Esq., of Philadelphia, a senator of the United States, and through this alliance acquired influential commercial connexions on the other side of the Atlantic, which, in the sequel, aggrandised the importance of the London house

Mr. Baring's first entrance on the political arena was as member for the borough of Taunton, in 1806. That town he continued to represent until 1818. He next sat for Callington, and for Thetford, and finally was returned as knight of the Shire for Essex

In 1834, on the formation of Sir Robert Peel's short-lived administration, Mr Alexander Baring became President of the Board of Trade, and in 1835 was raised to the peerage as Baron Ashburton, of Ashburton, in Devon. This title his Lordship selected as having been borne by his first ancestor in England, a lawyer, John Dunning, on his elevation to the Upper House. The last occupant in which Lord Ashburton was ... d in the service of the Crown, was the Embassy to America in 1842, which led to the adjustment of our differences with that country.

His Lordship is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son, William Bingham, now Lord Ashburton. He leaves, besides, two other surviving sons, and two surviving daughters.

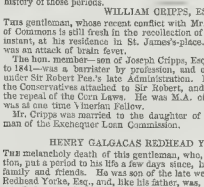
We cannot better conclude our brief notice of this distinguished merchant and statesman, than by quoting the words of an eminent contemporary:—

"Although (said Lord Stanley in Tuesday's debate) my noble friend, Lord Ashburton, was not a frequent speaker in the assembly of which he was a member, those of your Lordships who have had the opportunity of knowing and hearing him will be aware of how much value and importance was his opinion; and you will appreciate far more than the powers of the highest orator, the loss which the country has sustained in that clear and impartial judgment, that candid consideration, that vast experience, which he brought to bear on all those questions, and the practical knowledge which he brought to bear more especially on all commercial subjects—subjects to which he had devoted the study and observation of a long life—and which clothed his opinion with the highest authority. I am sure I may add, that the general amiability, the uniform kindness and courtesy, not only of manner, but of heart, which characterised my noble friend, must have rendered it impossible that he could have left behind him a single enemy, public or personal. I am sure those who have been admitted to the honour of his friendship, even more than others, must feel the loss which your Lordships and the country have sustained."

A portrait of the deceased Peer will be found in No. ... of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

JOHN FORTAL, ESQ

THIS gentleman died on the 7th instant, at his seat, Fredcik Priors, Hants, in his 89th year. He was the head of the Portal family, and for upwards fifty years a Deputy-Lieutenant for the County of Southampton. His large estates extended over the parishes of Freefolk, Laverstoke, Ashe, Hannington, and Steventon. He married, August, 1815, Esther, daughter of the late Henry Drummond, Esq., of the Grange, Hants, by Anne, daughter of the late Viscount Melville, and has left issue. The family of De Portal was amongst the French Refugees of the 17th century, and had held the highest rank amongst the nobles of Languedoc, for several ages—during which time many members of the family were signally distinguished by military achievements, and in the political history of those periods.



WILLIAM GRIPPS, ESQ., M.P

THIS gentleman, whose recent conflict with Mr. Feargus O'Connor in the House of Commons is still fresh in the recollection of our readers, expired on the 11th instant, at his residence in St. James's-place. The malady of which he died was an attack of brain fever.

The hon. member—son of Joseph Cripps, Esq., M.P. for Cirencester from 1807 to 1841—was a barrister by profession, and one of the Lords of the Treasury under Sir Robert Peel's late Administration. In politics he always acted with the Conservatives attached to Sir Robert, and formed one of the majority on the repeal of the Corn Laws. He was M.A. of the University of Oxford, and was at one time Vinerian Fellow.

Mr. Cripps was married to the daughter of Benjamin Harrison, Esq., Chairman of the Exchequer Loan Commission.

HENRY GALGACAS REDHEAD YORKE, ESQ., M.P.

THE melancholy death of this gentleman, who, in a paroxysm of mental aberration, put a period to his life a few days since, has cast a deep gloom over his family and friends. He was son of the late well known political writer, Henry Redhead Yorke, Esq., and, like his father, was to use his own words, a Radical Reformer, when moderation is sufficient; a decided Reformer, when decision is better; a Radical Reformer, when Radicalism is best; but, above all things, an uncompromising friend of the people!"

Mr Yorke married, 26th December, 1837, the Hon. ... [illegible] ... only daughter and heir of William, late Lord Brand[illegible]

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CONFIRMATION AND CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF CHESTER.

On Saturday last the Confirmation of the Rev. Dr. John Graham, Master of Christ College, Cambridge, who has been elected Bishop of Chester in the room of the Right Rev. John Bird Sumner, D.D., promoted to the Archbishopric of Canterbury, took place at St. James's Church, Piccadilly.

The usual forms having been gone through, and no person appearing to object to the Confirmation, the Bishop elect took the usual oaths, and the process was signed.

The Consecration of the right reverend Prelate took place on Sunday morning in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall

The Archbishop of York officiated at the ceremony, assisted by the Bishop of Lincoln and the Bishop of Durham.

The prayers were read by the Rev. Mr. Jones; the Communion service by the Archbishop of York. The Bishop of Lincoln read the epistle, and the Bishop of Durham the gospel appropriate for the occasion. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Cartmell, Chaplain to the Bishop elect.

At the close of the sermon the ceremony of the Consecration was performed.

The chapel was but thinly attended.

THE CONVOCATION OF THE CLERGY.

On Tuesday having been appointed for the convocation of the clergy of the provinces of Canterbury, in conformity with the mandate issued by the Most Rev. the Archbishop, the members of the upper house assembled at the Chapter House of St. Paul's at eleven o'clock: and the members of the Lower House (consisting of the representatives from the various dioceses, archidiaconries, and cathedrals), together with the capitular body, met at the same hour in the vestry-room.

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided. There were also present, the Bishops of Winchester, Hereford, Bangor, Salisbury, Llandaff, and other right reverend prelates.

The Archbishop, as president of the Upper House of Convocation, stated that they had assembled in accordance with ancient usage, for the purpose of adopting an address to her Majesty. The convocation had met in November, but in consequence of that meeting having been prorogued, the address had not been presented. It had become necessary for her Majesty to issue to him (the Archbishop) another writ commanding the re-assembling of convocation. The present was the earliest period at which convocation could be assembled, and the business would now come formally before both Houses.

The Lower House of Convocation having been summoned by his grace's order, the procession moved to the Chapter House.

Having taken their seats, the Rev. Mr. W. J. Hall read the Litany service in Latin, and a Latin prayer, imploring the Divine blessing upon the labours of the convocation, and grace to enable them to arrive at such determinations upon the subjects of their investigations as should conduce to the promotion of the honour and glory of God, and the advancement of the true Catholic faith.

The Archbishop then intimated that he was unable to say on what precise day the address to her Majesty would be received. It could not, however, be before the 25th inst., and to that day his grace ordered the convocation to stand prorogued.

THE NICARAGUA EXPEDITION.

THIS measure originated in the refusal of the Government of Nicaragua (one of the United States of Central America) to recognise the King of Mosquito, whose ancestors have been the cordial allies of the British for many years. The specific grounds of complaint were that the Nicaraguans persisted in maintaining their right to the harbour of San Juan, that they had hauled down and insulted the Mosquito flag, and made prisoners of the authorities, in direct defiance of the protection afforded to the Mosquitan King by Great Britain. Hence it became necessary that England should take some decisive steps to show to the States of Central America that she was not to be insulted with impunity.

Captain Loch, of her Majesty's ship Alarm, was the senior officer at Jamaica when we received the news of the last aggression on the part of Nicaragua. This active officer started immediately for the port of San Juan, latitude 11° 0', longitude 83° 40', touching at Bluefields (the European settlement in Mosquito), and taking with him her Majesty's steamship Vixen, Commander A. Ryder, and the first company of the 38th Regiment of the Line, under Captain Smith.

On the 8th, the vessels had hardly swung to their anchors in the harbour of San Juan, when six large boats (three from each ship) carrying a gun each, and others cutters, gigs, &c. started up the river, carrying a force of 260 men. On the morning of the 11th they arrived off Serapaqui, and the leading boat, Captain Loch's gig, was immediately fired upon.

"The defences of the strong post of Serapaqui," says one of the Expedition, "consist of stockaded entrenchments, four feet thick, and perfectly shot-proof to any cannon that we could bring against them. They had three guns commanding the reach up which our boats had to pass; and about 240 men, armed with muskets, besides a good stock of ammunition. The current was running about four miles an hour, and was extremely difficult. It was the general opinion that the Nicaraguans could not have chosen a better spot at which to maintain their defensive force. Their stockades were well built and well manned; their firing was very rapid; and they had the forethought to fix the banks of the river with musketeers in ambush. After being one hour and a half under fire, we succeeded in passing the fort. Captain Loch then gave directions that they should land on the eastern right. I was done with a party English cheer, and the enemy were driven into the woods with great loss. Their flag, ammunition, provisions, and all their effects, fell into our hands; we destroyed all the fortifications, guns, &c., and razed the whole place to the ground. We found immediately on landing twelve dead, and four or five desperately wounded; and we took seven or eight prisoners who had concealed themselves in the brushwood. We heard afterwards that 120 soldiers, with Colonel Sabs, the Commandant, eventually reached Costa Rica, by traveling through the [illegible] ... a journey of many days, without provisions, and through a trackless forest, is only what the strongest man can hope to stand by.

"Our loss consisted of two petty officers killed one midshipman and seven seamen and marines wounded: many of the boats were riddled with shot. The force passed the right of the action in boats anchored upon the opposite bank, and early next morning they resumed the ascent of the river. The current was so strong, that fifteen miles a day, or about one mile an hour, was considered good work; and the force finally reached San Carlos, on the lake of Nicaragua, on the 19th of February, ten days after leaving the ship, and seventeen after leaving Jamaica. Three pacific expeditions were then sent [illegible] ... miles distant, at the further end of the lake. The last carried thither all the principal officers of the Expedition, Captains Loch, Ryder, and Peel, of the Alarm, Vixen, and Darwig, and Captain Smith, of the 38th: Captain Peel and the Darwig joined the Expedition after our arrival at San Carlos.

"On the 9th of March was signed and ratified a treaty granting all the [illegible] demands. San Carlos was evacuated on the 11th, and the ships were reached the 16th. The rapids were passed at some risk to the boats and their crews, but fortunately no serious accident occurred. The boats were away from the ships for 34 days; they were only able to carry provisions for 7 days; all implies for the remaining 27 days had to be drawn from the neighbourhood of San Carlos. This for 240 men was effected with some difficulty; of course, everything was paid for.

It is gratifying to add that owing to the attention paid to the comfort and health of the men [illegible] quinine being constantly issued, and all the boats fitted with night awnings, only one case of fever and ague occurred amid the expedition was on the point of descending the river, when many cases made their appearance.

The gallant behaviour of the men throughout the Expedition cannot be too highly commended: the boats were excessively crowded, the run fell incessantly, so that fires could not be kept in for cooking meat, which was, therefore, eaten raw; yet the fine fellows—military and naval—worked well together in the boats.

We regret to add that Mr. R. Walker, late English Consul-General at Blueflelds, accompanied the Expedition, and was, unfortunately, drowned on the morning of March 31: a kinder or more hospitable man never existed.

Our readers will, probably, recollect our notice of this gentleman in the account of Mosquito, in our volume for last year. He, unfortunately, drowned on the morning of March 31: a kinder or more hospitable man never existed.

Our readers will, probably, recollect our notice of this gentleman in the account of Mosquito, in our volume for last year. He, unfortunately, drowned on the morning of March 31: a kinder or more hospitable man never existed.

The following are the names of the officers who were employed in the boats and ships of the Expedition, among the men in ambuscade on the bank of the river, opposite the fort. On the extreme left are two soldiers in ambuscade on the right bank leading the other killed by a shot from the boats. Above them is the Vixen's starboard P.B. boat; above her, the Vixen's pinnace; and above her, the smoke from the muskets of men in ambush, on the opposite side. The boat ahead of the Alarm's pinnace is the Vixen's port P.B. boat, commanded by Mr. Turnour (midshipman), and carrying Captain Smith of the 38th, and Mr. Collins, purser of the Vixen (a volunteer). This boat was under fire for a much longer period than any other. The boat ahead of the last-mentioned is the Alarm's barge. On her starboard bow is the Vixen's gig. Ahead of her is the Alarm's spare pinnace. The headmost is Captain Loch's galley, a very beautiful and fast boat (his own property)—Captain Loch is accompanied by Mr. Martin, purser of the Alarm. The houses and stockade will be seen in the sketch They were lined with men, who kept up a very rapid fire. As soon as all the boats had passed the position occupied by Captain Loch's galley, they pulled on shore, on the extreme right, and then landed, and charged up the hill.

INSURRECTION IN MADRID

IN our late edition of last week's Journal, we gave the intelligence received of an insurrectionary movement in Madrid. We now give a summary of the intelligence, with an illustration of the principal scene of the conflict.

On the evening of the 6th, the Spanish Government signalled from the capital a number of persons distinguished for their extreme liberal opinions. This caused great indignation in the Liberal party, which reaching the Government, they took extraordinary precautions to obviate it.

On the morning of Sunday, the 7th, a number of persons, wrapped in cloaks, and carrying muskets, appeared in the streets, but the police being on the alert, many of them were arrested, though they had not committed any acts of violence. Soon after, a number of troops, who had been gained over by the ultra-Liberals, started to be 600 men of the infantry regiment of Espana, quitted their barracks, under the command of their sergeants; and, with colours flying marched to the Plaza Mayor, where they occupied the line of houses forming the north side of the square. There they were joined by some civilians, but not in any considerable numbers. General Narvaez, accompanied by General Fulgoso, Captain-general of Madrid, and by General Figueras, General Cordova, and General Concha, proceeded to the scene of insurrection, and directed that an overwhelming force of infantry and artillery should fire upon the insurgents. They were accordingly attacked by the Government forces, who brought up artillery subsequently to batter the houses in which the insurgents had lodged themselves. The engineers and American regiment occupied many balconies and houses on the other sides of the square, and a murderous struggle took place, which lasted for a long time. General Fulgoso, brother-in-law of Queen Christina, was shot by a civilian with a blunderbuss in the early part of the morning, from the corner of the Calle del Sol, a small street near Plaza Mayor. He was, it is said, mortally wounded.

After a sanguinary conflict, the insurgents, finding that they were not supported as they expected, surrendered, with the exception of about one-third of them, who succeeded in escaping. General Fulgosio was succeeded in the command of Madrid by General Pezuela, and who forthwith assembled a court-martial, which in the course of the day condemned seventeen civilians and seventeen soldiers to be shot, and preparations for their execution were in progress at the departure of the mail.

The object of the insurgents is said to have been solely to effect a change of Ministers. They cheered "The Queen!" and "Liberty!" in the midst of the fire.

The Palace of the Conde de Onate in the Calle Mayor was occupied from an early hour by Government troops, and they fired indiscriminately on every one that passed. Two persons lost their lives from their fire; and more would have been killed but for the interference of Narvaez and his staff, who saved a poor servant, upon whom a score of muskets were on the point of being discharged.

While the fighting was hottest in the Plaza Mayor, an incident occurred, which, it is believed, led to the more speedy termination of the conflict. General Leguia, who Colonel of the American Regiment, advanced almost alone to the middle of the square, where a trumpeter belonging to the insurgents was sounding the "cease-firing." Lersundi, exposing as he was to the shower of balls, seized the trumpet, and sounded the "cease-firing;" and an Adjutant, who was close by him, held up a white pocket-handkerchief as a flag of truce. The firing ceased for some moments, and Lersundi, clasped the trumpeter in his arms. The insurgents seeing the act, were led to believe that the others were about to fraternize with them, and they ceased hostilities. During the pause, the troops who were opposed to them made a rush, and all was lost. The insurgents could no longer hold out, and they successively surrendered in the manner already stated.

INSURRECTION IN MADRID.

CONFLICT BETWEEN POLISH SCYTHE-MEN AND PRUSSIAN TROOPS.

THE POLISH REVOLUTION.

The incorporation of the so styled German portion of the Grand Duchy of Posen, with the German Confederation, has proved the signal for a revolution in Poland. The Duchy has been in open revolt: the White Eagle once more unfurled; and Poland has re-asserted her independence under the title of a Republic.

The accounts from the seat of war are truly terrifying. Mieroslawski's call to arms has been universally responded to; towns and villages are deserted by all capable of bearing arms; and the Poles, in the last encounter with General Hirschfeld, fought with a disregard of death that was wonderful. Although they were exposed to a raking fire from a battery of four guns loaded with grape, and finally to the terrible carnage of shrapnell shells and grenades charged with 150 bullets, they advanced undaunted over heaps of their own slain, and finally broke through the Prussian ranks. No less than 460 Poles fell in this battle, without counting the wounded.

Since the fall of Xionz, the Prussians had been beat in every skirmish. The tactics of Mieroslawski are peculiar, and puzzle the Prussian leaders, at the same time that they strike terror into the soldiery, who were awed by the daring courage of the Poles and the wild advance of the scythe-men. The latter advanced whetting their scythes, until they were close on the enemy, with an energy that sent sparks from the steel, and singing in chorus the well-known national air, "Noch ist Polen nicht verloren." They kept step to the air, and on the first volley of the Prussian troops they fell on one knee, and then, suddenly rising, rushed impetuously on the foe.

We learn from the Berliner National Zeitung, that the bands of insurgents under the command of Mieroslawski laid down their arms on the 7th instant, and surrendered at discretion to General Colomb and the Prussian troops. The latter had surrounded the insurgents on three sides, and gave them the choice of either risking one more desperate struggle or of fleeing into Russian Poland, where the Russian forces were drawn up to receive them. They attempted to force the Prussian lines, but failed entirely, and made offers for a capitulation. In the certainty of the destruction which awaited them, should they renew the fight or fly across the Russian frontier, the whole body of the insurgents then laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves.

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

The trial of Mr. Smith O'Brien, M.P., upon an ex-officio information filed by the Attorney-General, charging him with having delivered a speech on the 15th of March, in the parish of St. Thomas, in Dublin, for the purpose of exciting hatred and contempt against the Queen in Ireland, and inducing the people to rise in rebellion, took place in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, before the Chief Justice and a Jury, on Monday last.

The trial occasioned great excitement, and Mr. O'Brien was conducted from his own house to the Court by a procession of members of the Irish Confederation to the number of 5000 or 3000, and a large concourse of people, who cheered Mr. O'Brien throughout the route. When the doors of the Court were opened, there was a great rush for places, and in a very short time the body of the court and the gallery were crowded. A very numerous array of ladies graced the galleries and other parts of the court. When Mr. O'Brien entered the court he was cheered by a number of barristers from the front benches of the junior bar and the galleries. Mr. Meagher was also cheered; and when Mr. Butt, Q.C., the counsel for the traverser, appeared and took his seat at the inner bar, he, too, got a round of applause.

During the proceedings, the sentiments uttered by Mr. Butt, the traversers' counsel, were repeatedly applauded by the parties of both sexes who thronged the court. At the close of the evidence and the addresses of counsel, the Chief Justice charged the Jury, who, having failed to agree to a verdict, were locked up for the whole of Monday night; and, next morning, being still divided in opinion, the Court discharged them, after having been twenty-four hours without refreshment. The law proceedings of the Crown against Mr. O'Brien have thus ended in failure.

On Tuesday, the trial of Mr. Meagher, on a similar charge, occupied the Court of Queen's Bench until four o'clock, when the Jury retired to consider their verdict; but, not having agreed at a late hour, they were locked up for the night, as in the preceding case, and on Wednesday morning, as they still continued divided, they were discharged, and Mr. Meagher thus also obtained a virtual acquittal.

MR. SERJEANT WARREN. LORD CHIEF JUSTICE BLACKBURNE.

MR. JOHN MITCHELL.

Mr. Mitchell is to be arraigned on the 19th of May and the 1st of June, that is, supposing that the prisoner declines to avail himself of the privilege of traversing as prox, not having had twenty-one days' notice of trial, and thus postponing the case until the succeeding commission of oyer and terminer. However, as Mr. Mitchell's offence does not admit of bail being taken, it is thought probable that he will abide the immediate issue, rather than incur a six weeks' imprisonment.

THE PORTRAITS

We give this week Portraits of some of the principal characters connected with the State Prosecutions in Ireland.

Mr. Mitchell is the proprietor of the United Irishman newspaper, the violence of whose attacks on the Earl of Clarendon, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and the vehemence of whose invectives against the Union and what he calls the English policy in Ireland, have made his name well known throughout the Empire.

Mr. Meagher "of the Sword," as he has been called by his fellow Confederate Repealers, is a very young man, son of Mr. Thomas Meagher, M.P. for the city of Waterford, and has distinguished himself amongst the Young Ireland party by his extreme political views and the rhetorical power of language by which he conveys those views to his hearers. He has, as will be seen in another column, been this week tried for sedition in the Court of Queen's Bench, and escaped conviction by the Jury not agreeing to a verdict.

Mr. Serjeant Warren is one of the most eminent barristers of long-established repute in Ireland. He was one of the counsel for the Crown in the trials of Messrs O'Brien and Meagher.

The Right Hon. Francis Blackburne, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, is one of the most eminent of the men who have distinguished themselves at the bar, either in England or Ireland. He has successively filled the offices of Attorney-General and Master of the Rolls in the latter country, and, on the death of the late Chief Justice Pennefather, a short time back, he was promoted from the Rolls to the Queen's Bench, where he presides with marked ability.

The Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin.—In our account, last week, the Steam Launch described is a paddle-box boat, constructed by Beale, but not for the Expedition. The Launch Engraved is one of the two built for the Expedition: it 31 feet long, 10 feet beam, 2 feet draught, and fitted with a screw propeller, driven with a rotatory engine, by Beale. We are requested by Mr. Rabbe, of Oxford-street, to state that he furnished the Expedition with most of the Furs; and Mr. Stent, of Oxford-street, states that he furnished a portion of the warm Clothing.

Ordnance Survey.—On Tuesday some returns connected with the ordnance survey were printed. A list is given of the towns in Ireland surveyed, on the scale of 60 inches to a mile. The surveys were not made for the purpose of sanatory improvement. They were commenced in 1830, and finished in 1843. The expense was £963,206; and in order to show that there was no lavish expenditure, it appears that the area of Ireland is 20,875,482 acres, so that the cost does not amount to 10d. per acre. In Great Britain it appears that Southampton and Windsor have been surveyed for sanatory purposes. The cost of the preparation for Southampton was £1240 12s.; the area was 3356 acres: whilst for Windsor it was £331 17s. 9d.; the plan embraced an area of 1212 acres.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1848.

THE Navigation Laws, a subject upon which the Royal Speech at the commencement of the session promised that the Ministry would introduce a measure at an early period, were brought before the House on Monday night, by Mr. Labouchere. Most of the legislation of the present day consists in undoing the legislation of days gone past. The Navigation Laws offer no exception. They are to be almost entirely repealed. Mr. Labouchere, in a very temperate speech of three hours in duration, traced the progress of our legislation upon the subject from the time of Richard II. to that of Elizabeth; from Elizabeth to that of Oliver Cromwell; from Cromwell's to the present period; and showed their effects upon our foreign and Home Trade, and upon our colonies. He also showed that our customers in other countries, more especially in the United States of America and the German Zollverein, were loud in their remonstrances, and earnest in their determination to retaliate upon us unless those laws were repealed. The repeal proposed, though not complete, is extensive, and it is not to satisfy the people of England, bids fair at all events to be well received by the nations with which we carry on the most active and extensive commercial intercourse. The coasting trade of Great Britain and the British fisheries are to be left unaffected by the measure, and to be carried on as hitherto by British seamen; but goods from any portion of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America may be conveyed to our ports by any ships and any seamen that may be got to navigate them; in other words, the carrying trade is to be perfectly free. The success of the measure is problematical, A strong and determined opposition has been formed against it.

WHILE, with the exception of the debates on the Navigation Laws, the proceedings in Parliament continue to be of the slightest possible interest, the people out of doors debate upon political matters with more than usual fervour. Independently of the question of a further reform in Parliament, upon which opinion is much divided, there is one great question upon which opinion is unanimous, and upon which a very considerable agitation has already arisen throughout the country. That question is a reform of our fiscal system, and the diminution of our national expenditure. It is conceded by all parties that taxation has reached its limit, and that if we would, as we must, balance the national expenditure by the national income, we must have recourse to the most rigid economy, consistent with efficiency. It is agreed, also, by those who have ever devoted any attention to the subject, that our whole fiscal system stands in need of revision, and that the mere collection of the national revenue draws from the pockets of the people large sums, which are stopped in transitu, and never find their way to the national Exchequer. The cost of our Excise and Customs Departments is prodigious. It has been calculated, with an approximation, we believe, to accuracy, that every ten millions of taxation costs, directly or indirectly, one million and a half to collect. In addition to this evil, we impose taxes upon articles which ought not to be taxed; we levy a rate upon light and air by our window duties; we place an impost upon cleanliness by the Excise duty upon soap; and we increase the price of articles of prime necessity by injudicious and comparatively unproductive taxes upon them. We also tax knowledge by our Stamp Acts, and by our stamp on newspapers and the advertisement duty. Moreover, while we tax the succession to personal property at a heavy rate, the succession to real property pays nothing to the necessities of the State. These, and a thousand other anomalies, mistakes, and abuses, exist in and permeate our whole fiscal system, and impress upon the people generally the urgent necessity of an immediate and careful revision.

It is not just to ourselves or to our posterity, that we should spend more than our income, and that we should have recourse to loans to cover our yearly deficiencies. It is not a creditable spectacle to offer to the world. It is pregnant with danger. Our Ministers as yet have announced no intention to lay hold of this subject. They demanded five per cent. Income and Property Tax, and when it was refused, they were glad to accept a three per cent. tax, and to make up the difference by the easy but perilous process of funding Exchequer Bills. In other words, they showed themselves willing to carry on, as long as they were in office, and to leave to their successors the difficult but necessary task of making both ends meet. The country, however, is wiser than its rulers. Associations formed with the sole object of urging financial reform upon the attention of the legislature are arising in all the great manufacturing and commercial districts. They hold meetings, prepare petitions, disseminate information, and ripen the mind of the country on this all-important topic. We anticipate great good from this movement; and that the result, ultimately, will be the equalisation of Revenue and Expenditure, the abolition of all taxes that injuriously affect the trade or the health of the people, and a large diminution of the public burdens.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. At five o'clock the House resolved itself into Committee on this bill, and resumed the discussion on the several clauses, which lasted the entire evening. The Committee having got through nearly one-half the clauses, the Chairman, at a late hour, reported progress, and the House shortly afterwards adjourned.

HER MAJESTY'S STATE BALL.—The Queen gave a state ball, the first this season, yesterday evening at Buckingham Palace, which was very numerously attended, the invitations including the Royal Family and foreign Princes in England, the whole of the diplomatic corps, and foreigners of distinction at present in town, the ministers and officers of state, the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household, and upwards of one thousand of the nobility and gentry.

PRUSSIA.

The Prussian Abstract Indicator of the 16th contains an official declaration from the Government, that the Prince of Prussia was not to return to his country until after the meeting of the National Assembly, which is fixed for the 22nd. This declaration on the part of the Government was caused by a manifestation of the people against the recall of the Prince. The Ministry announces that as the Diet was to meet in a few days, they would not give in their resignation, as they would thereby be deprived of the means of the measures of the representatives of the people.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

Up to the 16th instant there was nothing new from the scene of war. The ships in the Belt, after the threat of Wrangel, have been perfectly quiet. The Danes are waiting for the arrival of the Swedes, who were to arrive on the 20th (to-day). On the 18th Major Zastrow, who had gone on a predatory excursion to Aarhuus with a detachment of Schleswig-Holstein troops, returned with a fortnight's provisions of all sorts for 7000 men. He likewise brought the Viscount of Aarhuus as a hostage for further deliveries, and as a reprisal for the capture of M. Von Krogh.

Advices of the 16th, and Kiel, from Sunderuitt, state that at the dawn of day on the 15th the Danish forces advanced in the direction of Tarp, that the Holstein soldiers wanted to make an immediate attack upon them, but were restrained by General Halkett till the Danes had advanced considerably, whereupon they were attacked, and nearly all put to the sword, or taken prisoners, and not one escaped to tell this sad event at Alsen. The immediate reinforcement of the 10th corps by 18,000 men was expected.

Lubeck vessels have been exempted from the Danish embargo.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.—MIDDLESEX COUNTY MEETING.—On Wednesday, a county meeting of the inhabitants of Middlesex was held at Hall's Riding-school, Albany-street, Regent's Park, for the purpose of taking into consideration the manifold evils under which many millions of her Majesty's loyal subjects are suffering, and adopting such resolutions as may be deemed expedient for the removal of the same, and for the preservation of the Throne from danger. The meeting had been convened by Messrs. Cubitt and Hill, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, in conformity with a requisition presented to them for that purpose, and signed by Mr. T. Duncombe, M.P., and many other electors for the county. Upon the doors of the Riding-school being opened, a number of persons, including some of the Chartist leaders, entered, and were followed by a party of police in uniform, who immediately distributed themselves in different parts of the arena. At one o'clock, the Sheriffs, attended by their Under-Sheriffs, Messrs. France and D. W. Wire, came forward, followed by Mr. Duncombe, Mr. T. S. Duncombe, M.P., Mr. William Williams, Mr. R. Taylor, and several other gentlemen connected with the liberal party in the metropolitan districts. About 3000 persons were present. The proceedings were formally commenced the presence of the police was strongly objected to by several persons in the crowd. Mr. Sheriff Cubitt explained that if the meeting had been held at Brentford, or any other place, the presence of the police would not be objected to. (Confusion, and general cries of "Turn them out.")—Mr. Sheriff Cubitt, after a consultation with his colleague and the under-sheriffs, said that if it was the wish of the meeting that the police should retire, that wish should be obeyed. (Loud cheers.) The police then marched out through an avenue opened for their egress by the crowd, who vociferously expressed their satisfaction at the success of their movement.—Mr. Sheriff Cubitt then briefly opened the business of the day by calling upon the meeting to assist his colleague and himself in preserving order, and in securing to every speaker who might present himself a fair, full, and free hearing. ("Cries of 'We will.'") Mr. Williams, late M.P. for Coventry, moved the first resolution, viz. "That in the opinion of this meeting the Commons House of Parliament, as at present constituted does not fairly represent the people, the property, or the industry of the country—that the disclosures made before committees of 1835, 1842, and also during the present session, prove that the return of its members has been extensively influenced by violence, coercion, and bribe-taking; that the Reform Act has not realised the just expectations of the country; that since the passing of that act the public expenditure has not only been increased in the vague, but has exceeded by many millions sterling the expenditure of the last session of the unreformed Parliament; that the system of taxation is so contrived as to favour the aristocracy, and to throw the pressure of its burdens unjustly on the industrious classes of the people." (Loud cheers followed the reading of this resolution.) Mr. J. Hull, banker of Uxbridge, and chairman of Mr. Osborne's committee at the last election, seconded the resolution, which, after a short speech from Mr. Charles Gilpin, was unanimously carried. Mr. Hume, M.P., moved, and Mr. Serjeant Gazelee seconded the next resolution, viz. "That to secure the stability of the throne, public order, and consistency in the constitutional rights of the people, equalisation of taxation, economy of the public expenditure, just laws, and good Government, it is indispensable that the elective franchise should be extended to all men who are registered as residents for a limited time; that the duration of parliaments should not exceed three years; that votes should be taken by ballot; and that there should be equal apportionment of members to population." This resolution, to which Chartist amendments were moved, but subsequently rejected, was also carried; and a petition to Parliament founded on the resolutions having been agreed to, the meeting separated.

THE SCOTTISH TAXATION LEAGUE.—On Monday evening, a meeting, convened by circular, was held at the Hall of Commerce, of deputies from the numerous equitable taxation societies formed in the metropolis, for the purpose of receiving reports from those bodies, and consider what steps should be taken to further the objects in view. D. Wire, Esq., was called to the chair, and said the nearly universal nature of the reports was a forcible proof of embracing the question of parliamentary reform, as the only means of attaining the objects in question. Having entered largely into the anomalies of our fiscal and representative system, he concluded by hoping that the meeting would act "openly and advisedly" make such a declaration on the subject as would lay the foundation of a great metropolitan movement. Mr. W. Hall moved the first resolution, "That the chairman assemble a committee for Conference," and, to add to their number, to carry out the object of the societies, but that the title of such league be left to future consideration." This having been seconded by Mr. Western, Mr. W. Williams (late member for Coventry), who had ceased to be one of a large and considerable length, observed that it must be in the recollection of many there that a committee had been recently formed of certain Members of Parliament to confer upon the general question of reform, and that since then the most important many meetings had been held in all parts of the country, for the reduction and revision of taxation; but that the general results of their deliberations had been that nothing effectual of that nature could be accomplished except by the construction of the House of Commons itself. That the wisest course then to pursue was to appoint a committee who would take into consideration the purposes of the league, and see how far they could co-operate with the committee to submit their report to another and more extensive meeting. With regard to the mere question of taxation, he considered any essential modification entirely hopeless in the present House of Commons, and that nothing could take place, in which Messrs. W. Carpenter, Prout, Pearse, Elkins, and others took part, as to the best course of proceeding, and the following resolution was adopted:—"That in lieu of the word 'Conference' in the first resolution, it is the opinion that with the view to the more equitable apportionment of taxation, a league shall be formed having for its object a large accession of the franchise vote by ballot, triennial parliaments, and equal electoral districts." A vote of thanks to the chairman was carried by acclamation, and the meeting adjourned.

MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.—The governors and supporters of this Institution met on Monday evening, at the Freemasons' Tavern, to celebrate the anniversary of the establishment of which his Grace the Duke of Northumberland, President of the Hospital, took the chair. After the usual loyal and routine toasts, Mr. Hunt, the treasurer, returned thanks for the officers of the Institution, and stated that the last year's receipts had exceeded the income, and the committee had therefore to call upon all supporters to render their most strenuous assistance, and to persuade their friends to do the same.—Mr. Hunt then read the subscription list of the evening, which amounted on the whole to nearly £600, including £100 from the Queen; £100 annuity from C. Purchase, Esq.; £100 from the Duke of Northumberland; a 97th donation of £20 from J. Pepys, Esq., Vice-President; and £21 from J. Labouchere, Esq., to the building fund.

ROYAL ORTHOPÆDIC HOSPITAL.—The anniversary festival of the Institution took place on Wednesday evening, at the London Tavern. Lord Abinger presided. In introducing the toast of the evening, he referred to the report for the present year, from which it appeared that the operations of the charity had been materially extended, and that it was increasing in usefulness and importance; that the number of in patients in the wards, on the 24th of February, 1841, was 30; the number admitted up to the corresponding portion of 1848 was 71, of whom 43 had been discharged cured, 13 had been relieved, and 36 remained in the hospital. The total number of in and out-patients admitted during the year was 1885, and the number admitted since the opening of the charity, 5693. Several legacies were disposed of. The subscriptions during the evening amounted to nearly £700.

THE ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY.—On Monday, a meeting of the Board of Directors of this institution (of which her Majesty the Queen is patron) was held at their rooms, in Basinghall-street, City, for general purposes. The report stated that there are now on the books one hundred and nineteen annuitants, the former receive £2 8s., and the latter £1 16s. per month. The recipients are composed, according to the statute of the Society, of decayed merchants, bankers, professional men, master manufacturers, salesmen, their widows, or widowed females, daughters of persons belonging to such classes of society. The donations and subscriptions during the past year exceeded the previous ones by £566 19s. 3d., and were the largest for seventeen years. At the anniversary festival in February last, presided over by G. Hudson, M.P., £1307 was realised. The receipts for 1847, from all sources, were £1896 3s. 2d.; the expenditure leaving a balance of £589 10s. 6d. The report concluded by an energetic appeal for continued aid towards alleviating the distress of the important class of persons relieved by this Society.

FOREIGN AID SOCIETY.—The annual general meeting of the members and friends of this society was held on Tuesday at the Queen's Concert Rooms, Hanover-square. The most noble the Marquis of Chelmondeley in the chair. Lord Kinnaird, Hon. A. Kinnaird, M. Guizot, &c., were present. The Chairman, in opening the proceedings, remarked that the object of the society was to collect funds in aid of the Société Evangelique of France and Geneva, and such other institutions as were founded on similar principles, within the limits of the French Protestant churches, and likewise to promote the religious principles of the Reformation. (Hear, hear.) The income of the society for the past year amounted to £3773 10s. 1d. During the past year it had expended £3683 7s. 6d. in auxiliaries at Durham, Birmingham, and other places. Several gentlemen addressed the meeting, after which a vote of thanks to the Chairman closed the proceedings.

THE LAW ASSOCIATION [illegible]

A [illegible] in the metropolis and vicinity was held on Monday [illegible] rated Law Society, Chancery-lane. Augustus Warren, Esq., one of the trustees, was in the chair. The secretary, Mr. John Murray, read the annual report, which congratulated the members of the society on the increase in their income, but at the same time regretted that some members of the society had been obliged to apply for relief, which they had received. The sum in stock had been purchased by the society during the preceding year. The receipts amounted, including a balance of £180 13s., to the sum of £1645; £850 had been voted for the relief of widows, and the remainder for other applicants for relief. The funded stock of the society was £20,000, which is for the benefit of those families of deceased members who may hereafter require assistance. The report was adopted.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND SELF-SUPPORTING VILLAGE SOCIETY.—A public meeting, in aid of this society, was announced to take place on Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms. At the hour appointed a large number of persons had assembled outside the doors; but it being understood that a considerable number of tickets had fallen into the hands of some of the most violent of the Chartist body, from whom an interruption of the proceedings was anticipated, it was determined that they should not be admitted, and in consequence of their endeavours to obtain an entrance, the manager of the rooms refused to allow the meeting to take place, and it was accordingly postponed to another day.

SUPPRESSION OF MENDICITY.—The thirtieth anniversary meeting of the Society for the Suppression of Mendicity was held on Saturday last at the society's rooms, Red Lion-square. The Marquis of Westminster, who presided, stated that the committee had found it necessary, from the enormous demand upon their resources, to contract their plan of administering relief, and had, therefore, adopted the principle of restricting it to persons residing within the last twelve months in the neighbourhood, and into whose cases the strictest investigation had been instituted. The report for the year 1847 showed that during the past year 45 persons had participated in its relief, and that the total number of meals distributed amongst them was 230,171. The income of the society had been £6553 13s., and its expenditure £6654 8s., leaving a deficit of £100 12s. The report was unanimously adopted.

EXTRAORDINARY ADVANCE IN THE RATES OF MARYLEBONE.—At a vestry holden yesterday, the rates were ordered for the year ensuing, the estimated average poor's-rates were £117,980, and the rates for repairing and cleansing were estimated at £41,462; to meet which, and the church-rate, a fourshilling rate was agreed upon; in addition to which other rates were figured to meet the Regent's Park expenses. Mr. Glazier, who highly approved of a large rate being made, said that it pained him to the soul to hear of the bad having been taken from the mother of five hundred children, for rates which should have been paid by the wealthy. Mr. Standford attributed the great increase of the parish rates to the cruel conduct of the Irish landlords, who compelled their tenants to emigrate into this country, and quarter themselves upon its bounty. The parish is indebted £90,000 to Sir Claude Scott and Co. Mr. Nicolay moved a resolution lamentory of their two representatives, Mr. Sandford and Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., for their watchfulness of the interests of the borough, and also expressive of the vestry's gratitude to the other members of Parliament who aided in lessening the taxation of the country. The resolution was seconded and most enthusiastically supported.

FIRE AT THE SUN.—On Monday afternoon, between three and four o'clock, a fire broke out upon the premises belonging to Messrs. Cook, Sons, and Co., wax-chandlers, of St. Paul's Churchyard. The premises are of considerable magnitude, and are numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25. The fire occurred in the upper floor, used as the place-room, but, owing to the timely assistance of the firemen on the premises, the damage was confined to the destruction of twenty-five cotton dress-places, some waistcoat places, and the demolition of eighteen squares of glass. In making the return to the insurance offices, Mr. Braidwood, of the Fire Brigade, gives the following:—"Cause of fire: A linen curtain, which hung before the top floor back window, took fire at the open part of window first. The window faces the south, and, being higher than the opposite buildings, is completely exposed to the sun."

ATTEMPTED COUNTER-REVOLUTION IN PARIS.

PARIS has this week narrowly escaped being again the theatre of a Revolution, which could only have led in the re-enactment of the sanguinary and hideous excesses of "the Great Revolution," and ended in complete anarchy. The presence under which the conspirators against order, moderation, and good government cloaked their anarchical designs, was a demand upon the National Assembly to require from the Northern Powers the restoration of Poland; and in case of refusal to declare war against those Powers in support of Polish nationality.

The liberation of Poland, however was but a pretence: the true object aimed at was a "Reign of Terror," by means of which a few ambitious men hoped to gratify their own immediate ambition, and at the same time reap some advantages for their own personal circumstances and position

For some days past, the people of Paris were preparing a petition to the Assembly in favour of the Poles; as announced by the clubs, and Saturday last was fixed upon for that purpose, but, in consequence of a misunderstanding among the leaders, the movement was delayed one day. On that day, a great demonstration of the people was made, to put a stop to a procession small in numbers, which did not, and never had, the intention of approaching the Chambers. The procession stopped quietly at the Barrière de la Madeleine, and their petition was delivered by a deputation, who placed it in the hands of M. Vavin, one of the representatives for Paris, and allowed him to present it, without any great fuss, to the Assembly. This was, however, a scene which the conspirators would be determined to make a more imposing demonstration of force; and though order was restored in the course of the day, and the Assembly knew on the spot within the precincts of the hall of the Assembly, that the people were determined to support the Assembly in the discharge of its duties, it was not until the following day, that specific orders had been given for the protection of the Assembly, but that these orders had not been fulfilled. The facility with which the procession on Monday was allowed to approach the hall of the Assembly, and invade its precincts, was very remarkable. It was not until the people had arrived at the Pont de la Concorde, a body of the National Guards was found drawn up, prepared to oppose the passage. But the colonel in command ordered the men to retire, and to allow the procession to pass, which they did very reluctantly. A large body of the Garde Mobile was drawn up in front of the peristyle of the Chamber of Deputies, which did not interfere in the slightest degree. The procession then proceeded from the Place Bourbon to the entrance to the hall of the Assembly, in the Place Bourbon. There they found the gates shut, but not a single man to defend them. A few men of the Garde Mobile were on guard on the inside of the wall on each side of the entrance, who, on the cry of "A bas les baionnettes," immediately put them into their scabbards. The people were then allowed to scale the wall without opposition, and the gates were opened on the inside from the inside, and allowed the whole of the mob to penetrate into the court of the Assembly. In the court there was at least 1000 of the Garde Mobile, who did not interfere, because they had orders to allow the people to pass. It soon became evident from whom these orders emanated, for after the members had been driven from the hall of the Assembly, General Courtais came among the crowd, and was received by them as their general and friend." M. Degousée, one of the questors, had given orders to the Garde Mobile to protect the Assembly, and to prevent the procession from entering, but immediately on the crowd, and some armed bandits with it, appearing, General Courtais ordered the soldiers to sheath their bayonets. M. Degousée announced this important and startling fact from the tribune, and declared that, contrary to the orders of the President and of the Assembly, General Courtais had given orders to prevent the crowd from entering—an announcement which at once convinced the Assembly that there was treason in the camp.

The moment the whole mob broke into the galleries, and in a few minutes the flags of the cafés were waving on every side over the heads of the representatives, amidst the most deafening cheering and cries of "Vive la République!" "Vive la Pologne!" the members of the Assembly at once rose and showed a disposition to leave the hall, but at the earnest request of the President and some members of the Executive Government, they resumed their places, which they had no sooner done, than the whole of the extraordinary and terrific scene which took place during the following two hours. Crowds immediately rushed to the tribune, among whom M. Barbès was the foremost, immediately ascended it, and commenting violently threatening M. Barbès, and uttered a few words which were not heard in the gallery, but which were loudly applauded by the members of the Assembly, who were going loudly applauded by the members of the Assembly. A crowd of blouses and flags rushed past the President's chair and filled the whole of the centre of the hall. At the same moment, the members of the Provisional Government withdrew to consider what was to be done; and very soon afterwards the whole party returned and resumed their places, and tumultuously, some of the mob made use of threats of violence against some of the rulers, and one or two are said to have been roughly handled. M. Barbès was in the tribune surrounded by the chiefs of the mobs, who were all armed, and who, with the exception of M. Barbès, M. Louis Blanc, and a few others, remained with their hats on their heads, and attempted to speak from the tribune. The President at length, finding it impossible to restore order, put on his hat, but immediately after resumed his seat. The President then left the chair, and placed one of the Vice-Presidents in it. Along with the members of the Provisional Government he

Police, meaning to declare for the Ultras; but the overwhelming masses of troops and National Guards sent there affrighted them, and they surrendered and were disarmed.

Decrees have been published appointing citizen Clement Thomas Commander-in-Chief of the National Guard of Paris, and accepting the resignation of citizen Guinard of the functions of Chief of the Staff of the Parisian National Guard; also the resignation of citizen Saisset, Under Chief of the Staff of the Parisian National Guard.

The following has likewise been published —

"Considered at a public sitting in Paris, the 15th of May, 1848.
"The President and Secretaries,

"Edmond Lafayette."

A decree, signed by M. Recurt, Minister of the Interior, revokes the functions of the commissaries sent to the provinces by the Provisional Government.

Up to Thursday the tranquility which had been re-established in the French capital was undisturbed, and there was every prospect of its so continuing. The Government had, however, continued its precautionary measures. The public were not satisfied with the defences of their conduct offered by the President of the National Assembly and the Prefect of Police, the latter of whom had resigned. The Government was believed to be determined to act with energy, but some persons perceived still too much tendency to fawn upon "the ouvriers" in the acts and speeches of the Assembly.

A number of arrests took place on Wednesday. M. Bocqué, the Mayor of the 12th arrondissement, was apprehended in the morning and conveyed with 16 others to the Castle of Vincennes, where no less than 220 individuals were then confined.

Two decrees, signed by all the members of the Provisional Government, had been published. The first commanding that a corps of 3000 infantry and 500 cavalry be raised for the special police service of the city of Paris, to be called the Parisian Republican Guard; the second, that the different bodies of armed men called the Republican Guard, the Montagnards, and the Lyonnais, be disbanded, and as many of them as are qualified be received into the Parisian Republican Guard.

All have implicit confidence in the vigour and capacity of General Bedeau, now really in command of the troops in Paris; and in the courage, activity, and at the same time conciliatory disposition of the new General of the National Guards, M. Clement Thomas.

It was believed that all the Clubs would almost immediately be closed.

The late disturbances had furnished an opportunity to the departments and to the immediate environs of Paris, of showing their good will towards the cause of moderation and order. The National Guards of the banlieu—that is, of the environs of the capital—poured into Paris to aid in resistance of the insurgents, on the first intimation that the Government was in danger. The regiments of the line within a circle of fifteen miles equally marched on the metropolis; and the accounts from the departments announced that they were ready to proceed to the capital, should it appear that their assistance was required for the establishment of order. Fortunately, their support was not necessary.

M. CAUSSIDIERE AND MONTAGNARDS

M. Caussidière and his Montagnards, sketched in the next illustration, are stated on Tuesday morning to have shut themselves up in the Hotel of the Prefecture, and declared for the people, meaning the Ultra-Republican party; that the 800 Montagnards, expelled a week or two since from the Prefecture and Palais de Justice, were determined on the Liberation of Barbès and the other persons arrested for the attempted revolution.

The Montagnards had actually made a show of defending themselves in the Prefecture; but the National Guards and other military force soon overwhelmed them, when, with consummate impudence, they fraternized with the troops. Some fled to their barracks in the Rue St. Victor, and subsequently surrendered.

M. BUCHEZ, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Thus (says the account) Paris is, possibly, rid of one of the most menacing bodies that could be imagined—a set of Republicans to fanaticism, who have been, for the most part, connected with the political movements and projects which have occurred in the capital since 1830.

In our Journal for April 29, we gave a startling picture of the movements of the Montagnards. Their costume is, to say the least of it, imposing. Their red cravats and scarfs and blue blouses have become the ultra-Republican uniform.

M. Caussidière will be recollected as the Prefect of the Police, and M. Buchez, as the President of the National Assembly. The attempts made to defend their conduct in the recent outbreak are so unsatisfactory, that it is believed they will resign. Indeed, the Journal des Débats announces that Caussidière has already sent in his resignation as representative of the people.

The explanation of Buchez in the Assembly, on Tuesday, was as follows: He rose, and stated that, yielding to the entreaties of a number of friends and leaders of the people, and with a view to protect their lives ("Say your own," exclaimed a member), which he had every reason to consider in the utmost danger, he had written to the officer in command of the National Guard to prevent the rappel from being beaten, not to excite still more the anger of the people. ("You were wrong," cried the whole House.) The President excused himself on his motives, and declared that had he refused the mob would have rushed on the Deputies and a frightful catastrophe ensued. This address produced the utmost agitation throughout the House.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

EUPHROSYNE.—PAINTED BY W. E. FROST A.R.A.

[illegible] timber

tue passage which Mr. Frost has undertaken to illustrate is in Milton's 'L'Allegro':

"Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee,
Jest and youthful jollity;
Quips and cranks and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks, and wreathed smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport, that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides
Come and trip it as you go,
On the light fantastic toe."

Exquisitely poetic as these lines are, Mr. Frost has quite come up to their excellence and beauty; and, whenever another illustrated Milton is undertaken, his picture should be engraved in illustration of the passage. The grouping throughout is unusually graceful; there is a rich abundance wherever you [illegible] beauty. This, in [illegible] rich the late Mr. Howard, R.A., always endeavoured to carry out, but never succeeded in accomplishing in any one instance so happily as Mr. Frost has done. It is true we can trace throughout many reminiscences of N. Poussin, of Stothard, and of Flaxman; but they are rather graceful recollections of these great men, than fearless borrowings from the works they left behind them.

Another artist of excellence who has husbanded his strength for a single picture, is Mr. A. Solomon, who contributes a scene in Mr. E. M. Ward's manner, entitled "A Ball-room in the year 1760." The period selected is very good for pictorial costume, and Mr. Solomon has paid great attention to the general characteristics of the first year of King George III., and, in the details of his costume, has been singularly painstaking. The arrangement of the figures throughout, as our Engraving will show, is at once pleasing and correct.

We must now break off, and turn to the Catalogue of the Academy, for the works we have marked for more especial notice.

No. 9. "Sunset." T. Sidney Cooper, A.R.A. A small-sized picture, with cows exquisitely true, and thoroughly English in its feeling. Time will mellow it into a perfect Cuyp.

10. "Death of Cardinal Wolsey." C. W. Cope, R.A. A large picture, with many figures of the size of life. Much careful painting; some good drawing, and a few heads full of good character.

19. "The Greenwood Stream." T. Creswick. Quite perfection in its way.

36. "The Vintage in the Claret Vineyards of the South of France, on the Banks of the Gironde." T. Uwins, R.A. This picture is in art what Phillips's "Cider" and Dyer's "Fleece" are in English poetry. It is a didactic picture, in which the gathering of the vintage is told with extreme fidelity. There is some nice painting throughout. The picture belongs to the proprietor of one of the largest claret vineyards in the south of France.

48. "Pincker, the Property of Montague Gore, Esq." E. Landseer. A portrait in Landseer's best style.

62. "Queen Margaret of Anjou and the Robber of Hexham." C. Landseer

A BALL-ROOM IN THE YEAR 1700.—PAINTED BY A. SOLOMON.

Has some nice parts, but the picture, as a whole, is rather poor. We may remark, here, that no artist has better judgment in selecting good subjects for painting than Mr. Charles Landseer. He knows the resources of his art, and paints with care, but there is too often a want of purpose in his heads

67. "The Daughters of the Duke of Norfolk." F. Grant, A.R.A. Two full-lengths, nicely grouped and capitally coloured. There is always a great and an air of good breeding in every thing Mr. Grant paints

71. "Sir William Newbegging, M.D." J. Watson Gordon, A three-quarter portrait painted in the style of Sir Henry Raeburn, and by far the finest male portrait in the Exhibition

. "St. John the Baptist reproving Herod." C. R. Herbert, R.A. A noble picture conceived and executed in the Florentine Peruginesque style. Here we have that purpose in the heads which is wanting in so much in Mr. Charles Lands The St. John is full of dignity. The, to our thinking, is worth fifty of those Scriptural subjects which poor Wilkie designed to paint in illustration of Scripture.

. "Sketch of my Father." E. Landseer. A half-length portrait of old Mr. Landseer, the engraver. He is seen on full face, and has a book in his hands, which he is looking down upon. His long white hair hangs upon his coat. The expression is capital. Some have compared it to the Gevartius, by Vandyke, but in doing so have only drawn the straw of similarity to the head. It is equally the liquid lustre of eye, and the firm flesh tints of that marvellous portrait. But then, the Vandyke has had two centuries to get ripe in.

80. "An Italian Peasant Family on their way to the Village Festival Prisoners with Bandetti." C. L. Eastlake. A cold clever picture, the subject of which we have seen before from the same hand, and very much in the same manner Mr Eastlake must avoid monotonies. There cannot be a more unlucky mistake about his pictures—great refinement, great skill, some exquisite painting, but very little expression in the heads

111. "John Forster, Esq., in the character of Kitely." D. Maclise. A capital companion picture, in point of merit, to Leslie's picture of Mr. Dickens as Master Stephen, in the same play—"Every Man in his Humour." The portrait and the character are well sustained—we have both the wealthy merchant and the thoughtful biographer. Mr. Maclise is always singularly happy in pictures of this class. Why will he not paint oftener in the same way?

. "A Gravel Pit." W. Mulready. Painted from Nature, so the catalogue informs us, forty years ago, and particularly interesting, when we look upon it in connexion with Mr. Mulready's after works. He had early begun to paint from Nature with that strict attention which he still continues to follow up.

135. "The Internal Economy of Do-the-Boys Hall." T. Webster, R.A. A marvellous little picture, full of character. It was painted for Mr. Dickens.

153. "View near Penshurst, Kent." F. Lee, R. One of Mr. Lee's best

157. "Lady Jane Grey. C. R. Leslie, R.A. A small full-length, in illustration of the well-known passage in Rogers's "Pleasures of Memory"

> "Most gentle, most unfortunate,
> Crown'd but to die; who in her chamber sate,
> Musing with Plato, while the torch was blown,
> And every ear and every heart was won,
> And all in green array were chasing down the sun."

There is an air of gentle thoughtfulness and beauty about the head; but to our taste the little Bridesmaid by Stothard, in Rogers's Poems is a better work of art. The details of the Library are quite untrue to the period.

162 "The Shell." C. R. Leslie. A small family piece, in which a beautiful [illegible] in Wordsworth (though the idea is Landor's) is worked out with a great deal of skill

> "His countenance soon
> Brighten'd with joy: for murmurings from within
> Were heard, sonorous cadences; whereby,
> To his belief, the monitor expressed
> Mysterious union with its native sea."

173. "Country Cousins." R. Redgrave. Painted or Mr. Vernon, though hardly a good specimen of Mr. Redgrave's manner. It is, however, less painful in its story, and less lea of rich and pure colour than the subjects usually chosen by Mr. Redgrave. The colouring is very hard.

176. "A Rubber." T. Webster, R.A. Four country bumpkins play nine at cards. The scene the interior of an inn. The expressions are most admirable.

HER MAJESTY'S

Mdlle. Lind repeated the character of Norma in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento" on Saturday; and on Tuesday night appeared for the third time in Ann na, in Bellini's "Sonnambula." The theatre on both occasions has been filled with Royalty, rank, and fashion, and the charming performances of the Swedish Nightingale were received with the most enthusiastic applause, and followed, as usual, by continued ovations. For the extra night on Thursday, which was well attended, the "Figlia del Reggimento" was given.

We learn that Lucia will be the first new character for Mdlle. Lind; and supported by Mr. Reeves, in Edgar, whose engagement, announced in our last week's Number, has been confirmed, the first representation will not, however, be looked for with the most intense interest. In the meanwhile, "Linda" will be produced on Saturday (this evening), for the début of Madame Tadolini, whose Portrait and Biography were published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS last week. Mdlle. Schwartz will be Pierotto, and Mr. Reeves Il Visconde de Serval

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

On Saturday night Mdme. Viardot's triumph in Amina was complete. Recovered from the stage-fright she experienced on her début, and supported by Mario as Elvino, her vocal and histrionic powers were fully developed. It was difficult to recognize, in the Viardot of Saturday, the Viardot of the preceding Tuesday. In her opening cavatina she was quite another being, taking the most difficult divisions with a volume of voice and a certainty that drew forth immense applause. In the Phantom Chorus, the cadenza at the close, as if Amina had got a glimpse of the supposed ghost, was a fine conception. But it was in the finale of the bed-room scene, that the lofty attributes of Mdme. Viardot's tragic powers were seen to the highest perfection. Herein she exhibited all the intensity of Malibran without the exaggeration; and Mario seconding her exertions by singing with extraordinary fervour, the effect was electrical, and the cheering and calls before the curtain were long and long-continued. The scena in the last act was a magnificent piece of acting and singing—the slow movement replete with exquisite pathos, and the concluding rondo poured forth with marvellous rapture; the exclamation "Ah! mi abbracci," in her concluding notes, created a prodigious excitement, and the shake on the upper notes was quite thrilling. The encore was unanimous, and the ovations overwhelming.

Madame Viardot, by this second performance of Amina, has proved that her dramatic genius is of the highest order, and that she possesses originality of musical conception in a remarkable degree. Her fioriture is thoroughly artistical, and is entirely her own. In respect to the quality of her organ, it is beautiful in the medium notes, and soul-stirring in the lower tones; but in the upper octave there is a want of timbre, as if this portion of the register had been fatigued either by over-exertion or by forcing them in her early studies.

On Tuesday night, Rossini's "Donna del Lago" was repeated, but not for the last time, we should presume, as was announced, after such a crowded house and its brilliant reception; Mdme. Viardot, Alboni and Mario (Malibran's old favourites, and the "Gathering of the Clans," with the chorus of bards, provoking the utmost enthusiasm.

On Thursday night, Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" was revived, Grisi, Alboni, Tamburini, Lavia, Tagliafico, Mario and Marini resuming their former parts; Luigi Mei, Soldi, and Rache appearing for the first time in Vasilieo, Liverario, and Petrucci, Mdlle. Dhegan for the first time in Astolfo. The opera was therefore in the secondary parts much strengthened. The house was crowded to an overflow. The chorus in the prologue, the leading parts sung by Marini, Colonna, Mei, Soldi, Tagliafico, and Mdlle. Alboni, was rapturously encored. The drinking song of the latter received the usual double encore. Grisi and Mario were in superb voice, and the trio with Tamburini in the second act was demanded a second time. The latter singer played with a wonderful ensemble. At the close, the last scene of the "Sonnambula" was given by Madame Viardot, the "Ah! non giunge" electrifying the house as usual, and encored

Mdlle. Lucile Grahn arrived in town on Thursday, from Hamburg, and will soon make her début

After the "Donna del Lago," on Tuesday evening, the new ballet divertissement of "Ninette, ou les Sens," was produced, and with complete success, the second tableau containing throughout some of the most beautiful effects we ever witnessed. The story is very slight. A disguised Sylph young Persian Prince is punished by his betrothed with the loss of the five senses, until he sees als error and receives them again with the hand of the fair one. There is as little in this, that we could desire, although the ballet altogether is not to be disregarded with, with advantage. Mdlle Brussi is the chief dancer; she is seconded by Mdlle. Nina Marmet, Stephan, Guy Eryan, and Honoré; Messrs. W. H. Payne, O'Bryan, and Conti; but the attention of the dilettanti was more with the splendid tableau scène and beautiful groupings than with the abstract dancing. These are set off to the best advantage in the "Pas des Jardins." The scene represents a gorgeous garden occupying the entire area of the stage, which is thrown open to the very walls of the theatre, the usual places of the wings being occupied by elegant arabesque colonnes supporting an arched roof of elaborate open fretwork, with a broad flight of steps at the further end. From every point of the scene, throngs of corybhées bearing wreaths and flowers come trooping forth; never were so many graceful forms in white muslin and pink wreaths seen upon the stage at once; they perform a dance and whilst a single rank of them entirely stretches across the front of the scene from one proscenium wing to the other, the remainder so dispose their floral burthens, that, on the sudden parting of the stage, this is turned into a lovely garden with walks, parterres, and clumps of blooming flower-and shrubs. This novel and exquisitely beautiful effect was greeted with thunders of applause several combinations, equally striking, take place; and afterwards, with a large quantity of light golden arches about which grapes are clustering, such bouquets, and scheres, and trellised walks are formed as defy description. The most florid pictures of the [illegible] chronicles and Arabian nights are completely realised

The only fault we have to find and it is one easily remedied is, as we have [illegible], the length of the first tableau, which has little or no interest to keep it from flagging. Despite this drawback, the applause at the end was general, the concluding picture being admirably grouped. Its production reflects great credit upon all concerned in it, especially Mr. Grieve, who has never surpassed the present scenery. It is said, in the theatrical world, that £2000 have been expanded on its getting up—the "properties" alone costing nearly half that sum.

DRURY-LANE

The performances of the Cinque Nationale terminated by an extra night on Tuesday, and the season in the circle took place under somewhat favourable circumstances. From some disagreement or other, the band could not be prevailed upon to perform, and the entire programme was gone through to the music of a drum and fife, which had a very comical effect. The audience, however, were not a whit less pleased with the feats of the equestrians than heretofore, and applauded them all most heartily.

HAYMARKET

On Monday, the "generous band" of men of letters and artists who have on several occasions appeared in aid of benevolent objects, gave an extra performance at the Haymarket Theatre, in aid of the fund for the endowment of a perpetual Curatorship of Shakespeare's House. The play was the "Merry Wives of Windsor," with the following cast:—

Sir John Falstaff, Mr. Mark Lemon; Fenton, [illegible] Mr Charles [illegible] Mr Frank Stone [illegible] Dudley Costello; Host of the Garter Inn, [illegible] Charles Dickens; Dr. Caius, Lovell; Mr. George Cruikshank; Evans, Mr. Augustus Egg; Bardolph, Mr Augustus Egg; Pistol, Mr Baton; Ford, Miss Fortescue; Mrs Page, Miss Kenworthy; Mrs. Anne Page, Miss Anne Romer; Mrs. Quickly, Mrs Dowton Cooke.

The most striking performances were Mr. Lemon's Falstaff, and Mr. Forster's Ford, both which were admirable. Mr. Dickens had little scope in the part of Shallow, but the early scene was excellent. The comedy was dressed in the period of Henry IV., instead of the Elizabethan costume in which it is conventionally played; the dresses were exceedingly interesting, and in some instances superb. The entertainments concluded with Mrs. Inchbald's farce of "Animal Magnetism," in which Mr. Dickens, as the Doctor, reminded us of Matthews and Blanchard; and Mr. Bulkhead made Jeffrey's bit of character very hilarious. The farce was capitally played throughout

On Wednesday, the Amateurs performed Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour," with the cast as before, excepting Master Stephen, which was played by Mr. Augustus Egg, instead of Mr. Douglas Jerrold. The comedy was followed by Kenney's farce of "Love, Law, and Physic," in which Mr. Dickens, as Pecksie, played with great spirit. The music on the evening was rather than on Monday; and we are happy to learn that the two-fold result will be a considerable addition to the Shakspeare House Endowment Fund.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The symphonies at the fifth concert were No. 4, in B flat, of Haydn, and No. 2, in D, of Beethoven; both were finely rendered under Costa's direction, the allegretto scherzando in the latter being fervently encored. The overtures were a MS. by Mr. J. H. Griesbach, one of the Doctors of the Society, entitled "Titania," and the "Zauberflöte" of Mozart. Mr. Griesbach has the reputation of being one of our most able native musicians, and in many respects his forms were unexceptionable; but when we look for ideas, meagre and scanty is the search, and the theme are so palpably Handelian, as to deprive his overture of the merit of originality. The band carried it through with spirit, and nationality in the auditory ensured for it a very flattering reception. Mr. Sterndale Bennett's exquisite performance of Mozart's charming Pianoforte Concerto in D minor was a great treat. We find that this processor gains ground every year as an executant, there is more volume in his tone, his touch is more poetical, and his execution more finished, than last season: his own cadenzas were worthy of the master he interpreted so conscientiously and eloquently. Madame Castellan and Mario sustained the honours of the vocal selection bravely, the former singing Beethoven's "Ah! perfido," and Mozart's "Come scoglio," "Così fan tutte," and the latter Mercadante's romance, "In terra si diviano," in which he was rapturously encored, and with Madame Castellan, in the air from Donizetti's "Roberto Devereux," "Un tenero ora." The next Concert will be on the 29th of M.

THE MUSICAL UNION.—At Crosby Hall, who created such a sensation at his début at the Royal Italian Opera, last Friday's Concert, performed, on Monday morning, Beethoven's B flat trio for piano, violin (Santon), and violoncello (Piatti), with distinguished success, before a numerous assemblage of nobility and fashion. He is one of the greatest classical players of the age. Haydn's quartet in G, No. 81, and Mendelssohn's No. 3, in E minor, were nobly interpreted by Sainton, Deloffre, Hill, and Piatti. The fifth meeting will be on Tuesday, the 30th inst. Mr. Ella maintains the high character of these entertainments with unflagging [illegible]

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The second performance of the "Barbiere" last Matinée attracted a brilliant assemblage of fashion; the pit and galls. with the varied colours of the ladies' bonnets, looked like a tulip bed. The usual encores were bestowed on Mdlle. Alboni, Mario, Tamburini, Ronconi, and Rosati. The duet in the second part the band played Weber's "Euryanthe," and Beethoven's "Prometheus" to perfection. Mdme Viardot was rapturously encored in Handel's "Lascia," from "Rinaldo," beautifully accompanied by Meyerbeer on the violoncello, and in one of Chopin's quaint pianoforte Mazurkas, arranged by herself for the voice, a marvellous exhibition of skill in fioriture. Mdme Persiani, Mdlle. Cruvelli, Mdlle. Antonia de Merali, a cousin of Viardot, who proved herself a worthy exponent of the Garcia school of vocalisation. She sang Handel's air, "Pangarò la sorte," from "Giulio Cesare," with artistic intelligence and good taste. "The Duke's" selection was admirable on the whole, though there were only two novelties, the one a selection from a Masque by Matthew Locke, composed for Charles the Second, in 1663, the forms and ideas of which, to our mind, go far to settle the vexed question as to the music in Macbeth" being really Locke's composition; the other "novelty" was Sir H. Bishop's dramatic and picturesque Round, "Hark! 'tis the Indian Drum." But as Weber and Bishop are no more, we do not see how they can be ranked among the moderns, we do not see why works of a living composer can be fairly introduced, according to the regulation of the "Ancients." Mr. Simms Reeves sang the "Deeper and deeper still" of Handel, powerfully, but coarsely, and his reading was not of the most intellectual order. Miss Messent, Miss Dolby, Mr. Machin, Mdlle. Alboni, and Signor Tamburini were the other vocalists, acquitting themselves ably in pieces requiring no special notice. The next concert will be on Monday, when the Prince of Prussia, the Duke of Mecklenburgh, the Duchess of Cambridge, &c., were present. The sixth Concert, next Wednesday, will be under the direction of the Lord Bishop of Rochester, Dr. Murray, the new director

EXETER HALL.—Mr. Hullah's singing classes, aided by professors of eminence, vocal and instrumental, performed Handel's "Acis and Galatea," in good style, on Wednesday evening, Mr. Reeves distinguishing himself greatly in the tenor part

MUSICAL AND DRAMATIC ACADEMY. This undertaking, directed by Mr. Howard Glover, and conducted by Mr. Lindsay Sloper, the celebrated actress, is progressing favorably; and the advantage of training singers and actors together as well as musically was strongly manifested in the opening concert [illegible] the Academy, in Store-street. The singing of Misses R. J. Taylor, Miss Rowland, Miss John Blenden, and Miss Emily Macmanus was highly creditable.

THE MISSES FINN AND MR. CALKIN'S CONCERT.—This Concert was given at the Hanover-square Rooms on Tuesday evening, and was very fashionable. The bénéficiaires took prominent parts in the vocal gleanings with great success, and were assisted by Mdme. Tuillon, Miss Dolby, Miss Bassano, Mr. Reeves, Mr. W. H. Seguin, and John Parry. Miss Finn and Mr. F. B. Kyle played a concertante pianoforte duo, by Vincent Wallace, on an air from Halevy's "Eclair," very effectively

Mr. W. H. HOLMES'S SECOND PIANOFORTE PERFORMANCE.—On Wednesday, there was an excellent selection—Mr. Holmes, and his pupil, Mr. Noble, and Mr. Sterndale Bennett being the executants.

MRS. COLLINS'S CONCERT.—The last vocal meeting was given on Wednesday evening, at the Princess' Concert-room. Besides the clever family of Mr. Collins, comprising Mr. George Collins (violoncello), Mr. Frederick Collins (flute), Miss Madora Collins (piano), Mr. Henry Collins (violin), and Mr. Vere Collins, there were Lavigne (oboe), Herr Sonnenberg (clarionet), Herr Kleigl (contrabasso), and Mr. Julien Adams (piano), amongst the instrumental stars. The vocalists were Mdlle. Nau, the prima-donna of the Opera Comique, Paris, who was encored in the "Lucrezia Borgia" drinking-song, Misses Elvina and Madora Collins, Miss A. Parzell, and Mr. John Parry: the latter convulsing the company with his "Diary of a Physician."

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Handel's "Israel in Egypt" was performed last Exeter Hall on Friday, the solos by Misses Birch, Dolby, and Stewart, Messrs. Lockey, Phillips, and Lawler.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—The veteran Blewitt gave his annual concert at the Music Hall, Store-street, on Friday night; but we must postpone a notice until next week. Herr Kuhe, the pianoforte professor, gives his morning concert on Monday morning Madame Frezzi will give her annual concert at Her Majesty's Theatre. The English opera season will begin at Sadler's Wells on Monday, directed by Miss Rainforth. The Beethoven Society meets on Monday a gist at M. Conrad Rooms, in Marlborough-street. On Friday morning Mrs. Anderson will give her annual concert, aided by the artistes of the Royal Italian Opera. On the same evening the seventh concert of the Amateur Musical Society. Italian opera at Her Majesty's and Royal Italian Theatres, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Chopin's pianoforte playing before her Majesty at Stafford House, on Monday, created a great sensation: Labiache, Mario, and Tamburini sang the trio from Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" admirably: M. Benedict was the accompanyist at this concert, given by the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland to celebrate the christening of their infant daughter.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

On Lord STANLEY'S motion that the name of Lord Redesdale be added to the banking committee, in consequence of the vacancy occasioned by the demise of Lord Ashburton, the noble Lord passed a high eulogium on the private and public character of that deceased nobleman; the Marquis of LANSDOWNE and Lord BROUGHAM also bearing their testimony to the estimable qualities of him whose loss to the country, in connexion with the HOUSE, deplored.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS BILL.—The second reading of Lord Stanley's measure, entitled the Parliamentary Proceedings Adjournment Bill, gave rise to a debate, but without provoking sufficient opposition to go to a division—at the termination of which the bill was read a second time; and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

The House having resolved itself into a committee on the Navigation Laws, and the laws for the regulation of ships and seamen,

Mr. LABOUCHERE [illegible] solutions proposed by the Government as the foundation of their bill on those subjects, and gave an outline of the changes he had resolved upon recommending Parliament to adopt. The right honourable gentleman began his statement by remarking that, if the alterations he was about to introduce were of a far more vital nature than any hitherto proposed to Parliament, with respect to the Navigation Laws, it should be remembered that extraordinary changes had occurred around us, in the emancipation of the American Colonies, in the growth of steam navigation, and in the whole alteration of our system of trade and commerce. He then took a rapid review of the history of our Navigation Laws from the 5th Richard II. to the present time, closing this portion of his exposition by a statement of the general scope of the existing laws. These laws, he said, were mainly comprised in three statutes—the Act commonly known as the Navigation Law, the Act for the Registering of British Vessels, and the Act for the Registration of Seamen. The intention of these Acts was to secure the colonial trade, the long-voyage trade, and the indirect or carrying trade to ourselves. With respect to the British colonies, the right honourable gentleman said, that of all the just demands ever made in the House, the demand made by the colonies for every possible concession was the most just; and as long as we chose to deprive them of all preference in the disposal of their produce, we should in justice remove from them all the restrictions imposed on them by our Navigation Laws. With respect to the carrying trade, the practical question to be considered was not whether our present restrictions were right, but whether, by timely concessions, we could not place it on a safer foundation. From Prussia, speaking in the name of Germany, a voice of warning had already preceded; and from the United States of America a similar offer or invitation had issued. The Minister of America had said, "If you do little, we will do little; if you do much, we will do much; if you do all, we will do all." This warning and invitation formed an opportunity we should not be thrown away Mr. Labouchere proceeded to expound the views of the Government They did not intend to recommend any material alteration with respect to the coasting trade, or our fisheries; but they proposed to strike from the Statute Book all the other portions of our Navigation Laws, but without depriving the Queen in Council of the power of imposing countervailing duties on any foreign nation that might treat our shipping with injustice, or not meet us on equal terms. They also proposed to do away with the regulation that compelled ships to be British built in order to be registered as British vessels; but they did not intend to make any change with regard to ownership; and, as to manning, they proposed that the crews in the coasting trade should be all British, and in the foreign trade two-thirds British seamen—admitting Indian Lascars to the character of British seamen, and abrogating the necessity of having apprentices. With respect to the coasting trade of the colonies, it was proposed to reserve it generally to British shipping, but to allow to each colony the power to pass an act throwing open its coasting trade should it deem fit. The right hon. gentleman wound up his statement by arguing that the experiments already made in the removal or reduction of protection were encouraging, that it would be for the advantage of the ship-builders of this country to compete with all the world, and that the changes contemplated by the Government could not possibly injure the naval power of England. In conclusion, he announced his intention of bringing in this session measures relative to the light dues and to the merchant service fund; and of preparing, for a future session, measures on the subject of pilotage and for the better instruction of British ship-masters. The right hon. gentleman laid the resolutions on the table, with the intimation that the discussion on them should be postponed to next Monday.

To questions put by Mr. Gladstone,

Mr. LABOUCHERE answered that the Government had made no overtures to foreign governments; and that the establishment of a departmental vagrant board on the mercantile marine was in contemplation

Mr. ROBINSON expressed his decided disapprobation of the scheme sketched out by the President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. HUME thanked the Government for having dealt so largely with the question; he did not think the portions left untouched of much moment

Lord G. HERVEY said he never recollected a measure of such large change introduced to Parliament on such feeble grounds. The President of the Board of Trade was not able to say that the country was unanimous upon his proposal; that a number of petitions had been presented for the repeal of the Navigation Laws; that the country was groaning under any grievances arising from their existence; he was not able to show that freights were too high, that ships and shipping were too costly. The only argument he could rely on for his scheme was that Prussia had threatened to trample on the shipping of England. Prussia, instead of coming down as promised, after commercial relaxations, had increased her duties, and had threatened us with something, and now we were asked to abandon to her our shipping interests. The practical effect of the repeal of the Navigation Laws would be to increase the trade and commerce of foreign countries at the expense of the trade and commerce of England, and to give encouragement to the navies of Prussia and of the United States of America at the cost of the ships and seamen of Great Britain. The noble Lord having exposed the erroneous calculations and the false returns made to deceive, and the false pretences upon which the expediency of this measure was defended,

Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Henley, Mr. Mitchell, Captain Harris, Mr. Hudson, and Lord Ingestre addressed the Committee

On the motion of Dr. Bowring the Chairman then reported progress.

On the motion that the Chairman obtain leave to sit again on Monday next,

Captain HARRIS moved, as an amendment, that the debate be adjourned to Monday week

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

CATHEDRALS AND COLLEGIATE CHURCHES.

Mr. HORSMAN moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the state of our cathedrals and other collegiate churches, with a view to ascertaining whether they may not be rendered more conducive to the services of the church and the spiritual instruction of the people. In support of this motion, the honourable gentleman entered into a long and most elaborate statement, showing the lethargy of the Establishment as compared with Dissent—particularly in the cathedral towns; the disproportion between the incomes of those who officiated in the cathedrals and the services which they were called upon to perform; that our cathedral establishments, as at present constituted, tended to the discouragement of religion, the absolute destitution to which many of the working clergy had been reduced, and to the immoderate labour to which they were subjected, the injurious operation of the tenure of church property, and a variety of other matters, all of which he designated as abuses, which brought the establishment into discredit, and impairing its usefulness, and of which every consideration connected with religion rendered it imperative upon them to get rid. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to show how, in different positions by a careful and minute analysis of the state of the Chapter of the Cathedral of Canterbury, and of the condition of the establishment generally in that city, which he followed up by a similar examination of that with Lincoln. These cases he selected as illustrative of the condition of all the cathedral towns, in all of which he contended that dissent bore a large proportion to the establishment than in any other towns in the kingdom. For the abuses and anomalies which he thus exposed, he blamed not individuals, but the system in which they originated, and in which he trusted the House would loudly call for very material alterations. He was with a view to effecting these that he submitted the motion which was that evening on the paper in his name.

Mr. GLADSTONE regarded the question before the House as one not having reference to the conduct of individuals, but bearing upon the state of the law on the subject involved in the motion. The point for the House to consider was, whether the state of the law in this respect was that in which it ought permanently to remain. He was inclined to believe that it was not so much Mr. Horsman's object, in submitting his motion, to get the inquiry which it sought as to have an expression of the opinion of the House on the necessity which existed for some change in reference to our cathedrals. The facts of the case were too broad and palpable to require any specific inquiry into them. The cathedrals had ever been intended for the fulfilment of high and important objects in connexion with the Church, one of the chief of which was the maintenance of the daily worship of God in all its beauty and decency. Such being the case, he wished to see these establishments put in a condition to enable them to discharge the functions for which they were intended; and he hoped that the attention of the Government would be further directed to this important subject. If he objected to the state in which our cathedrals were at present, it was because he thought that much might be done to develop their usefulness, and render them more serviceable to the interests of the Church, and of religion generally. The right hon. gentleman concluded by stating in detail several improvements which he was anxious to see effected in the regulation of our cathedrals.

Lord J. RUSSELL agreed with those who thought that it might be right to inquire into the state of, and to take further measures in Parliament with respect to, the cathedral establishments of the country. He would have said nothing on the present occasion, but for the misapprehensions which might prevail from his simply acquiescing in the proposal of the hon. and learned gentleman, that he agreed with him in the propriety of instituting such an inquiry. He could not come to the conclusion that these establishments were useless, or tended to the injury of religion. In any reform which he might be induced to undertake in reference to the subject, he would be actuated by a desire to preserve the cathedrals, by rendering them effectual for their true purpose, and not to treat them as useless, or as establishments the maintenance or destruction of which could be regarded with indifference. The noble Lord then adverted to some of the statements made by Mr. Horsman, to which he took exception, but expressed himself really, although differing somewhat from the views of the honourable and learned gentleman, to pay his tribute to the attention which he had paid to the subject, and to the assiduity with which he had mastered its details, as well as to concur with him in saying that further inquiry might profitably be made with a view to improvements taken in reference to the subject. There might be some inconvenience in agreeing to the motion in its present shape, but he was quite prepared to admit that the whole subject required further consideration on the part of the Government, and would not hope, during the present session, to do anything effectual in this direction, but would again repeat his conviction of the necessity which appeared to exist of further inquiries on the subject.

After a few words from Mr. Hume, Mr. Goulburn, and Mr. Heywood, Mr. HORSMAN briefly replied, and the motion was then withdrawn

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

Mr. URQUHART then called the attention of the House to the relations of this country with Russia in reference to events in the north of Europe; in doing which he maintained that he would be proposing no less than England and Russia, with the north of Europe, neglected her own true interests, and that Russia had profited by her neglect and subserviency, and had entailed upon Europe a state of things which was dangerous to the peace of the Continent, and destructive to its further progress. He concluded by moving for papers connected with the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi, and with the affairs of Schleswig-Holstein.

Mr. HUME seconded the motion, being desirous that Mr. Urquhart should have an opportunity of being heard, the House having been ungraciously counted out on a former occasion, when he sought to bring forward a similar motion.

Lord PALMERSTON, in a very long speech, denied that England had ever been made subservient to the aggrandisement of Russia, or that it had, as alleged by the honourable member, ever conformed to the principles which had actuated the Holy Alliance. The papers for which the honourable member had moved would throw no light upon the affairs of Poland, which had been made the chief pretext for the motion which the honourable member had submitted. As to the papers connected with the Schleswig-Holstein question, he decidedly objected to their production, on the ground of the inconvenience to which it would lead, seeing that negotiations were still pending on that subject. The noble Lord concluded by intimating his intention of opposing the motion

After a few observations from Colonel Tynte, Lord Dudley Stuart, Mr. Blackstone, and Dr. Bowring,

Mr. URQUHART withdrew his motion, observing that his object was not so much to obtain papers as to produce a discussion upon the subjects to which that motion referred, particularly upon the affairs of Poland.

The motion was consequently withdrawn, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS BILL.—Sir LACY EVANS moved the second reading of the Parliamentary Electors Bill, the object of which was, so far to alter the rate-paying clauses of the Reform Bill as to extend the time of paying rates from the 20th of July to the 15th of August.—Mr. MANNING HARRIS opposed the motion, deeming the existing regulations in this respect perfectly proper.—Sir G. GREY supported the measure, which was nearly similar to one which had been supported by the Government in a former session.—The House divided, and a second reading of the bill was carried by a majority of 60 to 35.

AUDIT OF RAILWAY ACCOUNTS.—Sir F. T. BARING moved the second reading of the Audit of Railway Accounts Bill. The chief principle of the bill was to enable the minority of a railway company to compel the auditing of the accounts by an impartial person.—Mr. BANKES opposed the bill, and moved that it be read a second time that day six months.—Mr. LABOUCHERE cordially supported the measure. After some discussion, in which Mr. Henley, Mr Aglionby, and Mr Muntz took part, the house divided, and the second reading of the bill was negatived by a majority of 106 to 38.

SCOTCH HOUSES OF WORSHIP. Mr BOUVERIE moved the second reading of the PLACES FOR SITES of Worship (Scotland) Bill, which was seconded by Mr. Lygon. Without discussing the bill, the House divided, and the second reading was carried by a majority of 80 to 25. A discussion was then raised upon the formal question that the bill be committed, several hon. members stating that they were taken by surprise, or they would have opposed the bill in the first instance. Eventually the bill was ordered to be committed on the 7th of June. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

PARISH SCHOOLMASTERS (SCOTLAND). Lord WHARNCLIFFE inquired whether the Government had taken any steps to carry out the minute of 1846 of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education, respecting the making of provision to parish schoolmasters in Scotland.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said the subject was at present under the consideration of the Government

The Smoke Prohibition Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed

The Insolvent Debtors (India) Bill passed through committee, and was ordered to be reported.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL. The House went into committee on this bill, and was engaged in the discussion of the clauses until nine o'clock, when, according to previous agreement, the House resumed for the purpose of taking into consideration

THE BOROUGH ELECTIONS BILL,

The second reading of which was moved by Sir J. HANMER. The principle of this measure was, that when an election was declared void by a Committee of the House, for corrupt practices, an inquiry into the circumstances of the case should be instituted, by the House, through the medium of paid commissioners, to be appointed for the purpose by the Speaker, the House afterwards to act upon their report, either by disfranchising the borough, or by the adoption of any other course that might be deemed suitable.

Colonel SIBTHORPE opposed the bill, and moved as an amendment that it be read a second time that day six months

After some discussion,

Mr. STUART moved the adjournment of the debate, which on a division, was lost by a majority of 218 to 69.

The House again immediately divided on the question of the second reading of the bill, which was carried by 126 to 85.

The Incumbered Estates (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

Adjourned.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE CHANNEL FLEET.—Sir Charles Napier has been ordered to Spithead with the St. Vincent and Prince Regent. Great efforts are being made by the Lady Patronesses, who held their first meeting at Willis's Rooms, on Friday, the 12th (the Marchioness of Aldesbury in the chair), to render the ball more attractive than before, and several fancy quadrilles, mazourkas, and polkas ex costume are now in preparation under the direction of the Duchess of Bedford, the Duchess of Leeds, the Marchioness of Ely, the Viscountess Palmerston, Mrs. Milner Gibson, &c. The Duchess of Sutherland was prevented from attending, owing to indisposition. We have every reason to believe that this fête will be a brilliant one.

The total number of vessels employed in the foreign trade of the United Kingdom, which entered inwards in the three months ending the 5th of April last, was 3846, and the tonnage, 785,780. Same period of 1847—vessels, 3054; tonnage, 1,023,260. Same period of 1846—vessels, 3083; tonnage, 1,05,16. This shows a decrease in 1848, as compared with 1847, of no less than 2218 vessels, and upwards of 538,000 tons. There was a slight increase in the number and tonnage of the vessels employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom within the same period.

CHRISTENING OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS LOUISA CAROLINE ALBERTA, AT BUCKINGHAM-PALACE.

THE ROYAL CHRISTENING.

The ceremony of the baptism of the infant Princess, fourth daughter of the Queen and Prince Albert, took place on Saturday evening, in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace.

The Queen Dowager and the Royal Family, the foreign Princes in this country, the clergy, the foreign and Cabinet Ministers, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal household assisting in or invited to the ceremony, arrived at the Palace between six and seven o'clock.

Several members of the Diplomatic Corps were present.

At seven o'clock her Majesty and the Sponsors, viz. his Royal Highness Prince Albert, proxy for his Royal Highness the Duke Gustavus of Mecklenburg-Schwerin; her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, proxy for her Royal Highness the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; entered the chapel in procession, and the Queen and the other Royal personages were conducted to their seats (opposite to those of the sponsors) by the Lord Chamberlain and the Lord Steward; the Royal children being placed by her Majesty on her left, and the Royal visitors stationing themselves in a line with her Majesty.

The Mistress of the Robes, the Great Officers of the Household, the Groom of the Stole to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Queen, and the Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Prince, took their places near her Majesty. The Treasurer of the Household remained behind the sponsors.

The Queen wore a very beautiful dress of white and silver moir, of Spitalfields manufacture, trimmed with Honiton lace, and ornamented with white acacias and diamonds. Her Majesty had the riband of the Order of the Garter, with a magnificent George set in brilliants. The headdress was a wreath of white acacias and diamonds. Her Majesty also wore a necklace and ear-rings of brilliants.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was dressed in sky blue velvet, embroidered with gold. The dress of Prince Alfred was of white and silver, and the three Princesses were all dressed alike in frocks of British lace, in imitation of Mechlin lace, with flounces of the same over white satin.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington were habited in the uniform of Field-Marshals; the Prince wore the Collars of the Garter and the Bath, and the ensigns of the Golden Fleece.

Her Majesty being seated, a corale, the music of which was composed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, was performed by her Majesty's private band.

When the music had ceased, the Lord Chamberlain, accompanied by the Groom of the Stole to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, conducted the infant Princess into the Chapel. The Royal infant was dressed in a robe of Honiton lace over white satin, and was attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton. Her Royal Highness was carried by the head nurse.

The Baptismal Service then commenced, and was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Queen Dowager made the responses on the part of the illustrious sponsors, and on his Grace asking the name of the child, her Majesty named the Princess, Louisa Caroline Alberta. The solemn and interesting service being completed, the Princess Louisa was carried from the Chapel.

A very fine composition was then performed, viz. a grand chorus.

"Hosanna to the God of Israel,
In him rejoice—declare his praise,
Exalt his name for evermore."

(From a service)—Mozart.—Sir George Smart presided at the organ.

This concluded the ceremonial, and the august sponsors quitted the chapel, followed by her Majesty and her illustrious visitors, and passed in procession up the grand staircase to the Throne-Room.

The Queen afterwards gave a state banquet in the Picture Gallery, in honour of the occasion.

Her Majesty also received an evening party in addition to the company present at the ceremony of the christening and the banquet.

PASTRENGO.

This locality, one of the most picturesque spots in Upper Italy, has been the scene of an important movement in the Revolt of Lombardy. It was at Pastrengo that the King of Sardinia, on the 30th of April, measured, for the first time, his strength with the Austrians, and here he gained a victory. Our view, from a drawing obligingly communicated by Mr. L. Gruner, shows the neighbourhood of Pastrengo and Piovezzano, with the belvedere of the Merinelli family, and Cavajons and Cordevigo.

Pastrengo is celebrated as the birth-place of Guglielmo (Arimondi) J. Pastrengo, the author of "De Originibus Rerum Libellus;" he was the friend of Petrarch, who frequently mentions him in his letters. Cordevigo, seen in the right-hand distance, has obtained a peculiar fame on account of the large collection of relics assembled there by a Lombardo Bishop, who is stated to have gathered not fewer than 3036 relics in his villa.

We learn, from intelligence dated May 6, that the left of the Royal army still rests on the Upper Adige at Bussolengo; with its advance at Pastrengo and Piovezzano, nearly opposite to Pontone.

PASTRENGO, THE BELVEDERE OF THE MARINELLI FAMILY.—FROM A DRAWING BY MR. L. GRUNER.

THE CHINESE JUNK IN THE EAST INDIA DOCKS.

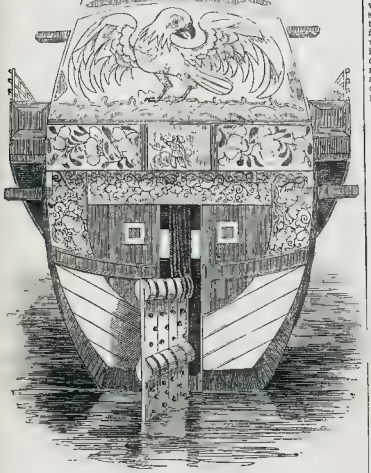
IN our Journal for April 1 we briefly described this large class Junk, which had, a few days previously, arrived in the Thames for exhibition. The interval has been occupied chiefly in repainting the vessel, and putting in order this house upon the water, so as to fit her for public inspection. Already she has been visited by many persons of distinction. On Saturday last the Duke of Wellington inspected the curious craft, and spent upwards of an hour in the examination of the interior fittings and embellishments, as well as the rude tactics of her means of defence. On Tuesday her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert visited the Junk; and on Wednesday Queen Adelaide and a distinguished party honoured the ship by inspecting it. Yesterday it was opened for exhibition to the public.

The vessel Keyang, for such is the name of the Junk, lies in the East India Docks, a short distance from the railway terminus at Blackwall. This will render it of very convenient access for visitors from the metropolis. In the dock basin, almost surrounded by steam-ships of war, lies the strange vessel, which has, indeed, a sort of arktic, aboriginal character in comparison with the huge scientific structures of to-day. As a necessary precaution, the Junk is encompassed with timber hoarding, through which is a doorway, having passed which you stand beside the ship, with its three masts dressed with flags and streamers, its mainmast surmounted with a fish-like vane, bearing on its body, in Chinese characters, "Good luck to the Junk."

THE CHIN TEE JOSS.

We have engraved the stern, as well to show its great height—over 40 feet—and its decorative character, as the rudder, which is, perhaps, the most singular part of the vessel. It is made of iron-wood and teak, bound with iron, and its weight is from 7½ to 8 tons. It is perforated with rhomboidal holes, and in deep water is 12 feet below the bottom of the vessel. The great elevation of the stern enables the rudder to be elevated or depressed according to the depth of water; and by this means the draught may be made to vary from 12 to 24 feet. When the rudder is raised up, as must be the case in shallow water, the vessel is steered by a short tiller on the second poop. When let down to its greatest depth, it requires occasionally the strength of 15 men to work the large tiller, and even then the aid of a half tackle purchase and the best patent blocks; otherwise it would require thirty men. On one occasion, when the Junk was running before a fresh gale, attended with hail squalls, a tiller rope of nine inches was snapped in two. Instead of braces and pinties, two immense ropes, made of bamboo and grass, pass under the bottom and come over the bows on the upper deck, where they are fastened; these serve to confine the rudder to the stern.

The Anchors on board the Keying are made of iron-wood, one weighing 3000, the other 2700 pounds. The flukes are shod with iron, and attached to the shank by strong lashings of bamboo. The stock is composed of three separate pieces of wood, lashed together by rattan ropes, and is fixed to the crown. The flukes are of the same dimensions as those of similar sized anchors with us; they are straight and not rounded, and there are no palms. The kedges have only one fluke.



THE STERN AND RUDDER.

The moment you reach the Junk you are struck with her very rude construction. The whole of the work is of the roughest kind: the sides of the timbers are not squared, but left just as they grew. No artificial means has been resorted to for any bends; wherever a branch has been found with the natural requisite curvature, it has been employed without further adaptation. The Chinese allege, in explanation, that the work is ridiculous where it is not necessary; that it is absurd to make the boards of the hold very level and smooth, when only goods or ballast is to be put there; and that the timbers on the sides, or the deck, if it be a war junk, are quite good enough to be shotted at, without bestowing any pains upon them.

Again, every thing on board is different from what we see on board an European vessel. The mode of construction, the absence of keel, bowsprit, and shrouds; the materials employed, the mast, the sail, the yard, the rudder, the compass, the anchor; all are dissimilar. Hundreds of European ships, with all their elegance of form and beauty, and lightness of rigging, have been repeatedly before the Chinese, without their appearing conscious of the superiority, or desirous of imitating it. Their unconquerable prejudice, and utter contempt for everything foreign, is a hindrance to all improvement; and to such an excess is this carried, that if a Chinese Junk should be built with any deviation from the old system, an additional port duty would be exacted, by the Emperor's decree, as if it were of foreign build.

As we stepped on board the Junk, the appearance of the deck strongly reminded us of the prints and pictures of the large early English men-of-war, such as the Great Harry, with its lofty forecastle and aftcastle. Her immense poop has three galleries rising one above the other; and her bow, which is square and without bowsprit, is also of great height. The stern is elaborately painted with birds, &c., of real and imaginary forms. Coming from the bow to the afterpart of the vessel, we find a series of water-tight compartments, such as we have adopted in our steam-vessels. On the bows are placed two large eyes: a similar ornament was used by most of the ancients, and is supposed to denote vigilance and activity. The Chinese, however, give a different explanation of it, and say, "Have eye, can see; can see, can savey: no have eye, no can see; no can see, no savey."

The galley, or cooking-house, upon the deck certainly does not remind one of the kitchen of the Reform Club: all the implements seen are two large iron pans upon a brick and tile furnace; in one of these is boiled rice, it being covered with a half-cask, to confine the rice, which swells in boiling, and to prevent it from being thrown out when the vessel rolls. The other pan is used for frying. On the deck, also, are three very large wooden tanks, which will hold about 8000 gallons of water.

To examine the strange construction of the vessel, we descended into the hold: as it has no kelson, the mast is not stepped; the end of the mainmast is four feet from the bottom, and is kept in its place by the topside. Instead of the timbers being first raised, as with us, they are the last in their places, and the vessel is put together with immense spiked nails. The next process is doubling and clamping above and below decks. Two immense beams or string-pieces are then ranged below, fore and aft, which keep the other beams in their places. The deck frames are an arch; and a platform, erected on it, protects it from the sun, and from injuries otherwise inevitable. The seams of the vessel are paid with a sort of cement or putty, made of burnt pounded oyster-shells and oil from the chinam-tree. When dried, it becomes very hard; it never starts, and the seams are thus made water-tight. The gunwales are very large, enabling the sailors to pass outside the vessel. The wales also project three feet from the side. It is supposed she may measure about 400 tons, and carry 700.

The Saloon, or State Cabin, promises to be the greatest attraction. You enter it beneath a sort of skylight, the sides of which are filled with prepared oyster-shells, commonly used in China, instead of glass, which is too costly for general purposes. This Saloon is 32 feet long, 28 broad, and 10½ in height. The sides and ceiling are covered with a lively pattern paper. Upon the former are hung whole-length portraits by Chinese "Sir Joshuas," alternating with tablets, inscribed with moral precepts in Chinese characters. From the ceiling hang lanterns of various forms and sizes, made of horn, glass, silk, and paper; the frames carved and richly gilt; and the transparent panes embroidered or painted with landscapes, flowers, or animals, existing or imaginary. Among the paintings on the walls, too, are flowers, fruit, insects, birds, and monkeys, dogs and cats; all, as well as the other ornaments of the ship, painted by a good-natured native of Canton, named Sam-Sing, who is on board, and who left his country and his family, to accompany the Keying wherever she goes, as her painter in ordinary. Right and left of the saloon ladder are two curious portraits of the Emperor, well worth inspection.

THE SALOON.

The furniture, consisting of tables, chairs, and couches, is of dark heavy wood frame, in design not unlike our furniture of a century since. Here is a host of little occasional tables, besides pier and loo tables, settees, arm-chairs (the seats of marble), and at one end a couch, such as is used in smoking opium, for which there is a pair of pipes. The floor is covered with matting. Around the apartment, in cases, and upon the tables, is a host of "curiosities," including a State umbrella, various models and musical instruments, carved articles, &c., all which are described in a cleverly written description of the Junk, illustrated with wood-cuts, to be purchased on board for a trifle. We specially recommend this little book to all visitors, without which they will pass over many objects without knowing their uses. To use a cut-and-dried phrase of our reviewing brethren, "no visitor, or intending visitor, should be without this book."

At the upper end of the saloon is a Joss-house, or domestic shrine, within which sits the idol Chin Tee, with eighteen arms; it is richly gilt, and has a red silk scarf passed over it: it is made out of one solid piece of camphorwood. In front of this joss-house is an altar-table with incense-burner stands, and a censer, in which the joss-sticks and gilt paper are burned. The face of the altar-table has a scarlet ground, and gilt carvings of flowers and insects, imperial dragons, &c. On each side is a square painted green, on which is inscribed in Chinese characters an invitation to worshippers to bring plenty of gold and agate stones.

After leaving the saloon, we ascended the second gallery, to inspect the sailors' joss-house, in which is the Deity of the Sea, with her two attendants, each with a red scarf. In front is an earthen pot, containing the sacred earth and rice, and here, also, is a lighted lamp. Near the principal Goddess is a piece of the wood of the Keying, highly venerated by the crew, and placed there as symbolical of all the vessel being protected by the Deity.

There are several paintings about here, and elsewhere in the ship, which we have not room to catalogue: one of man's first disobedience, with Eve, a fine woman ending in a serpent's tail, is striking. The objects, too, are various! among them is even a coffin!

On the deck is a Chinese car, and a gingall, which we have engraved. The gingall is a gun: the chambers are moveable; in time of action, spare ones are in readiness, to supply the place of that which has been discharged.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, and the ANCHOR.

Princess Royal, and the Prince of Prussia visited the Junk on Tuesday afternoon. The Royal party were received by the authorities of the East India Dock Company. The dockyard and neighbourhood were crowded with spectators; the ships in the basin and on the river were gaily dressed with colours, and the reception of the Queen was very enthusiastic. As her Majesty placed her foot upon the deck of the Junk, the Royal standard of England was run up to the summit of the mainmast by the Chinese sailors. On board the vessel the Queen was received by Captain Kellett and Mr. Revett; and Lord Alfred Paget, having introduced the Captain to the Queen, her Majesty requested him to precede her through the ship, and explain its peculiarities of construction. Her Majesty first inspected the saloon, where Mrs. Kellett, the wife of the gallant commander of the ship, had the honour of being presented to the Queen. The Royal party, after leaving the saloon, proceeded on to the poop of the ship, and, from this elevated point, the Queen being visible to the thousands of spectators on the shipping and dock walls, her Majesty was greeted with tumultuous cheering. The Royal party devoted more than an hour to the inspection of the vessel, and her Majesty, before leaving, expressed to Captain Kellett the gratification she had derived from her visit. The Royal party then left the dockyard amidst the deafening cheers of the assembled multitude.

On Wednesday, the Junk was visited by her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who passed upwards of an hour inspecting this curious craft and its contents.

Altogether, the Junk seems to be one of the most popular exhibitions of our metropolis for some time to come; it is, certainly, one of the most rational objects of curiosity which has ever been brought to our shores.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ANTICIPATIONS OF EPSOM.

Why should we Anticipate our sorrows? 'Tis like those
That die for fear of death. DENHAM.

On Tuesday next will commence, on Epsom Downs, a meeting such as the Surrey hills have never yet given place to. Hasty, the programme—with its "hymn'd by loftier harps than" ours: all the talents will combine to embody the shadows it casts before—but our business is with the lights of the picture. The Derby Day is, past peradventure, the most intensely English of any in our calendar. Why is it not all gala? Why should it be sickled o'er with misgivings, or clouded with solecisms? Go forth as to a banquet whereof Nature is the liberal host. Feast on; the season invites to enjoyment—care will follow soon enough—make it not a companion by the way. Emancipate your spirit from the toil and trouble of life, and make the fair downs of Banstead the scene of that goodly hour of liberty. We bid you to a great national holiday—don't begrudge the lucre-seekers even the fruit of their (forlorn) hopes.

For the first time there will be steam conveyance from London to Epsom and, consequently, from all parts of the kingdom. For the first time people will be carried to see the Derby at the pace it will be run for. These will be novelties in the annals of this tryal. The multitudes will include women to their anniversaries, moreover, will be increased by as much as money exceeds all other agents of attraction. The Derby is now a speculation in which the whole human race is engaged more or less. John Bull makes a £20,000 book; Sawney takes a chance in a bawbee sweepstake: difference is merely a question of capital the interest is the same. The denizen of "the sweet south," the Gael "harled in the kraik," the "plain Cork," and Taffy from his toasted cheese—all, all rush into Surrey, full of desperate anxieties for the "field." And what solace awaits them?

The Sage—the great strides—taken to turn the popular taste towards the turf as a business speculation rather than a recreation, have considerably changed the character of our race-courses. Whether the suppression of those channels through which excitement was wont to pour itself—the tents of the hazard purveyors, the rowley-powley tables, and also the peripatetic prick-i'-the-cloopts—and anything to do with it, this is not the time to investigate. # FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

CONGREGATION AT WANLOCKHEAD, COUNTY OF DUMFRIES.

THE FREE CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.

On Wednesday several petitions were presented to the House of Commons, in favour of the Places of Worship Sites (Scotland) Bill. Mr. Bouverie then moved the second reading of the bill "to enable religious congregations in Scotland to obtain sites for places of worship." The grievance was fully investigated last year before a Select Committee of the House, who reported that they "had found that there were a number of Christian congregations in Scotland, which had no place of worship within a reasonable distance of their homes, where they could unite in the public service of Almighty God, according to their conscientious convictions of religious duty, under convenient shelter from the severity of a northern climate." And again, "it has been proved to your Committee that the members of these congregations are in the habit of meeting for public worship in places, and under circumstances, which are unfit for the administration of the sacred ordinances of the Christian religi expose both the ministers and the people to weather injurious to their hea and to inconveniences which ought not to attend the free exce cise of religious privileges." Mr. Bouverie then then referred to cases in the Isle of Skye, the north-east coast of Scotland, the Isle of Mull, and at Wanlockhead, where congregations have been compelled to assemble in the open air amidst rain and snow. The number of congregations who could not obtain sites is supposed by the Committee to exceed 29. They consist of persons who left the Church of Scotland five years ago, with that body which has since settled down into a great Presbyterian church, embracing between one-third and one-fourth of the whole population of Scotland. The present measure is sought in consequence of the refusal by certain proprietors to allow these congregations to have sites on which to build places of worship. Mr. Kwart seconded the motion, which was carried by a majority of 59; and, after a debate, the bill was ordered to be committed on the 7th of June.

A very interesting abstract of the evidence adduced before the Select Committee has been printed for general circulation. Its heads are: 1. Facts as to the various Refusals. 2. Character of the people to whom the sites are refused. 3. Their hardships and sufferings. 4. Individual persecutions and intimidation. 5. Reasons for the refusal of sites, and answers. 6. Letters of Dr. Chalmers to the Duke of Buccleuch.

In aid of the great cause there has also been published a set of "Illustrations of the Principles of Toleration in Scotland." These consist of engravings of some of the places in Scotland in which congregations have assembled, in consequence of the refusal of proprietors to sell or grant, on any terms, ground for sites for their churches. We have selected two of these instances which were also among those referred to by Mr. Bouverie on Wednesday. They are published by Kennedy, Edinburgh; and Hamilton, Adams, and Co., London.

CONGREGATION AT DUTHIL, INVERNESS AND MORAYSHIRES.

WANLOCKHEAD, COUNTY OF DUMFRIES.

This village is situated in the parish of Sanquhar, the higher district of the county of Dumfries, 1600 feet above the level of the sea. It contains about 600 inhabitants, who are chiefly employed in the adjoining lead mines. The Duke of Buccleuch is sole proprietor of the village, and of the immediately surrounding country. The villagers are in his employment. The parish church is in the town of Sanquhar, about eight miles' distance from Wanlockhead; but, for the accommodation of the inhabitants, a chapel in connexion with the Established Church was built there many years ago.

About three-fourths of the population of Wanlockhead left the establishment at the disruption, and although several applications have been made to the Duke of Buccleuch for a site, none has yet been granted. The congregation have accordingly been compelled to worship in the open air. The number of Communicants is 274, and of these 50 belong to the neighbouring village of Leadhills, which is the property of the Earl of Hopetoun, where sites are also refused.

In the Sketch, the congregation are represented on their way towards the place where, for the last three years, they have usually assembled for public worship. It is in a ravine about 500 yards distant from the village, where the minister preaches from a pulpit, which partly shelters him.

DUTHIL, IN THE DISTRICT OF STRATHSPEY—IN INVERNESS AND MORAYSHIRES.

Lord Seafield, the Sole Proprietor of this Parish, has refused repeated applications that have been made to him for a Site for the Free Church Congregation. The People have adhered most steadfastly to their principles, amid all the privations and sufferings to which they have, in consequence of these refusals, been subjected. Even in the depth of Winter, they have regularly assembled for Public Worship on the Sabbath for the last three years in the open air, and often in very severe weather.

The Sketch represents the assembled Congregation, at their Place of Meeting in a hollow, which is thinly studded with Scots Fir Trees, and which form their only shelter from the frequent storms. There are about a thousand Adherents of the Free Church in the Parish.

STATE OF THE POOR IN LEEDS. It appears from a statement which has been recently published, that, notwithstanding the advancing season of the year, and the improvement that has recently manifested itself in the woollen trade, and the assistance afforded by the public soup-kitchen to the unemployed operatives of Leeds, there has been for some time past an extraordinary, though progressive increase in the number of applicants for relief. The number of persons of all classes relieved last week is more by 50 per cent. than the number relieved during the first week of November last; the number relieved in the week ending Nov. 5, 1847, having been 9635; and the number relieved in the week ending May 6th, 1848, being 5495. The cost of the out relief in the first of those weeks was £410 14s. 7d., and at the second period it had increased to £557 18s. 8d. From the beginning of November, 1847, to the middle of February, there was a progressive increase in the number of persons relieved; the number being, on the 12th February, 1848, 7732. From that date there was a gradual decrease till March 11, about a fortnight after the French Revolution was accomplished, when the number again began to increase from 7222 to its present amount. In the class of able-bodied labourers there is a very striking increase during the last six months. In the first week of November, 1847, the number of persons above 16 years of age relieved was—males, 383; females, 1085: total, 1468; and in the first week of May, 1848, the number had increased to—males, 1001; females, 1747: total 2748; or nearly double the number. This increase in the number and cost of persons relieved is the more striking when put in comparison with the state of things during the last two or three years. In the first week of November, 1845, only 1924 cases or families (not persons, as above stated) were relieved, at a cost of £222 4s. 8d.; in the same week of November, 1846, the relief to 1787 cases was £319 2s. 9d.; and in the same week of November, 1847, as stated, £410 14s. 7d. was disbursed in 2252 cases. Again, in the first week of May, 1845, 1215 cases received with £229 12s. 2d.; in the same week of May, 1846, 1855 cases cost £289 4s.; in the same week of May, 1847, 2644 cases £489 3s: and in the first week of this instant May, 1848, 3215 cases were relieved with £557 18s. 8d., thus showing a gradual increase during each of the last three years.

IRISH AGITATION AND IRISH MISERY,

As usual, the affairs of Ireland continue to trouble and perplex the people of this country. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Meagher have slipped through the meshes of the law. Jurors are obstinate. One repealer in a jury of twelve has only to refuse a verdict in spite of the evidence, and conviction for political offences becomes impossible. Mr. Mitchell will, perhaps, be less fortunate than his compeers; but whatever may be his fate, there seems every likelihood that the agitation will be continued as before. New leaders will arise to take the place of those who are superseded by accident or by the law; and Ireland will offer the old and familiar spectacle of a miserable and a discontented country. England will be looked upon as her enemy; and social miseries, of which every person in this country deplores the existence, will be allowed to remain unremedied, as if they were the indigenous and necessary growth of the soil. So much has been said and written about Ireland—so many and so conflicting have been the statements put forth, that the people of this country begin to loathe the very name of Irish misery. They would relieve it if they knew how; but the task seems to be too great for their accomplishment or for their comprehension. They sometimes believe the Irish peasant to be unteachable. They always know him to be wretched. At one time they blame his Celtic blood, and at another they are inclined to blame his religion, for the evils which afflict him; while ever and anon, the idea comes uppermost, that the Irish question, vast and complicated as it is, may be summed up in the operation of the laws relating to the ownership and occupation of the soil; that, in fact, an agricultural country containing eight millions of people ought to be three or four times larger than Ireland, to give the people a fair chance of subsistence. The Irish peasant is skilled in no labour but in that of agriculture, and that in its rudest form. This position leads to the question, whether agriculture can sustain such a mass of population without the aid of manufactures? or failing manufactures, the cultivation of every inch of ground that is capable of it? The peasant does his best to live. He offers an enormous rental for a potato-patch, without calculating whether he can afford to pay it or not. Potatoes are all his diet. He has no other resource, unless grass or sea-weeds may be considered as aids to his dinners. He lives in a wigwam, and shares it with a pig. He speaks a barbarous language, and is in arrear with the intelligence of the world. The proprietors of the soil upon which he contrives to exist look upon him as an incumbrance, the more especially as he is but one out of millions similarly destitute and unmanageable. It is difficult to exaggerate the natural capabilities of the land upon which he and so many like him swarm. For grazing, or for corn growing, it is almost equally admirable. It has navigable rivers, excellent natural harbours, water-power sufficient to turn ten thousand mills, and to grind all the corn of Christendom; it has coal and iron, and other mineral wealth, every possible facility for becoming a great, a prosperous, and a happy country, except the facility of assured good laws, and a competent people. By some strange and perplexing fatality of mismanagement, its inhabitants have never been able or allowed to turn these advantages to any account, and have become at last the by-word of Europe, the standing reproach of British legislation, a foul ulcer, a perpetual source of disquietude and misery, setting all imaginable remedy at defiance. The masses of the people cannot be called civilized by any stretch of flattery or good nature. As regards mere physical well-being, the condition of the Esquimaux or Kaffirs is preferable to theirs. The weak Irish peasant may starve, but the strong Kaffir contrives to live. The Laplander can get rein-deer flesh or blubber to supply his need; but there is nothing but the potato, and not enough of that for the Celt in Ireland. All this misery seems to have fastened itself upon the peasant, in consequence of the laws relating to the occupation of the soil. In those instances in which he grows corn he may not eat it. Though he rear a pig, he never tastes animal food. Though he keep fowls, he may not eat an egg. Rent absorbs everything but the potato. All the other produce is exported to England to pay it. When the potato fails, the peasant has but to resign himself to starvation, to fever, and to death. When it is ordinarily abundant, a perilous fecundity among the people lays up a stock of embarrassment for future years.

Even amid the revolutions of empires, and the overthrow of the oldest monarchies of Europe, the world rings with the woes of the Irish. France, Germany, Russia, India, America, cry shame upon us, that we should, either wilfully or ignorantly, have driven a whole people to so wretched a state, and rendered their case too desperate to admit of a remedy within the lifetime of a generation. Stung with remorse and sympathy, we have expended upon them and their brother Celts of the Highlands the hard earnings of our people, and mortgaged our future credit for their support—earnings which we could not spare without damage to ourselves, and credit which was already too lavishly drawn upon before this generation came into the world. The impoverished and nearly insolvent landlords looked on bewildered at such misery, most of them unable, many unwilling to help. Yet in that destitute country four or five millions of cultivable acres of land lie waste, undrained, and useless, never having contributed a bushel of corn or a peck of potatoes to the sustenance of man in our present geological era.

It seems to us that one remedy at least is here. The owners of the waste have never exercised any rights or duties of proprietorship over it, and they have not the means to reclaim it. The Irish may talk as they will about "Repeal;" but as there are some millions of peasants who would willingly betake themselves to the task of drawing some food out of this waste land, if they could be secured some right in the soil to reward them for their exertion, would not this be a remedy better worth trying than any that have ever been proposed for their miseries? We learn that the potato has been extensively planted this year, and that this, the lowest and most easily raised of all food, bids fair to be tolerably abundant. If so, the old story will have again to be told—the crop will again fail—another famine will decimate the land; and we shall again have to go through the ordeal of the last two years. One portion of the people will die of starvation, as heretofore, and those who remain will talk rebellion, instead of cultivating the soil, and be goaded by new Mitchells, O'Briens, and Meaghers into political frenzy. We can, in fact, see no hope for Ireland until the people are raised into the condition of bread-eaters; and we can see no means of accomplishing this object except the cultivation of the bogs and other waste lands. It is, no doubt, a difficult task; and hard to say, if the people were allowed to squat upon these lands, whether they would not prefer the easy cultivation of the potato, to the more difficult cultivation of superior food, and so reproduce the old misery which they now suffer. But, difficult or the reverse, the attempt, at all events, must be made to transform these millions into wealth-producers by such means as are available. Emigration, even if a million of the people left her shores for America or Australia, would not benefit the millions that would remain; and the cost of such an emigration, were it other than spontaneous, would be so enormous as to forbid the attempt. If the establishment of "Organization of Labour" anywhere under the sun can benefit mankind, the waste lands of Ireland and the Irish people might be made mutually available for the attempt.

FRANCE.

The Parisians have indemnified themselves during the past week for the commotions and alarms of that preceding, by a grand fête of concord, which they celebrated on Sunday last. A description will be found in another column. The public generally, both in Paris and the departments, seem to be fully united and with the utmost energy of the views and objects of the assemblies, and with the nature of their providential escape on the previous Monday. The journals have thrown upon the interruption of some of the mob while in the Assembly, to the speech of M. Barbès when he decreed a "forced impost of 1,000,000,000f. (£40,000,000 sterling) on the rich!" "No, no, Barbès," cried several of his friends, "it is not that; we must strike you two hours of pillage!"

Those few words, each letter of as they do, Communism in all its naked hideousness, have irrecoverably damaged the cause of the Terrorists. There is no longer any doubt on the principles and the prefects of the Communists and Socialists, and hence the readiness of all who have might or law to defend it to the last. Previously the thing was so monstrous, that nobody out of their party would believe that designs so atrocious could be entertained by any number of men as those attributed to the Communists. This disbelief was strengthened by the recollection that M Barbès was an educated gentleman and a man of fortune: that M. Raspail was among the most distinguished chymists of the day: and M. Blanqui a man of ancient family, and of first-rate acquirements and talents. It is said, however, in respect of M. Barbès, that the fact of his having a gentleman and a man of fortune impressed him with the idea that, to be a gentleman and a man of fortune himself, it was necessary for him to go beyond the most extreme conceptions of his less elevated confederates. "The unrepaid Barbès," was the rumour, "cowered before the monster of his own creation."

M Barbès had made an attempt to escape from the Fort of Vincennes. He had, it was said, succeeded in bribing two of his guards, but was recognised by the third, and arrested. M. Barbès was brought back into the interior of the Fort, and Lecomte, without resistance, and, instead of being confined, as previously, in a room on the ground floor, he was removed to the top of the donjon.

Mr. Rush, the Minister of the United States, on Monday presented an address to the five Members of the Executive Government at the Petit-Luxembourg, founded on a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, passed on the 13th of April, "to express, in the name and behalf of the American people, the congratulations of Congress to the people of France upon the success of their efforts to consolidate the principles of liberty in a republican form of government."

M. Lamartine replied in a speech characterised by his usual eloquence.

The Committee of the National Assembly, chosen to examine the decree on the relations of the Assembly with the Executive Committee, having deliberated on the three first articles, the object of which was to authorise the members of the executive not to assist at the sittings of the Assembly, the Committee successively rejected them, together with the different amendments presented on those articles. The fourth, tending to confide the external protection of the Assembly to the executive power, was also unanimously rejected.

The committee, by which the Orleans Family Banishment Bill had been referred, had agreed to its adoption.

The volunteer National Guards from the departments were the objects of attention on the part of the Government in the National Assembly, and the public.

The Guard of Honour performing [illegible] the National Assembly on Monday last was composed of a detachment of 600 men of the 8th Legion of Orleans.

M. Tabouret, Deputy Attorney-General at Lyons, who was arrested and exposed to the most scandalous ill-treatment on the part of the insurgents of Lyons, had been at last liberated, through the interference of his friends. The Attorney-General, M Lerroy, immediately demanded that the perpetrators of that crime be prosecuted; and the Minister of Justice proposed on Monday, to the Executive Committee, the measures necessary for the repression of similar attempts. The Minister, anxious to recompense M. Tabouret for his noble behaviour during those trying circumstances, had appointed him Attorney-General at Besançon.

At the close of last week, and the commencement of the present, there were violent disturbances at Lyons, and for some time bands of the lowest ruffians held complete sway over the peaceable inhabitants. Order and tranquillity, however, have been in a great measure restored.

Paris, Wednesday.

Sunday's "fête de la Concorde," as it is called, was a grand affair—grand as roaring artillery, clanging trumpets, rattling drums, waving banners, uniforms of all shapes and hues, glittering bayonets, gleaming swords, gorgeous cars, fine statues, a glorious sun, and an immense gathering of both sexes, all ages, all classes—grand as all this could make it. And when night came we had magnificent illuminations which dimmed the soft light of the morn and the gay trivials of the stars, albeit they shone with almost as much brilliancy as the sun itself puts on, when at rare and brief intervals it consents to visit you when you keep cockneys; we had, moreover, fireworks, which whizzed and fizzed and sparkled and glittered right gloriously; and we saw too the dismal old Bastile in murky pyrotechnic show, captured over again, and again destroyed. All perhaps in the day's display was gorgeous. But it had its drawbacks. First of all there was a most awful want of that concord which the fete was meant to celebrate and personify. By that I mean to say that the people fought, and indulged in open manifestations of ill-feeling; but the distrust and even hatred, which now unfortunately separates the bourgeois (or middle) from the working class, were clearly stamped on every body, and it was but too plain to be hidden even by the fête. There was an almost total absence of that light laughing gaiety which generally gives such an indescribable charm to French rejoicings, and which makes the least of the rarest carnivals endure on earth thrill with pleasure. Then there was the universal feeling that the fete was ill-timed, coming so soon after the attempted Revolution of the 15th, at a moment when many of the people's leaders, and of those who think their friends, were lying in prison. In a word, there was something hollow and unreal about it, which struck the most superficial observer. And last, but not least, the female part of the grand procession caused most extraordinary disappointment. The programme promised us a bevy of five hundred young girls the handsomest of Paris—dressed in spotless white, with crowns of oak leaves; but the reality gave us nothing but five hundred of the most ordinary, most vulgar—in fact, most downright ugly phizzes that eye ever saw. That a specimen of your beauty, Parisians! heaven help you! You should have sent to England for a supply of pretty faces. There they are in plenty. But you could not, if you had tried, have found five hundred so awfully ugly as those you showed us on Sunday.

In revolutionary times we see strange things; but the strangest of all would have been to have seen the Provisional Government proposed by the insurrectionists of the 15th, in which M. Prudhon, a Communist leader, who declares in almost every line that he writes, that he does not believe in the existence of God, was gravely appointed Minister of—start not—Public Worship!

Almost everybody, of every class, trade, profession, and occupation, has suffered more or less by the late revolution. The lowest, of course, have suffered most; but even those who have suffered less than others, for they have been completely ruined. At these offices, as you may have heard, registers were kept of ladies in want of husbands, and husbands in want of wives; and the office-keepers undertook to introduce the parties to each other for a consideration, with the proviso that, in the event of the introduction leading to a wedding, a further payment should be made. Incredible as it may seem to those of an English way of thinking, it is a fact that an immense number of marriages were effected by these offices every year; and six or seven of them cleared, it is said, several thousands per annum.

Notwithstanding the Revolution has prevented the usual Spring Races at Paris and Chantilly, the Jockey Club has contrived to give us two days' very good racing at Versailles, and to give us two more on Sunday, the 28th, when the Derby was run for, and was carried off by an unknown horse, called Gambiri. The Derby is not part of the world is not to be compared with that in England, but still is not to be altogether disdained. It brought in about £1000 to the owner of the winning horse, without counting bets. There were a great many people present, and among them all the leading men of the French turf. By the way, I may remark that the assessment of the horses of the London and Paris papers, of the Prince de Beauvau, M. Lupin, M. d'Hedonville, and other of the principal turfmen having broken up their stud, immediately after the Revolution, was a gross falsehood. Their racing establishments are still kept up on the same scale, and with as much spirit as ever. Even the Duke de Nemours has not got rid of his stud, and many of his horses are entered for the present races.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

On Monday the Chamber was occupied with the consideration of various propositions of private members of little public interest, and which were either partially or in whole rejected.

A proposition for modifying the application of the 45 per cent. addition to the regular taxation, on account of the expenses of the war, was combated by the Minister of Finances, who, admitting the severity of the tax, yet justified it on the ground of necessity, and declared that the Government could not afford to part with the resources arising from the exceptional impost. He admitted that 45,000,000f. had already accrued to the treasury from this new tax.

M. Lempereur proposed as an amendment that the Communes which paid in 1848 should have the sums so given returned in 1849.

M. Lefranc brought forward a sub-amendment, with a view to conciliate the two opposing opinions; it was, that the amendment be referred to the Committee on the Budget of 1849.

The Assembly rejected the amendment and sub-amendment, and at last the original proposition.

A million was voted, d'urgence, to the Minister of Public Works, to defray expenses incurred in the national workshops, the hon. minister having declared that such a sum was required by the Government that very day.

TUESDAY. This day extraordinary measures had been adopted for the protection of the Assembly. Early in the morning General Cavaignac, Minister of War, accompanied by General Bedeau, visited the barracks of the capital, and presided in person at the execution of the orders he had given for the security of the Assembly. No less than 15,000 men were stationed in the immediate neighbourhood of the Palace, but none were visible except two battalions of the National Guards drawn up on the steps. Nothing occurred apparent to justify the adoption of those measures. Many rumours, however, were in circulation. It was said that the seditious intended to make a demonstration with a view to obtain the liberation of Barbès and his fellow prisoners. Others said that the operatives of the national workhouses would present themselves at the Legislative Palace in the afternoon to demand that their wages be increased to five francs per day. General Cavaignac and the other Government officers, members of the Assembly, were present at the sitting, dressed in their uniform.

At one o'clock M. Buchez, the President, took the chair.

The principal feature of the day's proceedings was the discussion respecting Italy and Poland, and M. Lamartine's speech on those subjects.

M. Lamartine said that the question before the house had already engaged the attention of the Provisional Government. He thought the present debate somewhat inopportune. The French Republic, he said, had not to deplore a single day of egotism since its commencement. No sooner had the Government been established than it resolved to aid the nations that should purchase their independence at the price of their own blood. Should Italy, however, be too weak to assert her sovereignty against Austria, she would, one day, cross the Alps. M. Lamartine then justified the non-interference of France in Italy, and read several dispatches from Milan, Venice, &c., to prove that not only were the interests of France been demanded by the Italian Governments, but that it would have been actually resisted by them. Italy, he believed, did not need foreign aid, but should it utter a cry of distress, should circumstances render it necessary or legitimate, the interference of France was certain, and in no case should Italy fall again under the yoke she had so gloriously shaken off. M. Lamartine referring next to the Polish question, said that the Provisional Government had considered it to be the greatest delicacy for a policy of France and Europe, and that, until it was solved, France could never be at peace, nor establish friendly relations with the Northern Powers. It was not exactly warlike declarations to the three Powers, informing them that the first condition of the duration of peace between them and France would be the reconstruction of an independent Poland. He then explained the cause of the failure of the Polish expedition, which he ascribed to the eternal dissensions which had separated the different races of the Polish population, and proved at all times the scourge of Poland. The King of Prussia was not to blame for what had occurred, nor had he marched an army into Posen to put down the insurrection, or to withdraw the promises he had made. It was merely to interpose between the German and Polish races, which were exterminating each other, and to separate the combatants. The Germans in Posen were about 300,000 in number, and the Poles 800,000. Prussia would not permit the whole of the Polish emigrants to enter the Duchy of Posen, but the natives of that duchy were freely admitted, and M. d'Arnim had justly observed that if they extended that privilege to all, Prussia would be involved in a war with Russia, and old Poland would be the first victim. M. Lamartine could give no explanation respecting the defeat of the Poles in Cracow and Gallicia; but the intelligence daily received from Vienna convinced him that Poland would, ere long, be able to establish herself there on a broader basis than on the side of Russia. The only means which could have any chance of success were friendly remonstrances in favour of Poland. As Ministers, he said, we are far from throwing obstacles in the way of the manifestations to be demanded in favour of Poland; the Chamber has the right to proclaim its sovereignty, its sympathy, but that proclamation must not be useful to Poland alone, it must be also to France herself, and it is for that reason that we support whatever is likely to attain that twofold object. I have deplored more than any one the scenes of violence and disorder which took place in this Assembly on Monday last, and I regret that the glorious name of Poland should have been made the pretext for sedition. (Approbation) These spontaneous demonstrations in favour of Poland are not, and never will be, a source of embarrassment for us—we cordially accept them, and never will repulse the warm appeals to justice and to reason. No, citizens, it is the force of our diplomacy, as it is the honour, the eternal honour, of the people of France in the midst of the grave risks, forgetting its own interests, to demand

Peschiera had begun on the 16th. The weather had been very unfavourable and some of the newly-erected works had been injured by the heavy rains; but the anxiety to begin was so great, that as soon as one heavy battery was in order, at a late hour on the afternoon of the 18th, its fire was opened on the obstinate little fortress. The Austrians replied in a determined manner, and showered shot and shell in great abundance. The troops suffered severely, howsoever as they all are without tents on the wet ground, and exposed day and night to the incessant rain.

Treviso still held out against the Austrians on the 16th. This city is naturally strong, and situate at the confluence of two rivers, which fall into the Piave. It is surrounded by old ramparts, and defended by a citadel of no inconsiderable strength. These fortifications have been repaired, and other means of defence and precaution adopted by the inhabitants, who are seconded by 8000 Roman volunteers, commanded by M. Ferrari. M. Guidotti, the other commander, has been slain. The Commander-in-Chief of Treviso is the Duke di Montefeltro.

General Durando has retreated to Mogliano, situate half-way between Venice and Treviso.

NAPLES. An unsuccessful insurrection took place at Naples on the 17th inst., in which 400 of the troops were killed. Subsequently the city was given up to pillage by the Government during several hours. The magnificent villas and palaces which extended to the sea-shore are, it is said, at present, but a heap of ashes. On the conclusion of the battle, which was fought in the streets, a new Ministry had been formed under the presidency of Prince Cariati, and the National Guard was disbanded. The French squadron had received on board several inhabitants of the city and some Frenchmen who had been arrested and released

GERMAN STATES

OPENING OF THE GERMAN PARLIAMENT AT FRANKFORT.—The German Parliament opened on the 18th. There were about 320 members present, not quite half the number of which the Parliament is to consist. The authorities of Frankfort had adopted every necessary measure for the preservation of public order. After having met at the Senate House, the members proceeded between the lines of the National Guards, who were drawn up on both sides, to the Church of St. Paul, the temporary Parliament House; but, long before that period, the doors of St. Paul's Church were surrounded by an immense multitude of persons, most of them respectably dressed; and, at a quarter past three, that portion of the public to whom tickets had not been distributed were permitted to take their places in the gallery which runs round the centre of the building

St. Paul's Church is an edifice which forms in its interior a perfect circle, and the centre of the lower part is intersected into circles of seats, all ascending. That what may be termed the centre, which was once a pulpit, but has now been converted into a throne for the President, with a tribune in front for the orator, and filled by seats for the official shorthand writers. Outside of this great circle are pillars which support the gallery; and in the spaces between the pillars seats have been reserved for foreign ambassadors, for the ladies, for the reporters of the press, foreign as well as domestic, and also for distinguished strangers, to whom the compliment was paid of giving them admission to some better place than that to be found in the gallery.

The first act to which the Parliament proceeded was to elect the oldest member to act provisionally as President, as in the French Chamber. The youngest men were taken as Secretaries. M. Lange (Councillor of the Treasury at Hanover) took the chair; and, after opening the session by a few appropriate remarks, he read a congratulatory letter, or rather an address, from the German Diet to the Parliament. A debate arose respecting the form of answer to be returned. After some discussion, the debate was adjourned

No sitting of any interest was expected to take place till after the lapse of six or six days The Assembly would not elect a President till the greater part of the members were present.

The Assembly resolved, on the 21st, that the short-hand reports of each day's proceedings shall be printed and published next day in extenso. The committee charged with the matter declares—"1st. That the Assembly does not make itself responsible for the correctness of those reports. 2nd. That they are to be sold at the lowest possible price that will cover the cost of paper and printing. 3rd. That application has been made to all the post administrations throughout Germany to allow them to be delivered free of postage."

PRUSSIA.

The new National Assembly opened its session on Monday, the 22nd instant The current rumours respecting the return of the Prince of Prussia, which had been carried on rather fiercely of late, is moderating; the victory remains with the Prince's supporters; the Ultras have recently become weaker and weaker by every demonstration they have attempted.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna has again become the theatre of proceedings of a revolutionary nature, which have led to the retirement of the Emperor and the Imperial family from the Capital. The commotion and alarm which had been growing up of late reached their climax on the night of the 15th inst. The excitement and satisfaction caused by the provisional law for the elections was still further increased by an event which occurred on the 13th for the due execution of which the chief of the National Guard, consisting of about 200 individuals, organized for political objects, and which, backed as it was by such a large army of physical force, threatened to overawe the constituted authorities. These unpopular measures on the part of the Government led to stormy debates in the aula of the University; and the students, who had previously sent in a petition against the proposed Constitution, but on the basis of universal suffrage. The procession of which they proposed to back by an array of physical force. They assembled at the University at an early hour on the 15th, and determined to make the three following demands:—

1. That the military, who during the preceding night had bivouacked in large numbers on the Glacis, should be withdrawn

2. That the National Guard was one of the people and should not be dissolved.

3. That the law for the elections should be declared null and void

The lower class of labourers met in the Brigitten-Au to the number of 10,000, and expressed an intention of marching into the town; this was interdicted by the authorities

An imposing military force was stationed on the Glacis, and the whole of the National Guard (the Academic Legion alone excepted) was called out. The gates of the Burg were closed, and neither ingress or egress permitted.

The old Burger Guard fraternised with the students, who marched out without orders. Several deputations were admitted to the Burg, and the Emperor made many answers, which were not considered satisfactory, the demands of the students and the populace were ultimately conceded.

The Minister next day resigned office; a step which, it is said, would have been taken by Pillersdorf before conceding the demands of the people; but the representations made to him of the danger in which the Monarchy was placed, and the probability of a sanguinary contest, induced him to postpone his resignation

The Ministry had consented to retain their portfolios ad interim till a new Ministry was appointed.

Such was the state of things up to the 17th.

On the evening of that day, at about six o'clock, an open landau, containing the Emperor and Empress, drove out of Vienna by the Maria Hilf Gate, the Emperor acknowledging the salutations of the people, who supposed he was driving to Schönbrunn. One hour afterwards an empty travelling carriage, with the imperial arms, took the same route, and at nine o'clock four other imperial carriages, each drawn by six horses, passed through the gate. It then became evident that the Imperial family had left Vienna. This event was made known to the astonished population on the following morning, by a proclamation published on the walls by the Pillersdorf Ministry, which remained in office at the earnest solicitations of the Emperor and of the University. The proclamation stated that the Ministry had only received a verbal announcement of this departure, which was kept a secret at the Palace, and that the Emperor had gone to Innspruck for a change of air. It also announced that Prince Windischgrätz, Commander-in-Chief of the National Guard, and Wilczek, had posted after the Emperor, to persuade him to return

The rush on the National Bank was so great to get cash for notes, that it was found necessary to shut the gates. Small numbers were admitted at a time, and their notes changed

The news that the Emperor had quitted the city produced the greatest excitement. The inhabitants, it is understood, are unanimous for the Emperor and the maintenance of the constitutional monarchy. Several ill-advised young men took advantage of the confusion which ensued to proclaim the Republic, but the people were excessively exasperated, fell upon them, and would have hanged them if the National Guard had not interfered most energetically, and rescued them. All were acting in concert for the speedy restoration of order, and a deputation had been sent to the Emperor, expressing the universal desire that he would come back immediately.

It is a strange coincidence, that at the very time of the Emperor's departure, the official organ of the Court, the Wiener Zeitung, was concocting, and afterwards published, a leading article on the utter impossibility of such an occurrence

HOLLAND.

The Members of the Second Chamber of the States-General have quitted the Hague for a vacation of three or four weeks. Meanwhile the composition of the project of law for the revision of the Fundamental Pact is necessarily delayed. It is stated that no new measure is already framed, and under the consideration of the Council of State

The following Ministry has been appointed ad interim:—President of the Council (Vacant); Minister of Justice, Mr. Dirk Donker Curtius; Minister of Foreign Affairs, M le Baron Bentinck, Envoy at Brussels; Minister of the Interior, Mr. J. M. de Kempenaer, Member of the Second Chamber; Minister of War, Major-General J. H. Vos; Minister of Finance, Mr. Oosewaarde; Minister of Public Worship, Mr. L. C Luzac, Member of the Second Chamber; Minister of the Colonies and Marine, M. Ryk, a Member of the ex-Government, Minister of Catholic Worship (vacant)

This Ministry is neither homogeneous, liberal, nor conservative, but a confused medley of all shades of opinion MM Donker Curtius, Kempenaer, and Luzac are well known to be men of Liberal politics; and Ryk belongs to the ultra-Conservative or rather aristocratical school, whilst the views of MM. Vos, Oosewaarde, and Bentinck are unknown.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN.

The state of inactivity in which the hostile armies have been for some time past, still continues, owing, it is generally believed, to the progress of Diplomatic Negotiations to bring about a settlement of the quarrel without further bloodshed.

HUNGARY

Advices of the 11th instant from Pesth mention that the Comitia Assembly in that city had sent a deputation to the Archduke Viceroy, with the following categorical demands:—1. The Commanding General shall lose his place. 2. He shall be tried by a criminal court. 3. Certain officers shall be arrested. The military shall take their oath on the Hungarian Constitution. 5. Publicity of trials. The deputation added, if these demands were wholly or in part refused, the country would be declared in a state of revolution, and dismissed from Austria. These demands were complied with by the Archduke Viceroy. The return of the Hungarian troops, and their withdrawal from all "foreign provinces," was immediately added for the Minister's decision. Vienna on the 16th had escaped the people by a sudden and treacherous attack, but succeeded in escaping to Vienna. A deputation from Pesth has left for that city, to claim his person and bring him back to Pesth.

GREECE

Letters from Athens of the 30th ult mention that serious insurrections had broken out in various provinces of Greece At Lamia a Provisional Government had been proclaimed by the Veleuse.

ITALY

Accounts from Constantinople to the [illegible] that the cholera is at present carrying off from 12 to 23 victims daily.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

Advices to the 29th of March have been received. The intelligence from the frontier is highly satisfactory. All was tranquil; the various Kaffir tribes who had submitted to British authority continued their allegiance, and not the slightest apprehensions were entertained of any further rupture. Sir Harry Smith has sheathed his sword, and is now civil—long the arts of civilisation and peace, by encouraging the erection of churches, establishing schools, diffusing education, and promoting agricultural and other pursuits—the great means, under Providence, of placing this colony upon a sound and prosperous basis.

EGYPT

Advices to the 11th instant have been received from Alexandria. Mehemet Ali continues in a very weak state of health; his mind is quite prostrate, and the slightest exertion can take it from a certain to a fearful extent. Ibrahim, now virtually Viceroy of Egypt, is daily expected at Alexandria, his Highness having made a tour throughout the principal towns in the Delta, where he has been engaged in introducing improvements in the cultivation of the land, and in minutely examining the accounts of the Government agents. Ibrahim seems intent upon introducing the strictest economy into all the departments of Government. The works at the Pyramids of Nile and Rosetta are suspended. The construction of the locomotive, intended to cross the Suez desert in five hours, has been stopped, his Highness having no confidence in its success; and many Europeans have been dismissed from the service. Quarantine for the Port of Alexandria is being vigorously proceeded with, and the whole of the new fortifications will shortly be in an effective state. An increase to the army is also being made. The town of Damietta is being fortified, and Count Gallic Bey, French General of Engineers, is there superintending the works.

UNITED STATES.

By advices received this week, we learn that the conventions to be held by the great political parties, preliminary to the election of a president, were the great topics before the American public. The democratic convention was to be held at Baltimore, the whig at Philadelphia.

Mr. Polk had proposed to occupy Yucatan, to prevent England or any European power taking it. Mr. Calhoun mocked his precaution and sagacity, and asked had the president already discovered another Mexico to conquer?

Among the many important matters for the action of the present congress will be the organisation of the three proposed new territories of Minisota, Nebraska, and Oregon, as reported by the chairman of the committee on territories of the senate

From Washington, under date May 9, we learn that on May 4 a bill was introduced in the senate, from the committee on foreign relations, authorising the President to despatch a military and naval force, with arms and ammunition, to Yucatan, to assist the white race in defending themselves against the Indians, who are waging a war of extermination upon them by fire and sword.

On the 9th, M C B Smith, of Indiana, moved that the house resolve itself into a committee on the state of the Union, which was agreed to; when the house took up the bill for establishing the territorial government of Oregon, which Mr. Bowlin moved the reference of the bill to the appropriate committee. Lost. The debate upon the merits of the bill was continued till the committee rose, reported progress, and, on motion, adjourned over till the following day

The President has received advices from Mexico which have not been made public, but which are understood to represent the ratification of the treaty as highly improbable

The Hudson Bay Company have encroached on the United States territory by erecting some thirty miles within the borders of Iowa, the inhabitants of which are demanding the dispossession of the intruders.

The Executive of Virginia has demanded the persons charged with the abduction of the 77 slaves from Washington city, on the ground that a number of negroes had been decoyed to persons in Virginia.

The Norman city hall of New York got up on the 8th instant a magnificent funeral pageant, in honour of the patriots killed during the recent revolutions in Europe.

On the 9th inst., a most extensive fire took place at Detroit, Michigan. Forty buildings had been consumed when the accounts left. The Steamboat and American Hotels were both in flames, and the [illegible] were either entirely consumed. It is stated that [illegible] was consumed with destruction.

MEXICO

The accounts from Mexico represent the Mexican Congress as seeking to gain time, and to delay the ratification of the treaty. One paper says, that Peña y Peña has proposed to occupy Yucatan.

We learn from Yucatan that Governor Mendez has resigned in favour of his political rival, Senor Barbachano, which measure has produced increased discontent among the Indians of that province were still dreadful, and the war continued with fearful ferocity, the whole white population, man, woman, and child. The authorities had applied to the British, American, and Spanish authorities at Cuba for aid, but they either could not or was military force, and the force could not be promptly given, it is much to be feared that by this time the Indian population will have regained all that the Spaniards had taken from them three centuries ago.

WEST INDIES

In Jamaica the inhabitants continue to entertain the most depressing apprehensions. De Cordova's mercantile circular of the 21st of April remarks:—

"We have nothing new to report of the condition of our markets since the date of our last issue. The same inactivity and caution, the same want of confidence and firmness to maintain, still exists, whether considered the business of the community, continue now to operate against it, to all appearances to a more alarming extent."

The Jamaica papers and papers devoted to news are filled with accounts [illegible]

The progress from Cuba is alarming. The white population of the island, excepting a rising of the blacks, had stationed troops in the most disturbed districts, and had arrested some of the ringleaders. The crops were suffering from a lengthened drought, and several canes had died in consequence.

BRAZIL

Advices have been received this week from Brazil and the River Plate. From the former we learn that the Ministry, which was announced by the last packet to be in course of formation, had not been completed. The announcement of the revolution in France created little sensation. Lord Hervey Bruce was about to return to England in the Firebrand steamer, his mission for the settlement of differences in the River Plate having been superseded

The slave trade was still carried on on the coast; [illegible] slaves were landed in the neighbourhood of Bahia, in 3 vessels, during the month of only two months; and 7000 slaves in the vicinities of Campos, Rio Grande, and Rio Janeiro. Several steamers are employed.

Matters in the River Plate are represented as unchanged.

INDIA.

Advices in anticipation of the Overland Mail have been received during the week. The two ships have been directed to proceed from the hill country during the sickly season. His Highness the Rajah of Sattara died on the 5th inst., in the forty-sixth year of his age; he had occupied the throne since the deposition of his brother in 1839, and died wisely and well. He leaves no heirs behind him, and the country lapses to the British Government; its net revenues amount to £ 50,000 a year It will for the present, it is understood, be placed under a commission

The news by this arrival is principally commercial. Judgment has been given in the Supreme Court at Calcutta, in favour of the validity of post-bills issued to the extent of above a million sterling, by the Union Bank Though not only not recognised by the charter, but in contravention of its provisions, the existence of post-bills was known to the shareholders—the issue was sanctioned in by their accepting a share of the profits realised on them, and their validity was believed in by those who accepted of them, and therefore, in equity, they are held valid The soundness of the views of the Court seems generally acquiesced in, though at variance with the opinions previously given by counsel. This will maintain or extend the responsibilities of the shareholders in proportion as the post-bills circulated for the last few months. The prospects of the Bank seem to darken on every side; the shareholders hold back in stoical apathy, while the creditors are beginning to push their claims with relentless determination The debtors of the bank, and those who have literally made away with a couple of millions of its funds, are treated with a gentleness and forbearance which contrast singularly with the warmth with which the unhappy Parsee partners, Jejeebhoy and Cowasjee, chiefly interested, have been pursued by the Commercial Bank of Bombay, the last on early payment of the £40,000 of it funds appropriated to their own uses by the Union Bank when sent to them for the purchase of bills on England The members of the Calcutta bar have unanimously refused to hold briefs along with Sir Thomas Turton, one of those most deeply implicated in the bank transactions Sir Thomas was, it may be remembered, secretary to Lord Auckland in Canada in 1838. He was a barrister of much repute and business, but shortly after his return to India he became Ecclesiastical Member of Council, with a salary of £5000 a year Which is [illegible] largely with the funds committed to his charge—[illegible] some £50,000 On these coming to light he resigned his appointment, with a view of resuming practice at the bar, when his brethren refused to accept of briefs along with him. Mr Grant, son of the late Chief Justice Sir John Peter Grant, seems to be in not much better favour, and for kindred reasons

The firm of Carr, Tagore, and Co., of Calcutta, have become insolvent The liabilities of the house amount to £234,520, and the assets to £2 9,230. Inability to meet present demands upon them has been the cause of the firm succumbing business.

THE FETE DE LA CONCORDE. AT PARIS.

On Sunday, this long-promised but twice deferred Festival, took place at Paris. By the activity of our Artists, who witnessed the ceremony [illegible] station, we are enabled this day to illustrate the most striking epic les of the great national event. An excellent description of which will be found in the following details of the [illegible], selected and abridged from that of Monday afternoon's edition of Galignani's Messenger:

PREPARATIONS.

Before five o'clock in the morning, the [illegible] began to beat in all the different quarters of Paris, and continued to send forth its quick sharp sound every quarter of an hour till six. It then ceased. The National Guards beginning to make their [illegible] see, and detached piquets of dragoons and carabineers having already taken up their stations at various points along the boulevards, the Place de la Madeleine, the Place de la Concorde, and in front of the Palace of the National Assembly.

In the Place de la Concorde, as soon as it was a considerable crowd had already assembled, and chiefly of well-dressed persons. The [illegible] stands, benches, and every thing that could give a vantage-ground to the [illegible] to view the ceremony better, were disposed about in great profusion. Still, all that was to be witnessed from this point was the passage of the National Guards and other troops; the great spectacle of the day being in the Champ de Mars. The weather was a delightful serenity a cloud chequered sky with bright blue sky: the sun shone brightly on the fire arms and brass accoutrements of the soldiers placed on the steps, and beneath the wide facade of the Palace of the Assembly; and the tri-coloured flag waved lastly upon the apex of the pediment.

Although seven o'clock was appointed as the hour for the Representatives of the People to leave the Chamber for the Champ de Mars, they did not start until a full hour after that time. In the interim, one had time to remark that they did not all bear the same distinctive mark as deputies; some merely wore on the left breast the broad red ribbon and rosette, which was adopted after the attack of the 15th; others a more ornate article of the same form, embroidered in gold and terminating with gold fringe; whilst others exhibited the tri-coloured scarf across the shoulder, agreed to in the sitting of the day before. A few even wore cocked hats of avoiding the notice which this somewhat glaring ornament was sure to draw on them, as they were at under their coat, so that a small portion merely appeared across [illegible] brea t. Some deputies also wore both ornaments.

General Cavaignac was amongst the earliest arrivals—a fine, tall, soldier-like figure, with an appearance of youth in his whole bearing. M. Garnier Pages also arrived early, with his long hair hanging down after the fashion of 93, and his pale keen features giving you the idea of the unsettled mind wearing out the body. M. Buchez, the President, was also one of those who came in time, a heavy but good-natured-looking man. Meanwhile, an immense crowd had assembled along every part of the line of march that is, from the Place de la Bastille to the Champ de Mars

A little before seven, a large body of the National Guard à cheval, a remarkably fine set of men, took up their station close to the bridge, and along the quays. The Garde Mobile arrived about the same time, and placed themselves close to the grand entrance of the National Palace. Troops of the line, drawn up, and carabineers were followed by a number of officers belonging to the staff of the National Guard thronged in nearly at the same time, and the grand entrance being thrown wide open, they placed themselves on each side the whole way up the steps so as to form a double line, through which the representatives of the people would have to pass in going down to take their place in the procession through the people.

At half-past seven o'clock, the scene from the floor of the portico of the Chamber was a most animated one—everywhere troops, people, flags, uniforms, National Guards mingled together. When, however, the eye became accustomed to the mass, and could single out the various parts of the immense whole, it was evident that all was perfectly well arranged. Although the whole of the bridge, the quays, and the Place de la Concorde were covered over with human beings, it was seen that currents were passing freely through the quays in different directions.

The whole of the space seen from the steps was thickly studded with tri-coloured flags, borne by the deputies sent from the provinces to Paris to be present at the fete. They were nearly all the same in their style of inscriptions on the top bearing the name of the Department, whilst below was "Vive la République!" Those of these streamers were richly embroidered in gold, and some, in place of the white colour, had cloth of silver. What struck the eye most, after these flags, was the vast number of officers on horseback, in brilliant uniforms. They lie dismes drew up round the Chamber, and in the end constituted the immediate guard to the representatives when the procession moved. Troops kept passing down the quays, to form the line on both sides of the way, and about half-past eight, at which hour the bearers of the departmental flags moved in, and arranged themselves in a somewhat theatrical tableau in front of the steps of the Chamber. The deputies had by this time collected round the peristyle, and were ready to start, when suddenly General Clément Thomas, the commander of the National Guard, dashed up on his white charger to the foot of the steps, and, taking off his hat, announced that all was ready.

THE PROCESSION TO THE CHAMP DE MARS.

The signal being given, the representatives moved down the steps, four by four, but not in any particular order, the Ministers and Executive Committee mixing their places indiscriminately. M. de Lamartine and M. Ledru Rollin were among the last, but not together. The representatives were tremendously cheered, the whole crowd taking off their hats as the cortège approached. They went on foot, along the quay, to the Champ de Mars, and were exactly one hour and a half in reaching the estrade prepared for them in front of the Ecole Militaire.

We now notice the great features of the procession. Immediately after the members of the National Assembly came the Mayor of Paris, and of the surrounding communes, bearing their tri-coloured scarfs; then followed the delegates of the departments. When the latter had advanced a short distance down the Quay, there was what may be termed an historical interruption. At this point about twenty old men, with a banner inscribed "Vainqueurs de la Bastille, 1789," who had been living by the way-side, tottered forward, and in querulous tones demanded to be admitted next the Mayor. "We ought," said the spokesman, "to be first of all! Without us Louis would have had liberty? It was we who showed the way to achieve great things." The delegates yielded them the pas, though without the slightest acknowledgment of the right of precedence

After the delegates came the various trade corporations, or compagnons, each with some specimen of their occupation. Some of these displays were very pretty. The flower-makers, for instance, bore a circular ottoman, with a cornucopia of magnificent flowers in the centre, and a plume of feathers in each of the four compartments. The armourers carried a large trophied group of arms à l'ancienne, upon a platform, with a superb suit of armour at each corner. The musical-instrument makers had a covered car, drawn by four horses, in which was a large group of harps, horns, flutes, cymbals, pianos, &c.; amidst which reclined several young girls in white as the Muses. Next came the [illegible] model stone of the unfinished pair of newly-invented and labelled piano! The Bazars de Voyage, also, had a lofty car, fitted with articles for travelling, and a number of fine-looking compagnons. The goldsmiths bore a magnificent vase, from the classical design of Klagmann.

The Champ de Mars was arranged not merely for brilliancy of display, but for accommodation. The whole area was covered with sand, in order that there might be firm footing; and a considerable number of refreshment-rooms had been erected. In the room of the Ecole Militaire, behind the members of the Executive Government, seats were provided for about one hundred persons, chiefly their relatives and intimate friends; and handsome bouquets were offered to the ladies. In different parts of the Champ de Mars were statues erected for the occasion, and opposite to the Pont Jena were two colossal obelisks.

The march of the troops and different bodies named in the programme of [illegible] before the members of the National Assembly commenced with the delegates of the departments. The band of the 14th Legion of the Pyrenees was carried by a Basque, dressed in the picturesque costume of his country. Many of the delegates were accompanied by detachments of National Guards from the arrondissements. As they passed, the shouts of "Vive la République!" "Vive l'Assemblée Nationale!" were general; and there were a few cries of "Vive la République Démocratique!" A person in the crowd having taken up and repeated this cry in a contrary sense, one of the national representatives, General Lafontaine, cried "Vive la République!" and asked the person who had repeated the other cry whether there were two kinds of Republic. There was a loud burst of approbation at the question of the general. The members of February then followed the delegates of the Departments; then came the members of the Court of Cassation, the Court of Accounts, and the Court of Appeal, in their robes of office. Next came the municipal status of the Republic, surrounded by flags, on a truck drawn by four horses; and with it the delegates of the Ateliers Nationaux, about 2000 in number [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] with the artillery. The Car of Agriculture, drawn by six cart-horses, came at almost the middle of the filing off of the troops: on platforms which concealed the wheels were implements of agriculture, and in the middle was an oak-tree; the effect, altogether, was good. The passage of the troops occupied a long time. Altogether, the Corporations, with their insignia, were striking, but stagey. At noon a balloon was let off from the court-yard of the Ecole Militaire, amidst a salute of artillery discharged rom the heights Chaillot, as well as from the Hôtel des Invalides. One of the most picturesque sights in the procession of the National Guards was that of the cuirassiers, on account of their number and the peculiarity of their costume. The Garde Mobile à Cheval closed the march of the National Guards. After them came the regiments of the line of the garrison of Paris horse and foot, amidst cries of "Vive la République!" "Vive la Ligne!" It was our o'clock before the whole of the military had passed before the National Assembly.

THE ILLUMINATIONS.

In the evening the Champ de Mars was brilliantly illuminated. There was a vast flare of tri-coloured lamps, and the devices and transparencies sustained the Paris taste in these matters. The fire-works were not so successful. The Champs Elysées were also illuminated, from the Place de la Concorde to the Triumphal Arch; and the myriads of variegated lamps and festoons suspended across the great avenue had the ensemble of enchantment.

During every stage of the fete the most perfect order was maintained. There was, certainly, an appearance of gaiety; but, says Galignani, "the fete seemed to be regarded as an inauguration of better days, and that hope is not extinct in the people."

The Reforme gives the following statistics of the fete: expense of illuminations in Paris, 208,000f. (£8000), viz. 30,000 houses lighted with 10 lampions, on an average, make 300,000. In the Champ de Mars, Champs-Elysées, and Tuileries, 500,000 coloured lamps; Chinese lanterns, 10,000; becs of gas, 30,000; lampions for the public monuments, 200,000; making altogether 1,040,000 lights, which, at 20c each (2d.), represent a sum of 208,000f. It is calculated that 1,200,000 persons participated in the fete, and that more than 10,000,000f. were circulated on the occasion amongst the small vendors of refreshments. It is further stated that 8402 cannon-shots were fired between the period of the arrival of the National Assembly in the Champ de Mars and eleven o'clock at night.

GEN. BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS, COMMANDANT OF THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRANCE.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

In the large Engraving upon the front page, our Artist has depicted the colossal Statue of the Republic, upon a pedestal hung with white draperies richeved with crimson velvet and gold. The Statue is of papier-mâché, and the draperies of stone-colour, so as to give the figure the appearance of a huge work of sculpture. This was, certainly, the great object of attraction in the grand

The [illegible] of Illustrations opposite are from the pencil of M. Janet Lange. They represent two episodes of the fete: a family at their al fresco refreshment, in the Champ de Mars, with the procession in the rear; and a party of females in the pageant, bearing a bee-hive, as the emblem of industry, whilst, in the distance, are seen other portions of the pageant.

In the accompanying scene, the Car of Agriculture, with its emblematic group, implements, plants and trees, flags, and streamers, and its heavy "coursers" and surrounding accessories, form an effective tableau, certainly not the least picturesque object in the line.

GENERAL BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS.

This brave officer distinguished himself in the conquest of Algeria; and, on the organization of the National Assembly, was appointed its military commandant. In the sitting of Tuesday, however, the General rose, and announced that the command by which he was commissioned to take charge of the protection of the National Assembly had been withdrawn from him, and given to the Minister of War. M. De la Roche Jacquelin ascended the tribune, and protested against the President or any other person or authority having taken it upon him to annul an act of the National Assembly. It was the National Assembly that had entrusted its defence to Gen. Baraguay d'Hilliers, and the Assembly alone could annul its commission. The Minister of War rose and assured the gallant general that as Minister of War the supreme command of all the troops had devolved upon him, without prejudice to any special commands held by other officers. This view of the case was confirmed by M. Bucher, the President, who considered the superintendence of measures for the defence of the National Assembly to pertain to the Minister of War. General d'Hilliers persisted in saying that he would resign the authority he held, as he would not act where responsibility was divided. The President moved that in accepting the resignation of the gallant General, the Assembly should vote him their thanks, which passed unanimously.

THE PRISONERS AT VINCENNES.

In the account of the "Attempted Counter-Revolution in Paris," given in our Journal of last week, we detailed the arrest of Sobrier, Raspail, Cabet, Albert, Barbès, Huber, Courtais, and others of the Communist party.

On Tuesday the prisoners were sent to the Castle of Vincennes, in diligences, with National Guards upon the top and in the interior of the vehicles. Barbès, it is stated, during the journey, made an ineffectual attempt to escape. The diligences were also guarded by an escort of dragoons, as shown in the accompanying Illustration, in the distance of which is shown the Castle of Vincennes.

In the second Engraving we have the donjon of the prison-fortress.

Vincennes lies about a league east of Paris: it has for seven centuries been celebrated for its chateau and forest. The present building was founded in 1337 by Philip de Valois. Henry V., King of England, died here in 1442. Louis XI enlarged and embellished the chateau, which was his favourite residence; and during his reign, the donjon, which our Artist has represented, became a state prison. Charles IX. died here in 1574. The buildings were extended by Louis XIII. and XIV. In 1661, Cardinal Mazarin died at Vincennes; and in 1715, it was chosen by the Duke of Orleans as the residence of Louis XV, instead of Versailles, till the palace of the Tuileries could be prepared. After that period the Castle was used as a state prison, and the celebrated Mirabeau was confined in it from 1777 to 1780. In 1804, the unfortunate Duc d'Enghien was shot here, by order of Napoleon, and buried in the southern ditch of the castle; but his body was disinterred in 1816, and removed to the Chapel. Prince Polignac and other Ministers of Charles X. were confined here after the Revolution of 1830; and last year the Duke of Montpensier occupied apartments in it.

The chateau forms a large parallelogram; round it were formerly nine towers, eight of which were demolished in 1818. The principal entrance is to the north, through a heavy buttressed rectangular tower, with pointed windows. The donjon or keep is a square tower with turrets at the corners: it is situated to the west, and in the centre of a square fortified court, with round watch-turrets at the angles. It is now used partly as a powder-magazine and partly as a prison; it is ascended by a winding staircase of 240 steps in the south-eastern turret, and it commands a magnificent view of Paris. Opposite to this, in the court, is the chapel, a fine building of the 16th century, with three spires.

The Castle has been for some time used as the central depôt of artillery for the garrison of Paris, and has been put in a state of complete defence, and great alterations have been made here in consequence of the fortifications of Paris. In the Fort of Vincennes, not far distant from the Castle, ten leaders of the conspiracy are at present confined.

We find it stated that a plan for the escape of Barbès, from Vincennes, was actually in course of execution, he having passed several doors, when he was seized by one of the young Garde Mobile, who recognised him. Gen. Courtais, we learn, has been transferred from the Luxembourg to Vincennes.

The Presse says:—"It appears certain that Barbès has attempted to escape from Vincennes. He had gained over two of his jailors, but was recognised and stopped by a third. Barbès is said to have made some resistance to his being carried back, and that instead of being lodged as before on the ground-floor of the Castle, he is now confined at the top of the donjon."

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE SCOTCH PEERAGE.—On the motion of the Earl of ELLENBOROUGH, it was ordered that, inasmuch as a person styling himself Lord Colvill, of Ochiltree, had failed to make out his claim to vote for Scotch representative peers in respect of such title, his claim to do so be disallowed.

The Bishop of LINCOLN, in reply to a question from Earl Brownlow, entered into a statement, in answer to certain observations attributed to Mr. Horsman, in his late speech in the House of Commons, with reference to the working of Chapter of Lincoln, and to the conduct of certain of the clergy of that diocese.

The Prevention of Smoke Bill passed through Committee.

The report of the Poorhouses (Ireland) Bill was received

INCREASE OF THE NATIONAL EXPENDITURE.—The Earl of ILLENBOROUGH, in moving for some returns, drew attention to the progressive increase in the miscellaneous expenditure which has gone on during the last ten years. He enumerated the items upon which he found the most remarkable augmentation of expense, and particularly pointed out the large sums of money spent upon Buckingham Palace, the new Houses of Parliament, the Caledonian Canal, pensions, convicts, general education, arts and sciences, the British Museum, &c., during a period when the revenue of the country was unable to support the ordinary expenditure. The noble Earl said that he had no hope that for several years to come our income would increase; and therefore a strict attention to economy was the only way to relieve the people that the British constitution afforded them, not only every desirable security and liberty, but that it was compatible with a frugal and rigid economy. This was, in fact, no time for organic change; but it was the time for postponing every expense not absolutely demanded for the interests of the country. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE remarked that Governments were not in general to blame for increased expenditure, but both Houses of Parliament and the public in general, because additional expenses were for the most part forced on successive Governments by the Parliaments of the time being. He instanced the case of the improvements going on in Buckingham Palace. When they were first proposed, Ministers were very severely censured for not building a new palace for her Majesty; and had not her Majesty and the Government assisted the wishes of the House of Commons, a much greater expenditure would have been incurred.—The Duke of RICHMOND, alluding to the cost of the voluminous returns ordered to be prepared for both Houses of Parliament, suggested that the price of each return should in future be marked on the back of it, that would show to what expense the country was put by the economic members of the other House. After a few remarks from Lord BEAUMONT and the Earl of HARDWICKE, the returns were ordered, and the other Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

LANCASHIRE ELECTION.—Lord COURTENAY reported from the Lancashire Election Committee that Mr. R. A. Armstrong had been duly elected.

QUESTIONS AND NOTICES.—Sir W. SOMERVILLE, in reply to Sir Edmund Conolly, said that the Government [illegible] fully answered the [illegible] had been [illegible] in the House [illegible] Mr. D. L. EVANS expressed his determination not to accede to the request made of dividing his propositions to be submitted this day into four distinct resolutions, believing, as he did, that no reform of the House of Commons would be of any use unless the four propositions comprised in his motion were collectively affirmed. If he obtained leave, as he trusted he should do, for bringing in separate bills for carrying out those objects, it would then be open to hon. members to support such of them as they approved, and oppose those which they considered objectionable. He had well considered the subject before he had given his notice. In the case of the Stamford borough inquiry into the alleged unconstitutional interference of the Marquis of Exeter at recent elections, Mr. W. P. WOOD, at the suggestion of Lord J. Russell, consented to leave the consideration of the committee in the hands of the General Committee of Selection.—Lord PALMERSTON, in reply to Mr. Bankes and Mr Baillie, stated that notes had recently passed between Mr. Bulwer and the Duke of Sotomayor, as to how the paragraph which had appeared in the Chimney Publico, with reference to his dispatch, had been obtained. The notes were rather of a personal and private character than of a public nature; but if he received any information by the present messenger which he considered to be necessary, he should waive all considerations as to privacy, and lay the whole of the correspondence on the table of the House.—Mr. W. O. GORE moved for a select committee to consider the petition of John Delaney, complaining of certain proceedings for effecting a compromise in the case of the Sligo election petitions. After some discussion, the hon. member withdrew his motion, until the pending petitions against the return shall have been disposed of.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—The House went again into Committee on the Public Health Bill, commencing with clause 37. On arrival at clause 64, which relates to the laying out of new streets, the level and width of which to be determined by the local boards, Mr S. CRAWFORD proposed to leave out certain words, in order to take away the power of appeal to the central board. After some discussion, the question divided, when the amendment was lost by a majority of 66, the numbers 19 to 85. The remaining clauses up to 105 were agreed to, leaving forty-six clauses and the schedules for discussion on Thursday.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—Lord MONTEAGLE moved that there be laid before the House copies of correspondence between the trustees of the National Gallery and the Lords of the Treasury, respecting the gift made by Mr. Vernon, of a public collection of modern pictures and other works of art. The noble Lord said the value of the splendid gift to the public of Mr. Vernon had been, if possible, enhanced by the manner in which the gift was made. Mr. Vernon had made over this magnificent collection of works of art to the public during his lifetime. He considered that such a donation from a private individual to the public ought not to be passed over without some mark of approbation. However, were they entirely indifferent to these gifts; and this conduct, he must say, afforded little encouragement to liberal persons of taste to make such important sacrifices. The National Gallery was of comparatively small extent for a nation like the public purchases did not amount to more than one-third of the whole collection. This was one proof of the value of encouraging private liberality in such a direction.—Lord OVERSTONE, as a trustee of the National Gallery, in some anxious to impress on the House the necessity of doing something in the matter in question, in order to complete the building. Objections, he was aware, might be made by her Majesty's Government to the proposal of expense; but he was of opinion that the country required it, and moreover that people who were so disposed did not give those pictures to the nation, because at present there was no place to put them in.—The motion was then agreed to.

The Parliamentary Proceedings Bill passed through committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

ENGLISH DIPLOMACY IN SPAIN.—Mr. BULWER.—In reply to Mr Bankes, Lord PALMERSTON said he had received a communication from Madrid, and he had to state that on the 17th instant Sir H. Bulwer had received his passport from the Spanish Government, and was about to leave Madrid. There had been some correspondence, which he would lay upon the table on Thursday. In reply to a question from Mr. Disraeli, Lord PALMERSTON said that the despatches of Sir H. Bulwer from Madrid did not arise from his having received any other appointment, nor from any rupture of the relations between the two countries.

Lord G. BENTINCK moved that the House at its rising should adjourn until Thursday.—Mr HUME opposed the motion. A short discussion ensued, after which the House divided, and the motion was carried by a majority of 103 to 90.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL TRADE.—SILK, TIMBER, &c.

Lord G. BENTINCK moved for a number of returns relating to Canadian timber, silks (thrown and raw), cottons, woollens, watches of foreign manufacture, boots and shoes, &c. His object in moving for these returns was to prove that Mr. Gladstone was altogether in error on a former evening in stating that his (Lord G. Bentinck's) information was founded on erroneous data, and that, in fact, his whole statement on the occasion referred to was contained within the limit to which the facts would have allowed him to proceed in the [illegible] he had then advanced. In reference to the effects produced upon the silk trade by the reduction of the duties on foreign silks, the noble Lord contended that true than a monetary spirit had made things somewhat better in Spitalfields, but this was to be attributed partly to the organic changes which had recently taken place in France, and partly to the advice given to her Majesty by the Lord Chamberlain, and, as it appeared, adverse to the opinion of her Majesty's Ministers, that ladies should appear at the Drawingroom in dresses of home manufacture, thus kindly countervailing to some extent the misery inflicted upon Spitalfields by the forcible legislation of the last few years, which had exposed our artisans to a competition which they could not stand with the foreign manufacturer. In fact, within the short period of four months four thousand looms of silks had been imported into this country, the value of which would have [illegible] raised for a whole year no less than 60,000 persons. He did not mean to refer to the whole of the distress to free trade, but he thought he had shown enough to prove that according to the changes which had been made in the commercial policy of the country.

Mr. GLADSTONE said that Lord G Bentinck had failed in his attempt to prove that the distress to which he had referred was attributable to the legislation of which he complained. The noble Lord had dealt largely in isolated facts, but would no doubt commit himself to some proposition which would enable the House to infer that he was really of opinion that free trade would be the ruin of the timber trade, or that any recent distress in that trade was to be attributed to any change in our commercial legislation. He could not admit that the present distress in Spitalfields was attributable to free trade, for similar distress had prevailed there in the palmiest days of protection. They should not forget, however, that [illegible] had declined in Spitalfields, that the whole silk trade, and the general condition of the silk trade by no means warranted the statements of the noble Lord.

Mr. NEWDEGATE replied to the [illegible] of Mr. Gladstone, and strongly supported those of Lord George Bentinck.

Sir G. CLERK was desirous that the fullest information should be laid before the House; for the more its attention was called to the subject, and the better it was understood; the more certain he felt that Parliament would still sanction the principles upon which the commercial policy of Sir R. Peel was founded.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said he had supported the commercial policy of Sir R. Peel, and he had no hesitation in saying that nothing that had since occurred has in the slightest degree altered the opinion upon which he had then acted. The noble Lord has proved nothing unless he could show that foreigners made us a present of all the goods we imported, for otherwise it was clear that they must be paid for by the manufactures of this country. He would not object to the returns moved for, but must say that it must be on the understanding that the Government could be in no way responsible for the correctness of the information which might in consequence be obtained.

Mr. M. GIBSON deprecated the practice of making dissentions upon unopposed motions, and remarked on the circumstance that Lord G. Bentinck had caused the postponement of Mr. Hume's important motion for Parliamentary reform, by raising a discussion on returns which could lead to nothing.

Mr HENLEY was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman complain of the waste of time of the House, for in former years he never thought it a waste of time to return to the same subject again and again and again, while he had a protégé in his head which he wished to see carried out. Surely he ought to allow the noble Lord to pursue, in support of his opinions, the very course which he (Mr. Gibson) had himself pursued for so many years, until he had obtained what he wanted. He might rely upon it the noble Lord would not be deterred from pursuing the course he thought right by any twaddle proceeding from the opposite side of the House.

Lord G. BENTINCK replied, and said that he had no knowledge that his motion was not to be opposed until a short time before Mr. (Gibson rose, and had, therefore, good ground for retorting upon the hon. gentleman the charge of wasting the time of the House

The motion was then agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Mr. HUME postponed his motion for Parliamentary reform until the first open day upon the books, which was the 20th day of June.

Mr. F. O'CONNOR charged Mr. Hume with juggling the people by postponing his motion, for, although it was then eleven o'clock, there was time enough still to commence the debate, which might then be adjourned. He would, for his own part, henceforth be no party to a proceeding which he could only regard as mockery, delusion, and a snare. He moved that the House do adjourn

Mr. COBDEN thought Mr. Hume was entirely blame-less in postponing the motion, and advised him, if he wished for success, not to be guided either by the advice of the member for the [illegible] or the member for Nottingham. He had a lengthened knowledge of the hon. gentleman, and he believed he had done work to prevent the working classes from obtaining what they were aware by no other means by which they could accomplish than any other public man in this country had ever done

Lord J. RUSSELL expressed his belief that the mass of the working people entirely wished for the plan of Mr O'Connor nor for that of Mr. Hume.

The motion for the adjournment of the House was then withdrawn.

PACKING JURIES IN IRELAND.—Mr. ROCHE drew attention to returns of the names and descriptions of the 48 special jurors drawn by ballot to serve on the trial of the cause, "The Queen against William Smith O'Brien, Esq., M.P.," in the Queen's Bench, in Ireland; and of the 34 who were afterwards, on the motion of the list, struck off the number, distinguishing those struck off by the Crown and by the traverser; and also specifying which of the 48 were members of the Roman Catholic religion. And a like return, in the case of "The Queen against Thomas Meagher." He condemned the course which had been pursued on the late trials as an outrage on the feelings of the Roman Catholics of Ireland; and wished to know whether the [illegible] of that profession had taken place on the authority of the Secretary for Ireland, the Attorney-General, or the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who had so elaborately denounced similar practices when pursued by the Government of the present Government were liable to any imputation on the score suggested by the hon. member. They were incapable of such. As to what had been the conduct of Mr. Kemmis, the Crown solicitor, he advised the House to suspend its judgment until they had received full information on the details.—The question was then agreed to, with the exception of the paragraph specifying the religion of the jurors, for ascertaining which there were no official data.—Adjourned

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL.—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE moved the second reading of this bill.—A lengthened discussion followed. The Bishop of OXFORD, the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, and Lord. STANLEY opposed the bill. The Bishop of ST. DAVID'S, Lord BROUGHAM, and several other noble Lords supported it, and on a division the second reading was lost by a majority of 163 to 128.

Their Lordship's adjourned at two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—The House went into Committee on this bill, and resumed the discussion of the clauses. All the clauses having been gone through, the House resumed, and the bill was ordered to be reported on Thursday next

The Joint Stock Companies Bill was read a third time.

Some other measures were forwarded a stage, and the House adjourned.

OFFICIAL SALARIES THREATENED HAVOC. The special report of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates will not be communicated to the public for some time; but we are enabled to state that the following is the nature of the proposes are of the most sweeping character. Messrs. Hume, Bowring, and Cobden have been triumphant in the Committee. The offices of Junior Lords of the Admiralty, Treasury, &c. &c., are either entirely done away with, or most materially cut down the salaries of Cabinet Ministers woefully diminished.

BRIBERY.—The Town Council of Carlisle have adopted a petition, praying that the Attorney-General, the Speaker of the House of Commons, or some other appointed commissioners to visit places in which bribery has been proved, may proceed with as little delay as possible, and that the city of Carlisle may be included in the list of places to be visited.

POLICE STATISTICS OF MANCHESTER.—The annual report of Captain Willis, Chief Superintendent of Police to the Town Council of Manchester, has recently presented, and contains the following statistics, collected through the police, respecting crime, education, population, and other matters: "Notwithstanding the temptation to disorder or crime, which it may be supposed distress and privation would have afforded, the peace of the city has been in no year more eminently maintained than during the year 1847, and while quietness and good order have been promoted, the apprehension of offenders has also been attended by a manner decreased. The number of apprehensions in 1847 has been smaller by 1042 persons than in 1846, and less by upwards of 7500 persons than in 1842. That the discretion exercised by the police on the one hand, and the increased education and intelligence of the people on the other, have been instrumental in producing a decrease of prisoners, is shown by some of the tables appended to the report. From one of these it appears that in 1840, 1841, and 1842, the number of prisoners discharged was nearly three-fourths of the gross number apprehended, while the number discharged in the past year amounted only to one-third of those apprehended; and while, in the former years, the number of persons summarily punished by the magistrates was only one-sixth of these apprehended, the proportion of persons summarily punished in the past year was nearly one-half of those who were apprehended.

IRELAND.

IRISH CONFEDERATION.

On Tuesday a meeting of the members of this body was held at three o'clock, in Mr Ennis's great yard, Crane-street, to express their disapproval of the unconstitutional and despotic practice of jury-packing for the purpose of securing the conviction of political offenders in this country. The yard, which is capable of accommodating 3000 persons, was densely crowded in every part. In addition to the Confederate leaders, Messrs W. S. O'Brien, Meagher, A. Martin, O'Gorman, &c, the platform was occupied by many members of Conciliation-hall, including Dr. Grey, Mr. J. H. Dunne, &c. Mr. J. B. Dillon, barrister, was in the chair.

The Chairman stated the object of the meeting. They had assembled for the purpose of protesting against the "base, bloody, and brutal" practice of jury-packing. There were two meanings attached to the mode of trial by jury in Ireland; the one was to visit a hon. gentleman, for which it meant a trial of a man by twelve men impartially selected from his fellow-citizens. But there was another sense in which it must be viewed, and that was the sense in which it had a most fatal effect upon the prisoners at the bar—namely, those who were guilty of the heinous crime of loving their country. (Cheers.) In the latter sense it meant the selection of twelve of their bitterest enemies to try them. (Groans.) Now, they were the opponents and enemies of the British power in that country. (Loud cheers.) They asked no favour from the agents of that power. (Cheers.) The Government officials had a right to make use of all lawful and even unconstitutional means to secure the conviction they might be; but they (the Confederates) had a right that they should not be stabbed in the dark. (Cheers.) They were prepared for the flash of the sabre, but they claimed to be protected against the dagger of the assassin. The Speaker concluded by alluding to Mr. John Mitchell, calling on them to recollect that, however they might differ from him in some respects, he was still a prisoner for Ireland. (Cheers

THE STATE PROSECUTIONS.

EXTERIOR OF NEWGATE, DUBLIN.

ment read in open Court, the Clerk of the Crown proceeded to read the document, which occupied nearly an hour. Mr. Mitchell was then called on to plead the indictment, and was about to do so when Sir Colman O'Loghlen applied to the Court, as a matter of favour, to allow the traverser until the following (this) morning to plead, inasmuch as he intended to apply to the Court to quash the indictment altogether.

THE LORD MAYOR OF DUBLIN. BARON LEFROY. JUDGE MOORE.

The Attorney-General having stated that he had no objection to the application of the traverser's counsel, the Court appointed ten o'clock, Tuesday morning, for hearing the arguments of counsel.

On Tuesday, at the sitting of the Court, Sir Colman O'Loghlen, on the part of the prisoner, moved to quash the indictment; but the Court, without hearing the Attorney-General on the other side, refused the motion.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen then applied for liberty to demur to the indictment and plead over the felony.

The Court decided that if the demurrer were to be argued, judgment of either guilty or not guilty should follow.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen asked for leave till Thursday morning to plead or demur.

The Attorney-General opposed the application.

Baron Lefroy suggested, that if the prisoner would now plead and be at liberty to withdraw that plea and demur on the general ground, he thought there could be no objection on either side.

Counsel on both sides having assented, the Clerk of the Crown called upon Mr. Mitchell, saying,—"You have heard the indictment read, what say you, guilty or not guilty?"

Mr. Mitchell. Not guilty.

The Court then decided that the traverser should have until 4 o'clock to withdraw his plea or proceed with demurrer.

At four o'clock Sir Colman O'Loghlen requested on the part of the prisoner that the plea of not guilty should not stand.

It was decided then that the trial should take place on Thursday morning.

An application was made on Wednesday in the Commission Court by Mr. Holmes, as counsel for Mr. Mitchell, to postpone this trial, on the ground of the absence of a most material witness for the defence.

He stated it was also his client's intention to move by counsel to quash the array in consequence of information he had received, to the effect that the panel was prepared partially and to the prejudice of Mr. Mitchell. In order to support this application, he said it would be necessary to examine a large number of witnesses, and amongst others Mr. S. Monahan, whose evidence was most important and indispensable.

The Court desired the matter to stand over until Thursday morning, when the Attorney-General would be present.

THE OPERA OF "LINDA DI CHAMOUNI," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—SCENE THE LAST.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

The first representation of Donizetti's "Linda di Chamouni," produced on Saturday night, was honoured with the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent and the Duchess of Cambridge—a graceful compliment bestowed on Madame Tadolini, the new Italian prima donna, and on Mr. Reeves, the great English tenor, on the occasion of their début. The reception of these artistes was most cordial, that of the tenor being quite overwhelming; they were encored several times; called for at the end of every act; and nothing, in short, could surpass the fervour of the audience in their ovations. Thus much for the historical portion of the evening's record: the critical analysis, whilst acknowledging the hospitality and nationality so earnestly displayed in favour of Madame Tadolini and Mr. Reeves, has to scrutinise the respective claims to artistical distinction.

Madame Tadolini for years the favoured vocalist of Italy and Germany—is rather under the middle height, and inclines strongly to embonpoint. Her face is very handsome, and her eyes remarkably expressive; but the rigidity of the features is opposed to the depicting of varied emotion. Her organ appears to be a mezzo-soprano, the medium and lower tones of which are of [illegible] quality; but the notes of the upper octave are uncertain, and exhibit signs of fatigue. The part of Linda was expressly composed for her by Donizetti, and its vocal attributes are well adapted for her voice. There is a brilliant polacca in the first act, "O luce di quest' anima," full of sparkling divisions; and there is also an impassioned duo, "Da quel dì."

In the second act Linda has a series of duets, beginning with one with Pierotto, the contralto; next with the Marquis; then with the tenor, Carlo (who was omitted); and finally with her father, Antonio. These duos exact much dramatic intensity, and the mad cavatina at the close a high order of histrionic talent. The scena in the third act, where Linda returns to her native village insane, conducted by the faithful Pierotto, and her reason is restored by the lover Carlo singing the strains of the duo in the first act, is trying and difficult. Madame Tadolini proved that her high fame had been merited, as a charming vocalist; but in her acting she seemed to be cold and conventional: thus, the recognition of the parents and of her lover at the close of the opera was like that of saluting ordinary acquaintances, instead of displaying highly wrought feelings of excitement. At the finale of the opera she introduced a bravura, by Rossi, of Milan, which she sang with considerable effect. When we take into consideration the number of celebrated singers now in London, Madame Tadolini cannot be an ordinary artiste to have produced such an impression as on her début.

Mr. Reeves's triumph was one of the greatest successes ever achieved on any boards: and yet he appeared in a very disadvantageous part, for the music of Il Visconte di Sirval, who woos Linda under the name of Carlo, may be stated to be confined to the duo in the first act, "Da quel dì," a weak romanza in the second, and an andante in the last act. His fine, powerful, and sympathetic voice, however, did not fail in its effect on the auditory. His romance "Se tanto" was rapturously encored; and his impassioned delivery of the "E la voce" in the concluding one was received with acclamations. Mr. Reeves's principal fault is the want of the mezza voce; he is either singing pianissimo when he is often inaudible, or he strains for his favourite notes in all fortissimo. With more repose, refinement, and contrast in his style, and with attention to the pure Italian accent, Mr. Reeves has but few rivals on the Italian and French stage.

Coletti's beautiful voice and excellent method told powerfully in Antonio; his scene of the malediction, when he recognises his daughter Linda in Paris, as the supposed mistress of the Viscount, was finely depicted. Lablache sang the music of "Il Prefetto" impressively. The prayer, for five voices, sung without accompaniment, was encored, owing chiefly to his artistical skill and the beautiful tones of Reeves. Mdlle Schwartz was too tame and frigid in the exquisite part of the warm hearted Pierotto; nor were the various situations in the drama, relieved as they ought to have been by the humour of Frederick Lablache in the Marquis, an admirable comic part, that might have been allotted to Billetti, and would have strengthened the cast amazingly.

On Tuesday night "Linda" was repeated, but without the presence of Mr. Reeves. We found at the doors the following notice

"Mr. Reeves having refused to sustain his part in "Linda di Chamouni," the indulgence of the subscribers and the public is respectfully entreated in favour of Signor Gardoni, who at the shortest notice has, to prevent disappointment, most willingly undertaken the part."

After the overture, Mr. Lee came on the stage and made a speech to the above effect. Madame Tadolini was received with great applause, as also Signor Gardoni, who acquitted himself creditably in the emergency.

We understand that the secession of Mr. Reeves has arisen because the part of Edgardo, in "Lucia," was promised to him by the management, and immediately on learning that this character had been assigned to Signor Gardoni, Mr Reeves considered that his contract was at an end, intimation to that effect was given on Monday last.

On Thursday night, Donizetti's "Lucia" was produced, for the purpose of introducing Madlle. Jenny Lind in the character of the heroine. When the curtain rose there were loud cries of "Reeves" from the gallery and pit, which, however, ceased on the entrance of Coletti to sing the opening air of Enrico. Lind's appearance was the signal for several rounds of cheering. She gave the recitative "Ancor non giunge" with much skill, her sustained notes in the "vieni mia vita" being very beautiful. Nothing could be more delicious than her vocalisation in the largo; her series of shakes were splendidly executed in the cabaletta, and her high notes came out most brilliantly. On Gardoni's coming on the stage as Edgardo, the cries for Reeves were renewed, but the voice of the syren Lind soothed the "savage breasts" of the malcontents, and peace was soon restored, and the duo terminated with éclat.

The great point of Lind, in the second act, was in the contract scene; her shudder of horror after the fatal signature was a fine conception. Gardoni was encored in the malediction—injudiciously, as we think, since it drew forth disapprobation from the Reeves party. The mad scene in the last act was the great attraction of the opera; the nervous twitches of Lind's face—her restless, uneasy action—her voice soaring in the upper region, in wild strains of melancholy, constituted a charming picture; and she was twice called for at the close to receive ovations. Gardoni's physical force was not equal in the dramatic situation of the dying scene; but he was summoned before the curtain at the end.

The house was crowded to excess. The Queen Dowager and the Duchess of Kent were in the Royal boxes, with a long array of fashion.

On Tuesday evening the popular and ever-welcome Carlotta Grisi made her first appearance this season, after the opera, in the "Pas des Eléments," and was received with the heartiest demonstrations of welcome. She comes back with all her most attractive attributes in full force; with the same intelligent speaking face and expressive pantomime, and the same striking characteristics of the school. The ballet department of her Majesty's Theatre is now remarkably strong. With Carlotta, Grisi, Rosati, and Marie Taglioni all dancing on the same evening, an entertainment is offered more than sufficient to satisfy the wildest desires of the most inordinate lovers of the ballet.

"LA FAVORITA," AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—SCENE THE LAST.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The second performance of Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia," supported by Grisi and Alboni, Mario, Marini, Tamburini, Lavia, Polonini, and Tamburini, on Saturday, was received with the greatest enthusiasm by one of the most brilliant houses of the season

Next day, Donizetti's "Favorita" was produced for the first time, with unprecedented splendour in the mise en scène. The cast was entirely new to the Italian lyrical being the Leonora, Marini Baldassare, Corradi-Setti Alfonso, and Marco Ferdinando, the subordinate parts of Inez and Don Gaspare being assigned to Mdlle. Temple and Signor Soldi. Whether it was owing to nervousness, or perhaps the want of more rehearsals, the singers, in the first and second acts, were not so effective as usual, and the opera dragged considerably. The introduction of the original divertissement, for which Donizetti has composed such pretty music, in the second act, proved also a complete failure, and we recommend its withdrawal. The third and fourth acts, however, awakened the audience from their lethargy, and the singers became more and more at ease; it was a complete crescendo rising with every dramatic, vocal, and scenic situation, and attaining at the finale a climax of overwhelming excitement. The plot of the "Favorita" is familiar to our readers by the English version, in which Miss Romer and Mr. Travers so distinguished themselves. The incidents are repulsive when historically but the genius of the composer has triumphed over the disagreeableness of the libretto. In the entire range of the lyrical drama we know of no set of music more intensely interesting and exciting than that of the last act of the "Favorita" and, as acted and sung by Grisi and Mario with the scenic accessories of Grieve and Telbin, and the magnificent finale introduced by Costa, the effect is electrifying. Our artists supply a notion of this splendid scene. The flats, wings, and side scenes have been altogether removed, and the monastery is built, and we painted, on the entire stage. The foreground is filled with a covered roof in ruins; to the left, looking at the stage, are the painted windows of the chapel, with a door leading to the sanctuary; to the right, is a huge cross, standing by which, at the curtain rises, is the gigantic figure of Marini, as Baldassare, a light being thrown on the cross and figure from the lamp suspended before a saint. The broken ruined columns of the cloisters are illumined with the pale rays of the moon; the façade of the monastery rises in the centre of the stage; while in the distance is seen the gloomy perspective of the aisles, lighted with lamps. As the figures of the pilgrims, novices, and monks of different orders defile in the distance through the dark arches, whilst the organ's peal is heard, and Ferdinando stands in his despair at the foot of the cross, the reality of the scene is secured. Her share in the duo finale we acted a similar result; and her death scene was as exquisitely sung as it was touchingly acted. Mario had his two airs in the first and last acts, the closing one being rapturously encored, without escaping to bring the most perfect specimen of impassioned vocalisation that has ever emanated from his matchless voice. The fluty tones of his upper notes dying off pianissimo were indescribably fine.

Corradi-Setti's King was a great drawback on the cast; he has a fine voice, but is cold, and his style very defective. Marini was not in such good voice as could be desired; but we anticipate much from his Balthasar in a future performance.

Special compliments were justly paid to the choral singing by the encores bestowed on the "Chorus of Monks" and the "Miserere," by Grisi, in which she has baseness in marrying the King's favorita; and in the "Chorus of Monks," opening the last act

We learn that the next characters for Madame Viardot will be Donna Anna, in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and Rosina, in Rossini's "Il Barbiere." Bellini's "Romeo e Giulietta," Beethoven's "Fidelio," Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" are also in active preparation for this season. Meanwhile, for the extra night, Bellini's "Norma" was given, for the first time this season; and the last scene of Rossini's "Cenerentola," for Alboni to sing her wondrous bon mots. The performance of the "Puritani," by Grisi, is one of those sublime pieces of acting and singing which can only be met with at rare intervals. The grandeur of conception, the colossal energy, the histrionic bursts of genius, the vocal brilliancy, and the least of her vocal qualifications, the personal beauty of Grisi have, in the ensemble, rendered Norma her greatest triumph. By a house crowded in every part, she was throughout overwhelming, receiving an ovation at the close. Rubini in the terzetto finale of the first act. The duo with Adalgisa, "Ah! con te"—the trio "Qual cor tradisti," and the quartet

"SURPLICE," THE WINNER OF "THE DERBY STAKES."

THE WINNER.

SURPLICE," a splendid bay colt, by Touchstone; his dam, the celebrated Oaks winner, Crucifix. He appeared four times as a two-year-old, winning twice at Goodwood, once at Newmarket, and walking over once at the same place. He has only been out once this year—as the winner of the Derby. Surplice was bred by Lord George Bentinck, from whose possession he passed into that of Mr. Mostyn, and is now the property of Viscount Clifden.

THE RETURN HOME.

The Illustration represents a moving tableau of company leaving "the Downs." Here is nearly every phase of visitors, from the gay barouche and drag, the post-chaise, the omnibus, gig, and one-horsed cart-load, interspersed with parties of pedestrians and asses. The result of the Derby Meeting on such occasions is tremendous, and the Artist has, in this picture, succeeded in portraying the various life and gaiety of the break-up of the Epsom Meeting.

THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Symptoms of the approaching fall of the Whig Administration are becoming frequent. Their great defeat on the Jewish Emancipation Bill, in the House of Lords, has been followed by another defeat in the same Assembly upon the question of the Irish Poor-Law. Even the House of Commons, where their strength seemed greatest, has afforded them a proof that they are not omnipotent; and that more is expected of a Ministry in these times than the introduction of a Health of Towns Bill, to be abandoned—a Repeal of the Navigation Laws, which they cannot carry—and a coercive policy for Ireland, condemned by themselves when out of office, but resorted to when in. Their defeat in the Commons on Tuesday night upon Dr. Bowring's motion was, perhaps, the most significant hint they have yet received. The subject of the Public Accounts is one of very urgent importance. At a time when a portion of the people are crying out for organic changes, it would assuredly take the edge off agitation for any theoretical reform, if the Ministry would show themselves in earnest upon those practical matters of taxation and expenditure, which every man engaged in trade, commerce, or manufactures—every man who has a house, or pays a direct or indirect contribution to the necessities of the State—feels to be of vital, because of personal, importance.

During the current year, there will be a deficiency of Revenue, upon the calculated expenditure, amounting to no less than five millions. The utmost limit of taxation seems to have been reached. It has been found by experience, that to increase direct taxation, is to diminish the receipts derivable from the Excise and Customs; and that the man who is assessed too heavily upon his property or income, endeavours to make both ends meet in his own household, by depriving himself of the taxable luxuries in which he formerly indulged. It is conceded on all hands that something must be done to remedy a state of things so unsatisfactory, if not so perilous; and that a rare opportunity is afforded to any statesman who has the requisite strength of mind, energy of purpose, and thorough knowledge of fiscal subjects, to make his name illustrious, and entitle himself to the gratitude of all parties by grappling with this subject. To revise our system, in all its ramifications, to induce order out of apparent disorder, and without adding to the total amount of the public burdens, to transform our present deficiency into an annual surplus, is the indispensable work to be accomplished. This is the question that demands the coming statesman. The present administration has given it the go-by. Lord John Russell seems to be unequal to the task. He will not even give an earnest of his desire to make a move by supporting the preliminary reform in the manner of keeping the public accounts, which Dr. Bowring has so often brought under the notice of the legislature. But in default of his Lordship, other men must arise to take the matter up with the energy and honesty of purpose which it demands. The House of Commons, by supporting Dr. Bowring, and defeating the Ministers, has shown the prevalence of a feeling within the legislature, that the time is ripe for the reform needed. The country generally will ratify the verdict.

It is commonly supposed that the Revenues of this country amount, upon an average, to fifty or fifty-two millions. This is the whole amount that figures in the parliamentary estimates, or that finds its way into the National Exchequer. But this sum is far from giving a correct idea of the burden of taxation borne by the people. The cost of the collection, and various charges legally deductable from the payments in their progress to the Exchequer, amount on the average to no less than seven millions per annum, making the gross sum paid in direct or indirect taxation nearly sixty millions. The House of Commons, which, according to the theory of the constitution, holds the purse-strings of the nation, has no control whatever over these seven millions. The disbursements are made without its authority, and it cannot even check them so as to be certain of their correctness. To say nothing of such charges as those by which £4000 per annum has been assured to the heirs and successors of the first Duke of Grafton, out of the revenues of the Post-office, in its progress to the Exchequer; and £7000 per annum out of the Customs and Excise to the same individuals, and which they have received since the reign of Charles the Second to the present time, for what services we need not more particularly allude; there are various charges for actual services performed by living men which are paid out of the Revenue without the control of Parliament. In the year ending on the 5th of January, 1847, these and other charges on the principal departments of the Revenue, which do not figure in the national accounts, amounted in round numbers to £5,900,000; to which had to be added £1,099,000 similarly detained in the inferior departments. Since the passing of the Reform Bill the sums thus expended, irrespective of the great charges for the National Debt, for the Army and Navy, for the whole expenses of Government, and the general machinery of the State, of which accounts and vouchers are annually submitted to the Legislature, amounted, according to Dr. Bowring, to nearly £120,000,000 sterling. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, without impugning any of the facts brought forward, contented himself with denying that any saving could be effected by the submission of those accounts to Parliament, and with the expression of a hope that something might possibly be done hereafter to introduce greater regularity in departments where irregularity was proved to prevail. Dr. Bowring persisted in the essential part of his motion, which simply affirmed that the House could not be the effectual guardian of the revenues of the State, unless the whole amount of the taxes, and of the various other sources of income received for the public account, were either paid in, or accounted for to the Exchequer; and the Government gave it an indirect negative, by moving the previous question. As already stated, the Government was defeated. The numbers were not large on either side; but the defeat was, nevertheless, as significant as if they had been so.

It is earnestly to be hoped that this result will not be unproductive of good. The question, however important in itself, is minor to that of a revision of our entire fiscal system. The revision is demanded by sound policy, if not by safety. The defeat of a preliminary motion like that of Dr. Bowring would have shown that there was but little sympathy for economic reform in the Legislature. Its triumph shows in the same manner that the sympathy exists, and that it must necessarily express itself in another fashion whenever opportunity shall occur. To reform the mode of keeping the accounts is one step: to reform the accounts themselves will be the next. The subject is one that is generally considered dry. Ambitious orators and declaimers very studiously keep aloof from it; but the sound-thinking, unostentatious, and practical men, who are not rare in Parliament, will find their account in again and again drawing public attention both to the minor and introductory proposition of Dr. Bowring, and to that greater question of Taxation considered as a whole which looms in gloomy distinctness upon the political horizon. Neither individuals nor nations, however ample their resources, can systematically live beyond those resources, without coming some day to a crisis of the most disagreeable kind. No one doubts the ability of the British nation to pay all its liabilities, to supply all its wants, and to meet all emergencies, however great, provided the inevitable burden be placed only upon the shoulders of those classes that have the wealth to bear it. Great as is the amount of taxation, it is not so much the amount as the distribution that is found to be onerous. What the country wants is a complete and searching exposition of its fiscal state; a thorough examination of present abuses, anomalies, and exemptions; a certainty that whatever is levied is necessary; and a security that all that is levied is applied to the legitimate and efficient service of the public, without favouritism or extravagance. The "ignorant impatience of taxation," of which Lord Castlereagh complained as a vice in the people of this country, was by no means so ignorant as he alleged it to be. [illegible] was wrong both in the premises and in the conclusion. The public was willing to pay for services, and that defects in the management or collection added unnecessarily to the burden. For several years the cost of the public service in every department has exhibited a steady and alarming augmentation. The present unsettled condition of Europe affords but too unconfortable a prospect that our expenses must be still further increased, and our resources still farther drawn upon, if we would maintain ourselves in the position which we have been accustomed to hold. We have, therefore, every reason to set our house in order, and to calculate how far our strength will bear the additional sacrifices that may be demanded of it in days of greater trial than the present. On every ground, past, present, or future, the subject is one that must be manfully taken in hand, if we would escape the evil consequences of a financial embarrassment, which has remained unchecked, and almost unregarded, until it has become too great to be trifled with.

WHITEBAIT FISHING.

In the fourth Volume of our Journal (No. 105) we so fully detailed the economy of Whitebait—its natural history, peculiarities, and habits—that it requires to say but little as an accompaniment to Mr. Duncan's beautiful illustration of the History. The scene chosen by our Artist is Greenwich Reach, one of the few favoured localities in which this fish is taken. We quote a few details of the Fishi

Mr. Yarrell describes the net by which Whitebait are taken as by no means large, measuring only about 3 feet 6 inches; but the mesh of the bag, or bag end of the net, is very small. The boat is moored in the tideway, where the water is from 23 to 30 feet deep, and the net, with its wooden framework, is fixed to the side of the boat, so that the ingoing tide shall set into the bag, causing loose, is, from time to time, handed into the boat, the end untied, and its contents shaken out. The wooden frame forming the mouth of the net does not dip more than four feet below the surface of the water; and, contrary to the usual struggling fish, the only small fry taken with the Whitebait are stickleb[illegible] and the spotted or freckled croby. The farther the fishermen go down towards the mouth of the river, the sooner they begin to catch Whitebait after the flood tide has commenced. When fishing as high as Woolwich, the tide must have flowed from three to four hours, and the water become sensibly brackish to the taste, before the Whitebait will appear. They return down the river with the first of the ebb-tide; and various attempts to preserve them in well-boats in pure fresh water have uniformly failed

The Thames fishermen who live at and below Gravesend kn[illegible] the Whitebait perfectly, and catch them occasionally of considerable size in the small meshed nets used in the Upper and Lower Hope for taking shrimps, called t[illegible] inker-nets, which are like Walthamstow nets, only larger. The same fishers take the adult Whitebait frequently on the Kentish and Essex coasts throughout the winter.

We have seen it stated that Whitebait have lately been taken in the Bosphorus, at Constantinople

Since our paper appeared, Dr. Pereira has had an opportunity of seeing the mode of cooking the fish as practised at Lovegrove's, at Blackwall:—"I was informed," says the Doctor, "that the fish should be cooked within an hour after being caught, or they are sure to [illegible] together. Those which I saw cooked were contained in water in a pan, from which they were from time to time removed, as required, by a skimmer. They were then thrown on a stratum of flour contained in a large napkin, in which they were shaken until completely enveloped in flour. In this state they were placed in a colander, and all the superfluous flour removed by sifting. They were then brown into hot boiled lard, contained in a copper cauldron or stew vessel placed over a charcoal fire. A kind of ebullition immediately commenced, and in about two minutes they were removed by a tin skimmer, thrown into a colander to drain, and served up by piling them on a flat dish, the dish drainer in a dish. At table they are flavoured with cayenne and lemon-juice, and eaten with brown bread and butter: iced punch being the favourite accompanying beverage."—Treatise on Food and Diet.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The news this week from Paris makes known the recurrence once more of those alarms which have from time to time, since the commencement of the Revolution, brought out new the streets of the National Guards in arms and in attitude of defence. Paris, the heart of France, throbs convulsively with nervous excitement. The slightest move of the masses, thus evidencing the shattering effects of the shock which the body-politic sustained in giving birth to a Republic amidst the throes of Revolution.

At the close of last week and commencement of the present, much uneasiness was created in the capital on the score of the national workshops, in which several thousands of operatives are supported at the expense of the State, in a state little better than absolute idleness. The immediately exciting cause of the commotion was the removal of M. Emile Thomas from the directorship of those workshops; a step which was generally believed to be prefatory to the suppression of those establishments in November.

The following extract from the Moniteur explains the case:—

"Citizen Emile Thomas, director of the ateliers nationaux, has received a mission from the Government to go to Bordeaux. This mission caused some agitation among the workmen of the central bureau which is established in the Park of Monceaux. The Minister of Public Works went there on Saturday, and remained several hours endeavouring to restore order. In the evening the agitation appeared subsided, and the new director, Citizen Leon Lalande, engineer of the Ponts et Chaussées, was installed without any resistance. We hope that this agitation will be but momentary, for we cannot comprehend upon what grounds it can be kept up. The Government is animated with the most sincere and incontestible sympathy for the workmen, and of this they cannot entertain a doubt. If it thinks of suppressing the ateliers nationaux, which cannot, in fact, continue to subsist, it knows what consideration, what solicitude is due to men who, after having been a long time deprived of work, have found wages scarcely sufficient in the atelier which the state had opened for them. A special commission appointed by the Governmentis endeavouring, in concert with the executive power, to find fresh resources, and the Government does not intend to take any measures with regard to the ateliers nationaux before other means of employment, both numerous and certain, can be offered to the honest and laborious workmen. But if disorder should unfortunately increase, and culpable intrigues should prevail with and mislead the workmen, the Government will be constrained by the imperious duty to make use of the power confided to it, and by energetic measures ensure the complete execution of the orders it may think fit to issue."

On Sunday a placard was posted up calling upon the workmen of the ateliers nationaux to sign, during the day, a petition to the representatives of the people requesting them to demand explanations as to the removal of M. Emile Thomas, and protesting against the appointment of persons who had not elected by themselves. Public rumour, supported by a letter written by M. Thomas himself, shows that the mission, if it exist at all, is a forced one—that M. Thomas left Paris in the charge of gendarmes—that he was not allowed to communicate with his family or friends—and that he was ignorant of the mission upon which he was sent. Of this M. Emile Thomas, who has been thus decently banished from Paris, it may be as well to mention that he is no way connected with M. Clement Thomas, who is a Member of the National Assembly, and who has latterly been appointed General-in Chief of the National Guard

M. Emile Thomas is a very young man (not more than 25 years of age), who distinguished himself at the Ecole Centrale des Arts and des Metiers, where he took a rank a year or two ago as a first-class engineer. Having attracted the notice of some of the Provisional Government, he was appointed director of the ateliers nationaux before it was known that the position would become so important as it has since been. Large sums passed daily through this young man's hands, for the payment of the workmen; and if report be true, his peculations must, for some weeks past, have been to the tune of 25,000*f.* per day.

On Monday the excitement among ouvriers continuing, and an outbreak having been apprehended, the rappel was beaten in the morning, and the National Guards and troops of the line were called out. The whole day, a vast number of the National Guards and troops were under arms, some of whom were drawn up at the different public buildings, some in the squares and boulevards, and some in the neighbourhood of the park of Monceaux, but by far the largest portion were directed towards Vincennes, the object of this formidable display of military force was, as already mentioned, the excited state of the workpeople in the ateliers nationaux, who threatened to get up a disturbance if they were not allowed to get back their favourite director—le père des ouvriers, as they call him M. Emile Thomas. During the entire day the park of Monceaux was crowded with the workmen. At Vincennes, too, there was a large assemblage. In consequence of the non-arrival of the expected number of the two proposed days, that dinner would be provided for 150,000 of them in the wood of Vincennes, at the rate of five sous each.

Strong forces were assembled around the Chamber. The 3rd legion of the National Guard was stationed in the Tuileries, and strong detachments of the 10th and 11th legions were ebelloux in the court and garden of the former. Six pieces of artillery, nine squadrons of the line, and nine battalions of the Garde Mobile, completed the precautionary measures taken to assure the Assembly against any attacks, which, according to reports which were happily ill-founded, were to be made upon it by the insurgents. Seven battalions of the Garde Mobile, under the orders of General Tempoure, were posted in front of the Hôtel de Ville. The workmen, brought back to sentiments of peace and of submission by the arrival of the troops, were engaged during the day in framing delegates to proceed to the Assembly with a petition, but not accompanied by their comrades, which petition they placed in the hands of one of the representatives.

Fresh relative to the affairs of May 15 continued to be effected. Among the persons taken into custody is Lecambre, one of the persons who was dining with Blanqui in the Rue Taranne on the evening previous to the affair of Friday evening. Lecambre, who is a medical man, aged 33, was vice-president of Blanqui's club. He was arrested on Saturday night, and taken to the Conciergerie.

M. Achille Fould, in a pamphlet which he has written on the subject of the financial crisis in France, says that, under the Government of Louis Philippe, the expenditure amounted to 760,000,000*f.* per year, and since the revolution, and that, under the Republic Government, the daily deficit amounts to 2,500,000*f.*, or three times that under Louis Philippe. According to M. Fould's statement, should the deficit continue at the same rate for a year, it will leave a general deficit for the year of nearly thirty-seven millions sterling.

The Minister of the Finances on Monday distributed to the Finance Committee several important documents relative—

1. To the amount received by the Treasury of the extraordinary tax of 45 centimes imposed upon the public immediately after the Revolution. This return brings the receipt to the 10th of May. The amount of the tax, as appears by the books, is 191,258,480*f.* 30*c.*, and the amount received only 34,558,974*f.*

2. A statement of the receipts for the first four months of 1848, as compared with those of 1846 and 1847. The receipts for the first four months of 1848, compared with the same period of 1847, show a diminution of 33,333,000*f.*, of which 16,310,000*f.* for the months of January, February, and March, and 17,023,000*f.* for the months of April and May.

3. The comparative statement of the floating debt of the Treasury, from the 24th Feb. 1848, to the 24th of May of the same year, which shows a diminution of [illegible],000 francs.

4. To the development of the balance on the 22d May, 1848, in the evening. This balance is established by a general account of 49,430,584f. 70*c.*, of which 20,101,709*f.* 0*c.* in specie, and 29,328,875*f.* 70*c.* in paper, leaving a balance are on account of the Treasury, and 18,551,942*f.* 90*c.* on account of the Bank of France.

[illegible] of the savings banks on the 24th of February showed the following [illegible] Amount of deposits in Paris, 89,857,000*f.*; in the Departments, [illegible],000*f.*: total, 366,205,000*f.* On the 24th of May the total amount of the deposits in the savings banks was as follows:—Paris, 70,286,000*f.*; Departments, 238,484,000*f.* total, 328,785,000*f.* In this last sum is included the interest due to the depositors.

The amount exigible by the sinking fund to the 30th June is between 16,000,000*f.* and 18,000,000*f.*

The returns of the trade of France during the first four months of 1848 show a considerable diminution in the amount of the import duties, which only produced 26,786,968*f.* The proceeds during the corresponding period of 1846 had been 48,946,1[illegible]f., and in 1847, 43,730,967*f.* The duties collected during the month of April had fallen to 3,764,860*f.* In April, 1846, they had amounted to 12,[illegible],[illegible]f., and in 1847 to 10,[illegible]f.

The sub-committee of the Committee of Public Works, which is examining the question of the purchase of the railways, has decided that it will examine the Ministers of Finance and Public Works, and several persons who have written on the subject. The sub-committee has likewise disposed to admit the principle of the right of the state to purchase the railways

The bureaux of the Assembly have examined the projet de loi relative to divorce, but most of the members seem inclined to adjourn it. Many presentations, among others M. Dupin, have opposed the measure on political, religious, and moral grounds

The Moniteur publishes the following decree voted unanimously by the National Assembly on Thursday week

"Article 1. The National Assembly, profoundly affected by the sentiments which dictated to the Congress of the United States the decree of the 24th of April last, offers to the American people the thanks of the Republic and the expression of its fraternal friendship

"Article 2. The commission of the Executive Government is charged with the transmission of the present decree to the French Legation at Washington, with orders to present it to the American Government."

Fresh disturbances at Lyons are announced this week. The operatives employed in the nations. workshops at Miribel had imprisoned three magistrates, viz. the Attorney-General of the Republic, the Justice of the Peace, and the Deputy of Trevoux. The authorities had, in consequence, despatched a strong military force to their assistance.

Paris, Wednesday

Versailles gave us its last day's races on Sunday, or rather it allowed the race of Paris and Chantilly to take place on its course. They were rather sorry affairs, as French races generally are; but a sort of melancholy interest attached to them, from a sad foreboding that they will be the last we shall see in France. Horse-racing has no such firm hold in the affections of the people as to enable it [illegible] round against the interest excited by a terrible political convulsion [illegible] in which we are now suffering; and, besides, the men who are only able from their wealth to keep racing studs have already suffered so much in their fortunes, and, unfortunately, have too much cause to expect to suffer still more, that it would be folly to suppose that they will continue to indulge in such a costly piece of luxury. It will be a great pity, however, to see horse racing die away altogether, for not only have immense sums been spent over it by the Government and by spirited private individuals, but it has really done a great deal towards improving the breed of horses. But par ombre vous? Stern necessity has no respect to such trifles as these. The breaking up of the French turf indeed has already commenced, Baron N. de Rothschild having advertised his horses (one of the largest and best) for sale, and H. R. H. the Duke de Nemours having, of course, no alternative but to follow his example. The latter is unfortunately reduced to such a woful state of penury by the Revolution, that his agents declare they could not make his bidder run on the last day because they had not money to pay the entries!

Nearly 200 works (not including newspapers and periodicals) issued from the Paris press during the week ending last Saturday; and, with the exception of about half a dozen, all are on political matters and personages. The mass of works to which the Revolution has given birth is truly immense, and it seems impossible that one-half of them can find orders, especially when we bear in mind that Paris is now blest with about a hundred daily newspapers. Among the recent publications are several scandalous libels, such as pretended love-letters of the Duchess d'Orleans (as genuine as they are brazen-faced), the Prince de Joinville, and even—as it is audaciously said—from the Queen of England to the Duke de Nemours! Every intelligent man knows that these works are vile and malignant concoctions of atrocious falsehood; but, nevertheless, so depraved is the public taste, they obtain large sale.

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

SATURDAY.—The committee of the National Assembly on the constitution adopted two important resolutions in its sitting of this day; viz. It resolved that there should be a single President and a single Chamber, and that both should be elected by the universal suffrage of the nation. The committee is divided on the question as to the duration of the office of President and of the Chambers. Some of the members wish to fix both at three years, while others think that, for the tranquility of the country, the elected President and legislature should only take place once in four years. There are a great number of important points not yet taken into consideration; but still it is thought that the committee will be in a position to make its report to the Assembly by the end of June.

MONDAY.—M. Tasheran brought before the house the circumstances which had arisen under the relative to the disappearance of the director of the national ateliers. He said that the agitation which was observable everywhere in the streets required that some explanation should be given. He concluded by calling on the Minister of Public Works to afford some explanation of the circumstances relating to M. Thomas's disappearance.

M. Trelat, Minister of Public Works, declared that that gentleman had without the knowledge of persons employed in the office, given in his resignation. It appeared, however, that serious differences of opinion existed between the minister and the director, that the latter would never give satisfactory returns as to the number of persons employed, and, in fact, any details such as were necessary for reforming those government establishments; under such circumstances, the resignation of M. Thomas became necessary, and a commission of another character was ordered to him, such as would take him from Paris, where his presence might have been attended with serious inconvenience to himself. The minister drew a touching picture of his own tribulations, occasioned by these nations ateliers. When he had done, the Assembly passed to the order of the day.

The President announced that he had received a letter from Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, which he asked leave of the Assembly to read. The offer was received with cries of "No, no."

M. Delarochejaquelin said he thought it curious that after they had allowed letters to be read from the sons of Louis Philippe they should refuse a similar favour to one of the family of Napoleon.

A Member from his seat protested against hearing any more letters from princes either of the elder or younger branch, or Bonapartes family.

The President having consulted the Chamber, it was decided by a large majority that the letter should not be read. After this incident the Assembly dispersed into the different bureaux to proceed with the examination of the decree relative to the relations to be established between the National Assembly and the Executive Commission. The report recommended that the members of the Executive Commission should retire from taking part in the ordinary discussions of the National Assembly; but that they should, upon the call of 40 members of the Assembly, signified through the President, attend, and give whatever explanations should be required of them. It was added, that the Executive Commission should always have the right of being heard.

Article 1, which declares that, "although the members of the Executive Commission are to attend in general council at the sittings of the National Assembly, still they are always to attend when summoned by a message from the President, or when 40 members require it," was agreed to; as was—

Art. 2, which states that the Executive Committee should always have a right to be heard by the Assembly

Art. 3, relative to the measures of defence conceded to the President, led to considerable discussion, and the Assembly rose before coming to any decision

TUESDAY. At ten o'clock, when M. Senard, Vice-President, took the chair, the Committee of Public Works resumed its sittings for the purpose of preparing the exclusive right of the President to adopt measures for the protection of the Assembly had been referred, was still in deliberation, and engaged in examining those amendments.

In the afternoon, the discussion of the relations between the Assembly and the Executive Commission was resumed on the table. One of them was intended to fix the attributes of the Executive Power. It was to be charged with the execution of the laws; to command the land and sea forces of the Republic, to declare war, after the decision of the Assembly; the presence of four of its members was necessary to validate its deliberations; they were to be responsible and revocable, but their revocation should be pronounced by a majority of three-fifths of the National Assembly. The seat of the Government was to be held in the Luxembourg, and each member was to receive 5000 francs per month. The proposition, however, was not supported

Another member moved that the last paragraph of the Governor-General of Algeria to banish French citizens from its territory be abrogated.—Adopted.

Another member proposed the suppression of all majorats.—Adopted

A fifth proposed penal measures to compel the rich National Guards to equip their poorer brethren.—Adopted.

The discussion next opened on the project of decree relative to the National Workhouses.

M. bouverie, the first speaker, said that he had received many documents from Parisian manufacturers, demonstrating that labour was not wanting, and that hundreds besides their establishments were completely deserted; that many workmen, who earned 20*f.*, five, and six francs per day, had strolled themselves among the operatives of the national workhouses, where they only gained one franc fifty cents. per day; and, finally, that the operatives were placed under a certain intimidation, organised by leaders hostile to order and the Republic, for the purpose of preventing the operatives from resuming the former works in private establishments. He accordingly called on the Assembly to adopt prompt and energetic measures for the protection of the operatives anxious to return to their work.

M. Trelat, Minister of Public Works, drew a distinction between the good and bad workmen, and said that the latter were fortunately in a great minority. On the following day he would submit to the Assembly a series of bills to enable the Government to create labour in different points of the Republic, and thus afford employment to the real operatives.

The Assembly afterwards voted, without any opposition, the four articles of the bill.

M. Perrée next ascended the tribune, and, in the name of the Committee to which the bill regulating the relations between the executive and legislative powers had been referred, proposed the addition of the articles as follows:—"The military dispositions to be adopted out of the palace for the security of the Assembly exclusively belong to the Executive Council. Nevertheless, in cases of necessity and urgency, the President may exercise the rights vested in him by the 83rd and 84th articles of the regulations."

M. Dufaure concurred in the propriety of the superior rights of the President being exclusively mentioned in the police officer to whom he might transmit orders, in an extraordinary emergency, should not obey it.

M. Lamartine approved the suggestion of M. Dufaure, and the article thus amended was unanimously voted.

WEDNESDAY.—In reply to questions relative to the late sanguinary occurrences in Naples, M. Bastide, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, stated that, at his suggestion, the Executive Government had sent a Minister to Naples; that Admiral Baudin had been instructed to take measures to enforce the observance of the armistice concluded between the Governor of the citadel of Messina and the city; that General Statel General Pepe, the Minister to Switzerland, had applied to the Vorort for the recal of the Swiss troops in the Neapolitan service.

The President presented a formal demand from the law officers of the Republic for authorisation to proceed against four of the members of this high Assembly—M. Louis Blanc for high crimes and misdemeanours, in having connected with the attempt on the Nations. Assembly on the 15th of May

After some discussion, during which M. Louis Blanc defended himself from the imputed charge, the Assembly decided that the members should at once withdraw, and appoint a committee, composed of eighteen persons, to report to the Assembly on the requisition of the law officers of the Republic, and state whether there was good reason to grant the authorisation demanded.—Agreed to.

SPAIN.

An official announcement of the recognition by the Spanish Government of M. de Lesseps as Charge d'Affaires of the French Republic, and of his having entered upon the duties of his official functions on the 24th ult. Further arrests of persons implicated in the insurrections of the 26th of March and the 7th April had taken place.

Advices from the Spanish Minister at Lisbon officially announced to his Government the retreat of the Seville insurgents into Portugal. The run on the Bank of San Fernando still continued.

On the morning of the 24th ult., Lieutenant Colonel Bristowe, an Englishman, who has been residing in Madrid for the last five or six years, was arrested by the Commissary of Police at his house, and conveyed on foot through the streets of the capital to the prison of the Gelatara Politica. When the news of his arrest and threatened captivity was communicated to him, he very naturally inquired the motives or cause of such a proceeding. No information whatever was given, and he had no alternative but to obey. He was ultimately, after an incarceration of 40 hours, escorted to quit Madrid within a few hours, without his having any explanation vouchsafed to him by the authorities. He has a money claim on the Spanish, and this arbitrary treatment is supposed to have been caused by his lately pressing his claims upon the Government.

BELGIUM.

The Minister of Finance, M. Veydt, has resigned his office, assigned ad interim to M. Frere Piban, Minister of Public Works

His Majesty, on the 28th ult. gave a private and official audience to M. Belloeq, newly ted Minister Plenipotentiary from the French Republic to the Belgian Government. His Majesty received M. Belloeq with great distinction, General Dupont, aide-de-camp to his Majesty, having been sent with two Royal carriages to convey the Minister and his attendants to the palace.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY.—On the 24th ult. the voting on the question as to the union of Lombardy and Piedmont closed. The union was carried unanimously. A mixed Piedmontese and Lombard Government is to be formed, to reside at Milan

The combined fleet of the Sardinian, Venetian, and Neapolitan squadrons blockading Trieste, had demanded the surrender of all the American ships of war in that port within a delay of four-and-twenty hours, under threat of a bombardment

A report having got about that Austria, in consequence of some diplomatic negotiation, had agreed to yield Lombardy to Charles Albert, on condition of the Government of Venice being left to it, a deputation of the Government of Milan proceeded to the King at Somma Campagna, in order to obtain from him a reply reassuring them on that subject. The answer of the King was of the most satisfactory nature

From the seat of war we learn that considerable progress was made with the siege of Peschiera, but that it would occupy some days further to reduce that citrcss

The Neapolitan troops, 8000 strong, under General Pepe, have determined not to obey the orders of recal sent to them from Naples after the events of the 15th ult. On the night of the 17th, the corps d'armée of the Austrian General, Count Nugent, under the command of Lieutenant-Marshal Thurn, abandoned its position in the plain near Treviso, and marched towards Verona, to join the army of Marshal Radetski. Count Nugent has returned to Gerizia in consequence of indisposition.

NAPLES. The King had issued a proclamation justifying the measures of the 15th ult. on the ground of necessity On the 21st the city was tranquil. Strong patrols constantly traversed the streets. Martial law was still in force, and the red flag continued to float on the forts. The King rode out on the 20th, escorted by a strong military force. The French squadron was lying before Naples. It was understood that the King had consented to pay the 2,000,000. claimed by Admiral Baudin to indemnify the Frenchmen who suffered during the collision on the 15th, and his Majesty had withdrawn the Constitution and the decrees of amnesty, and recalled the Neapolitan deputies sent to co-operate with the Italian army, under the command of General Pepe.

During the fearful scenes of the 15th, three palaces were consumed. The archives in the Chancery of the Sardinian Consulate have been destroyed and dispersed, it is said by the express command of the Government. The Sardinian Consul had placed himself under the protection of France. The loss of life is incredible: 1777 corpses were interred on the 16th, including 450 soldier-

ROME.—The horrible tragedy which the reactionary principle produced in Naples had totally discomfited the projects of the obscurantists in Rome, and opened the eyes of the Pontiff as to what demoniacal doings would result from his listening to such counsellors as wish to distrust the national guard (embodying, as it does, all the substantial citizens), and to throw himself on the fanatic trasteverine, who would pillage and murder just in the style of their pious brethren, the lazzaroni. The upper chamber (House of Lords) has been finally constituted. It is composed of 66 members.

The formation of the Elective Assembly (Commons) commenced on the 16th, and has not been yet brought to a close. The electoral colleges of Rome constituted themselves into regular organisation on the 20th, and the presidents elected are all liberal men. There are six electoral wards, presided over respectively by Antonio Borgese, Jeanne Colonna, Galeotti, Mandolese, Scaramucci, and Odescalchi.

The Prime Minister, Count Mamiani, refused to keep his post, unless the Pope sent a formal protest to the King of Naples against the unchristian slaughter of 9000 of his subjects in cold blood, for maintenance of a principle (that of absolute power) now abolished in all Italy; and the Pope, in spite of the retrograde faction around him, has seen the necessity of doing so. Mamiani is a native of the same district as Pius IX., and a thoroughly upright and unflinching lover of liberty.

GERMAN STATES

FRANKFORT.—The debates in the German Parliament now sitting at Frankfort are interesting at present, as well from the men of recognised talent who takes the lead in the discussions, as from the great problem they have conjured up for solution—the unity of Germany, to which many of the States of the German Confederation are opposed, as to a measure that would reduce them to a lower condition than that of the Princes under Napoleon. The lead in this opposition has been taken by the three Kingdoms of Wurtemburg, Bavaria, and Hanover, to which may be added Prussia, which has established a Constitutional Assembly of her own. This latter fact led to a stormy debate on the 27th ult., when the order of the day was the motion of M. Mevissen, that the Prussian deputies returned for the two Assemblies at Frankfort and Berlin should be competent to sit at both. His protested against the exclusive right of the Frankfort Parliament to frame a Constitution for Germany. Ultimately, the following resolution was unanimously carried:—"The German National Assembly, in the quality of organ emanating from the will and the election of the German people, for the establishment of the unity and political liberty of Germany, declares, that all dispositions contained in the Constitutions of individual German States, which should not be in accordance with the general Constitution to be promulgated by it, shall only be valid when placed in accordance with the same; until then, however, they are to remain in force."

AUSTRIA

On the 24th ult. Counts Hoyos and Wilczek returned to Vienna, from their mission to his Majesty the Emperor at Innspruck. They brought a favourable report of the health of his Majesty, and were also the bearers of a letter to Baron Pillersdorff, and a manifesto of the Emperor to his subjects, stating the reason of his withdrawal from them

In a second letter to Baron Von Pillersdorff, in reply to the entreaty of the Ministers that his Majesty would return forthwith to Vienna, the Emperor says, "The city of Vienna has of late deserved so fearfully from the loyalty which it has always manifested towards me and my ancestors, that I felt compelled to quit it for a season; nor do I intend to return thither till such time as I shall be persuaded that it has returned to its former allegiance." The Emperor says, in conclusion, "That he feels persuaded that the Ministers will continue to transact all business which may be called for by the state of the empire or the welfare of the Throne; and that his Majesty's temporary change of residence to another part of his dominions can by no means be permitted to interrupt the regular course of business."

The numerous addresses that have been presented from almost every part of his Majesty's dominions speak in terms of the highest indignation of the excesses which took place in the capital on the 15th of May. Nearly all of them entreated his Majesty to transfer his capital and the National Diet from Vienna to some other city

At Innspruck, the residence of the Imperial Family had created great animation. On the evening of the 22nd the mountains round Innspruck were lighted up with bonfires as far as the eye could reach. The next morning a hundred Tyrolese peasants, in full costume, armed with rifles, marched in from the country, and offered themselves as a body guard to the Emperor, and they take the guards at the Government House, instead of the burgher guard.

The late Viceroy of Lombardy and the Archduke Rainer are with the Emperor; the well-known and highly-esteemed character of the Archduke gives rise to the opinion that he will be sent to Vienna to mediate in the present crisis.

At Prague, the capital of Bohemia, the National Committee has constituted itself into a Provisional Government, independent of the Cabinet of Vienna.

PRUSSIA.

The National Assembly have yet only entered upon preliminary business, such as the verification of the elections

Berlin is tranquil, though much suppressed dissatisfaction exists among the middle and the humbler classes, at what they conceived to be a reactionary disposition in the Government. M. Milde, of Breslau, had been elected President of the Assembly.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN

Matters are about to assume a pacific turn, owing to the diplomatic negotiations going on for some time past. The Prussian troops have already withdrawn from Holstein.

The following is understood to be the proposed basis of the peace between the Confederation and Denmark:—The German forces will retire across the Eider: the province of Schleswig will remain neutral; Rendsburg to become a fortress of the Confederation; Schleswig to be finally decided at the meeting of the Diet; and, according to the preponderance of race—the Danish and German populations to be separated, the German portion to become part of the Confederation, the Danish to revert to the Danish Crown.

SWITZERLAND.

M. Ochsenbein has publicly expressed his regret, in the Swiss Diet, at the desirable enormities laid to the charge of his fellow-countrymen in Naples.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE

Advices to the 1st of April mention that Sir H Smith had found it necessary to issue a manifesto, addressed to the emigrant colonists in the territory beyond the Orange river, warning them against the criminal designs of some misguided persons, and expressing his determination to maintain, by arms if necessary, the British sovereignty, and carry out the proclamations that have been already issued

The 25th of March was observed as a day of thanksgiving throughout the colony for the restoration of peace.

EGYPT

Advices to the 23d of May have been received from Alexandria Mehemet Ali continues in a very precarious state of health

Ibrahim Pacha had returned to Cairo from the Delta: his agents are at present engaged in making forcible levies for an increase in the army, and at the same time all those men that can possibly be spared were sent to work at the barrage of the Nile, or made to dig canals. The country people fly from the villages to avoid the Government agents, and many of them go into Syria: and the crops are allowed to waste in the fields for the want of hands to take her in.

Ibrahim Pacha seems intent upon exercising military rule in Alexandria. The fortifications are being manned with guns with all despatch, the gates of the town are regularly closed at the firing of the evening gun, and all those walking the streets at night without lanterns are taken up by the patrol and lodged in the guard-house.

An Austrian steamer left on the 22d or Trieste direct, with Indian despatches and passengers, and henceforward there is to be a regular monthly departure of Trieste, after the arrival of the Bombay mail

UNITED STATES.

Advices to the 17th ult. have been received during the week by the steam-ship Britannia, bringing an freight £3000 in specie.

No political matter of particular interest has occurred since the last mail. A bill has passed the United States House of Representatives, admitting the territory of Wisconsin into the Federal Union. It now lies before the Senate for their adoption. The debate on the Government bill, authorising armed intervention in Yucatan, yet continues. Mr. Calhoun is a vigorous opponent of the measure, and goes for the principle of non-interference. No vote has been come to upon the matter as yet

The steamer Cambria reached New York on the 14th, with accounts from this side to the 29th of April, conveying the result of the Parisian elections, with the accessary gained by the Moderate party. A slightly increased confidence has been the result, which has been further fostered by the more tangible fact of some houses in Paris and Havre, who refused accepting bills drawn upon them, when they were presented, having since put them on arriving at maturity

"Cotton manufactures at Rochester appear to be in a very prosperous condition, and no difficulty is experienced in finding a ready market for the goods. The two factories at Rochester have, within the month, sold 115,000 yards of sheetings, and several bales have also been sold at other establishments. Many of them are sent west, and some to Canada. The goods from these factories are in demand, and are found in any market, and we understand that orders are being received faster than the goods can be manufactured."

MEXICO

According to our advices this week, the United States commissioners bearing the Mexican treaty had arrived at the city of Mexico, and were busying themselves with the preparation of an imposing escort to conduct them in safety to Queretaro, where the fine appearance of the troops, in regard to clothes and equipment, was looked to as likely to produce a grand impression.

A quorum of Congress had not then been formed, and so desperate at one time was thought the chance of bringing one together, that the President had determined to exclude the states of New Leon, Chihuahua, and Yucatan, in estimating the representation, so that a small number may constitute a quorum. Subsequent events led him to believe that a quorum could be obtained, and the President re-considered his determination

The clergy of Mexico, fearing the inability of Pena y Pena to raise the forced loan of 150,000 dols. to 200,000 dols. in Queretaro, for the purpose of assembling Congress and supporting the Government, had resolved upon lending the money from the funds of the Church

General Scott and suite embarked for the United States on the 3rd ult.

New revolutionary movements appear to be brewing, got up at San Luis Potosi

On the night of the 11th of April the insurgents, under Trigomes, attempted to surprise the fortress of Guadaloupe, but were repulsed; on which Trigomes left to unite with Bustamente's division, at Dolores Hidalgo. The insurrection created much alarm, and was followed by similar outbreaks at Cerro Gordo. On the 9th a party from Dolores de la Fuente attacked a band of revolters near Terre Nueva, in San Luis, killed eight or nine of them, wounded several, and took 19 prisoners.

CENTRAL AMERICA

A truly deplorable picture is presented by this week's mail of the extremities the white population in Yucatan have been brought to by the Indians. The Indians have succeeded in getting possession of Bacalar, a town in the southeast of Yucatan. They entered the city by way of the mountains, a part that was not fortified, and where no fears were entertained of their approach. On gaining admittance they commenced acting fire to all buildings, public and private, and soon had the entire city in ruins. The men of the town, to the number of four to five hundred, retired to the forts. The women and children with hardly any clothing, and no money or food, are flying in all directions—some to the bush, some to the river, and many to the neighbouring territories.

Her Majesty's superintendent at Belize has despatched two vessels, the Alice and Rinaldo, to bring away any who might wish to avail themselves of the opportunity.

WEST INDIES

ST. DOMINGO. Accounts from the Island state that the people throughout the island were arming themselves against the Government. An army was collecting at Marigoone, which was to join another army of insurgents numbering 2000 men, from Azuard, from Port-au-Prince. After the junction it was their purpose immediately to attack the Government troops. The people appeared to be very much exasperated against the President.

On the day subsequent to the departure of the packet from Marigoone, the weather being calm, and being some forty miles distant from Port-au-Prince, during the whole day a firing of heavy guns was heard in that direction, as if the two armies were engaged in battle near Port-au-Prince.

INDIA

Advices in anticipation of the overland mail have been received this week. The dates of the latest advices by this arrival are, Calcutta, April the 19th; Delhi, April 21st; Bombay, May 1st; Alexandria, May 22nd; and Malta, May 28th

The news by this arrival is devoid of political interest Perfect tranquility reigned throughout the British settlements and the native domains. No symptoms of disaffection manifested themselves in any part of our possessions, and, in the absence of exciting news at home, the attention of the Indian public was entirely absorbed by the events which have recently occurred in Europe.

From Bombay we learn that the new Governor of that Presidency, Lord Falkland, had arrived, and that Mr. Cleeg had resigned over to the elder branch of the Bourbons, by the law of the 10th of April, 1839, is equally interdicted to Louis Philippe and his family.

Sir Henry Pottinger had arrived at Madras, and assumed the reins of Government in that Presidency.

The intelligence from Calcutta refers almost exclusively to the Union Bank The last occurrence connected with that unfortunate concern was an attempt made by a wealthy native shareholder to shift his responsibility to other shoulders. Little had as yet been done towards a settlement of the affairs of the Bank.

With respect to the dominions of the Rajah of Satrara, it is much doubted whether they will be annexed to the British possessions or not. The late Rajah it seems asserted on his death-bed the right of nominating his successor, and chose a relation of the Royal line as the new Rajah. This proceeding had not met with the sanction of the British Government, the young Prince had not been proclaimed, and in the meantime the old Ministers continued to carry on the Government. The affairs of the Kaun are in their normal state of confusion, and no interruption had taken place in the cordial hatred which exists between that Prince and his Prime Minister

The campaign in Goomsoor had ended in the complete submission of the hill chiefs; the friends of Chokra Bissye had forsaken him, and it was reported that he had given himself up to Colonel Ousley

The warm season had set in all over India, and the heat was represented, in several places, as terrific. This rise in the temperature had not, however, been attended with any increase of mortality.

CHARTIST DEMONSTRATIONS

On Monday evening a body of some hundreds of men marched in a sort of irregular procession from the eastern to the western parts of the metropolis; but having been prevented holding a meeting at Charing-cross by the police, they dispersed without any breach of the peace. They were said to be Chartists and Repealers, and that their object was a demonstration of sympathy with John Mitchell, who was last week transported from Dublin. Their intentions were, however, very imperfectly known to the public at large, and most probably to themselves.

On Wednesday evening a similar gathering, having however more of the rabble in its element, took place on Clerkenwell-green; but owing to the admirable arrangements of the police they were quickly dispersed.

In Manchester, Stockport, Leeds, Bradford, Oldham, and other towns in the manufacturing districts, there were similarly abortive attempts at disturbance during the week; but nothing worth particular notice occurred.

ILLEGAL PROCESSIONS. The following notice has been issued by the police authorities:—"CAUTION.—Whereas meetings have recently been held of large numbers of persons in different parts of this year the metropolis; and whereas on Monday night last (the 29th instant) persons who had been present at several of such meetings afterwards assembled together and walked in large numbers in procession through some of the principal streets of the metropolis, under circumstances calculated to excite terror and alarm; and whereas information has been received that such persons have declared their intention of again assembling and proceeding in the same manner through the streets of the metropolis; and whereas the peaceable subjects of her Majesty are thereby alarmed, and the public peace is thereby endangered: Notice is hereby given, that such assemblages and processions are illegal, and will not be allowed; and all ill-disposed persons are hereby cautioned to abstain from attending, being present at such meetings, or taking any part in such assemblages or processions. And notice is further given, that all necessary measures will be adopted to prevent and disperse assemblages taking place, and effectually to protect the public peace, and to suppress any outrage at the disturbance thereof. C. ROWAN, R. MAYNE, Commissioners of Police of the Metropolis.—Tuesday, May 30, 1848, Metropolitan Police-office, Whitehall-place."

SUPPRESSION OF GAMING AT THE FORTHCOMING ASCOT RACES.—The most stringent regulations have been adopted by the stewards to prevent gambling of any description during the forthcoming races at Ascot. With reference to the betting booths, the stewards have determined that "no gaming tables of any description will be permitted in or at the back of any booth. Any person departing from this rule will not be allowed to erect a stand or booth at any future time on Ascot-heath." With respect also to the setting of the ground for stabling, the stewards have resolved that "no gaming tables of any description will be permitted on any ground taken for stables, or in the tents that are permitted to be erected by the side of the stables." Throwing at snuff-boxes has also thus been interdicted by order of the stewards: "Any person cutting holes in the turf for the sticks on which the snuff-boxes, &c., are placed, will be prosecuted."

THE REVOLUTION IN NAPLES.

REVOLUTION IN NAPLES.—BARRICADE IN THE TOLEDO, JUST BEFORE THE ATTACK, MAY 15, 1848.

We have received from our Correspondents in Naples the annexed Sketches and Narrative of the Insurrection, which we noticed in the late edition of our Journal of last week.

NAPLES, May 15.

We are in the midst of a frightful revolution—a conflict as bloody as any which has occurred during the late European struggles for liberty. Before I attempt to narrate the state of the city, I must give in a few words the causes which immediately led to the dreadful conflict here, still going on from the firing of muskets in Toledo, the principal street of Naples.

When Ferdinand the Second granted the Constitution in January, it was proposed that the people should be represented by a House of Peers and a House of Commons; the King reserving a right to name or approve of fifty members of the former, which, in conjunction with other clauses, virtually gave his Majesty more power than was deemed advisable to concentrate in the Monarch. A large number of Neapolitans, and especially the provinces of Calabria, having little faith in Ferdinand's sincerity, found their suspicions confirmed by his policy with regard to Sicily; more especially when the question of sending troops to Lombardy was mooted, and in fact demanded by the people. The King had not declared war, and there was a degree of indecision in all public acts, which led to mistrust and disappointment. The elections had taken place - the Commons had been returned, but no Peers had been elected by the people; in most instances, the forms requesting the nomination of that body were filled up with a request that the Commons should decide if it were advisable that a house of such a nature should have any voice in the Legislature. On the 15th (this day) the houses were to meet. No Peers had been named up to the 13th, but on the 14th a Proclamation appeared (emanating from the King, since the Ministers had nearly all resigned), nominating fifty members for the House of Peers. Immediately on the publication of this document, the Commons met privately, and agreed to address the National Guard on this encroachment of Royal authority, as it was deemed.

Both houses were to meet and be sworn in on the 15th at the Church of St. Lorenzo, according to a programme of that ceremony, which appeared simultaneously with the nomination of the Peers. The National Guard, numbering 15,000, objected, in conjunction with the Commons, and the result was alike prompt and significant. On the evening of the 14th, about midnight, the National Guard was called to arms, and by six o'clock the following morning barricades were thrown up in Toledo, and other smaller streets. An awful pause hung over the city—it was clear the King must give way, or trust to the fidelity of the royal troops, who were now all called out, and regarding, without interruption, the preparation for a conflict. Early in the morning, I strolled through the city with Mr. C. Martin, to whose pencil we are indebted for the accompanying sketches. The barricades were formed by nine o'clock, composed of furniture, carriages, and every conceivable article of domestic use (after the Paris fashion), with, however, fewer stones, owing to the difficulty of taking up the lava blocks. The most intense excitement prevailed, but there was no shooting. The scene was oppressive and awful! Messages were sent from the royal palace to the National Guard, whilst the troops, concentrated chiefly round the royal dwelling, waited to attack, and the National Guard to receive their advance. Each barricade was guarded, and you saw the red banded cap and glittering bayonet of the civilian soldier peeping above the walls of furniture, ready for action. Those who witnessed this scene will never forget its terrible anxiety!

At eleven o'clock the castle of St. Elmo, which commands the town, fired three signal guns, and then the firing of musketry broke the solemn silence, accompanied with the roar of artillery. The Swiss were attacking the barricade which crossed the street Toledo. The fire was returned; and suddenly every balcony was crowded by National Guards, who fired on the advancing troops. The conflict had commenced with savage earnestness on both sides. As we returned by way of the Royal Palace, we found the large open space crowded with troops, spectators of the scene.

It was a bright hot day; and the platoon firing broke crisply on our ears, mingled with the irregular discharge of the National Guard. A French fleet was quietly anchored in the bay; and the placid beauty of the surrounding scenery seemed to contrast strangely with the tumult of the city.

Those only who have been present in a city during an awful domestic conflict like this, can imagine the anxiety and excitement which prevails at such a moment. Groups of lazzaroni were flying to and fro, spreading various reports, and small detachments of cavalry were hurrying in every direction. It was impossible to obtain any correct information as to the success of either conflicting party, whilst the discharge of musketry told the struggle was going on with increasing fury.

Thus, hour after hour rolled on slowly; the principal scene of action still confined to the Toledo, and about the theatre San Carlo. It was four o'clock before the firing had ceased, the Swiss infantry, in conjunction with the Royal guards, having possessed themselves of Toledo at a terrible cost. Of course, there are various reports as to the number—between killed and wounded, all agree there could not be less than 300. It would be still more difficult to estimate the loss on the side of the National Guards, as they fought chiefly from the houses. Some 300 prisoners have fallen into the hands of the Royal forces, and are already on board a war steamer.

It is now eight o'clock, P.M. What a frightful scene do the streets present! The Swiss are entering the houses and murdering the people. I have been assured by an eye-witness that he saw an infant thrown from the balcony. The lazzaroni are crying, "Viva il Re! Viva Ferdinando!" Under my own windows, money is being distributed to the mob, who are invited to repair to Toledo and plunder the houses, directed by the Royal troops, now, I hear, marking each palace from whence the fire proceeded. This permission to rob is an old trick of the Neapolitan Bourbons; the same scene was enacted in 1799. The ignorant mob of lazzaroni is always at the King's command when he gives the word to plunder. Many of these poor debased wretches have long expected this day; and, no doubt, have been promised the privilege of robbing the middle classes, they took part with the King and Royal troops.

I hear the troops have fired one or two palaces. The lazzaroni are carrying their stolen goods by my house; they are met by women shouting "Viva il Re!" To-night all is quiet.

Tuesday, 16th.—I hear firing towards Toledo. Many respectable people are flying from the city with small bundles. The middle classes are in the hands of the Royal troops and the lazzaroni.

At twelve o'clock to-day all the National and Civic Guards are ordered to present themselves, and give up their arms. The Swiss occupy Toledo, where several palaces have been burnt; in fact, that part of Naples presents a scene of ruin deplorable to behold. It is said that every palace of Toledo is cleared of furniture by the lazzaroni, some 6000 of whom are now before the King's palace congratulating his Majesty.

Our artist has represented the barricade in the Toledo; and a portrait of one of the lazzaroni, engaged in his work of plunder.

LAZZARONE.—"VIVA IL RE!"

THE FRENCH IN ALGERIA. In a report just published by Dr. Boudin, and presented by him to the Académie de Medicine, to prove that the French are not likely to get acclimated in Algeria, he states, that in examining the returns of the mortality among the population of France, where the number of old men is considerable, it will be found that the mean proportion of deaths per 1000 individuals annually. In Algeria the return is for the city, 36·4 per 1000; in habitants. Thus the most favourable return of all. In the other chief towns the mortality ranges progressively, up to 66·2 per 1000 at Blidah; and finally, the mortality at El Affroun reaches the enormous amount of 141·4 upon 1000 inhabitants. Facts may be stated in the following manner: The expenses since occupation of the country by the French amount to £46,000,000 sterling, more than 100,000 men killed, and an annual expense of £4,000,000 sterling; no colonisation; the Arabs refractory to friendly intercourse; the productions of the soil insufficient for the maintenance of the European population; the year's work reduced to 11 months, through disease; the mortality of the military eight times the amount of civilians of the same age in France; the mortality of the civil European population double that of the same class in France, and everywhere exceeding the number of births; and, finally, an increase of the mortality among Europeans in proportion as they make a longer stay in Algeria.

MR. COBDEN AND ITALY. The following letter from Mr. Cobden is published in the Italia del Popolo:—"London, May 5.—I am sorry to see it generally believed in Italy that our Government has taken a hostile attitude towards that country. You may be certain that the English people at least entertain the most cordial sentiments towards Italians, and sympathise with them in their struggle against Austria. The inference drawn from the language of our Minister in Turin is probably exaggerated. He interfered to dissuade the Piedmontese from attacking Austria, but at England interfered to prevent the three Powers from absorbing Cracow, and for the same reason, that England, having been party to organisation or disorganisation of Europe in 1814 and 1815, thought it necessary to protest against any territorial change. The English Government could scarcely do otherwise than protest; but I am certain it will not go beyond this protest, nor give support to Austria against Italian interests. Public opinion in England runs very strong against all intervention in the affairs of foreign countries. And, although our Government rests under the dominion of the aristocracy, the English people have sufficient power to prevent any Minister from rushing into hostilities to preserve the territorial statu quo of Europe. Therefore, whatever be the language of the journals, do not allow yourself to be carried away by the idea that English power can be employed against Italian. Our sympathies are with you, and we hope to see you freed from Austrian tyranny, and to behold Italy once more an example to the world of greatness and liberty, science and civilisation.—R. COBDEN."

PUBLIC OFFICES AND ESTABLISHMENTS. A return obtained by Mr Hume, M.P., shows that the actual net increase in the number of appointments, and the amount of salaries in all public offices and departments, since the passing of the Act 4th and 5th Wm. IV., c. 24, is 6863 as regards the number of persons, £184,368 as regards the salaries, and £17,586 as regards the emoluments; 7069 persons at salaries amounting to £260,000, have been added to the establishment of the Post-office within the period of this account, for the purpose of affording increased facilities and accommodation to the public in the receipt and delivery of letters, &c. The account, exclusive of the Post-office, would exhibit a diminution of 197 persons, and about £58,000 per annum in salaries and emoluments.

THE MULREADY EXHIBITION, AT THE SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The Queen and Prince Albert had intended to visit the exhibition of the Mulready pictures, &c., before the opening on the 5th, but the death of the Princess Sophia occasioned the postponement of the royal visit. The only similar exhibition to the present was one of Wilkie's works, some forty years ago. Twenty-nine of Wilkie's works were then exhibited; but on the present occasion we hear there will be upwards of two hundred pictures, drawings, and sketches, by Mulready.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL, PORTUGAL-STREET, LINCOLN'S-INN-FIELDS.—On Sunday morning last the cause of this most excellent charitable institution was advocated by the Rev. J. W. Hutchin, M.A., from the pulpit of Brunswick Chapel, Upper Berkeley-street. The peculiar claims of the charity, from its purposes, situation, and attainments, upon the compassion and sympathy of the benevolent having been most eloquently dwelt upon by the reverend gentleman, a collection was made at the conclusion to the amount of £40 19s. 4d. From the books of the hospital it appears that the number of patients applying for, and receiving the benefits of the institution, amount in each year to nearly 20,000; and of this number more than three-fourths are received without any letter of recommendation whatever, the condition and circumstances of the poor objects being the only passport looked for.

BOATS OF H. M. S. "PRESIDENT" AND "EURYDICE" ATTACKING AN ARAB STOCKADE, IN THE ANGOSHA RIVER, MOZAMBIQUE.

BRITISH ATTACK ON ARAB PIRATES, AT MOZAMBIQUE.

We have been favoured, by a Correspondent at Cape Station, with the accompanying Sketch and details of a Skirmish that took place in the River Angosha, Mozambique. The particulars are as follow:—

The President (frigate), bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Dacres; Eurydice, Captain Anson; and the Portuguese brig of war, Juan de Castro, with a small schooner, anchored off the river Angosha, on the 21st of November, and, on the following day, despatched their boats, under the command of Captain Anson, with [illegible] for the purpose of [illegible] a formidable set of piratical Arabs, numbering about 7000, who had hitherto set all Portuguese authority at defiance, in persisting in carrying on the illegal traffic of slaves, shipping thousands of these wretched beings off to the Brazils.

On the expedition approaching the settlements of these people, they were fired upon from an extensive stockade and mangrove-tress, with round shot and musketry. This was instantly returned from our boats' guns and marines. A warm contest ensued for an hour and a half, when their stockade was annihilated, and the fire from the trees completely silenced—a vast number of the enemy being killed and wounded. The loss on our part was comparatively trifling. The whole affair had a striking effect; it being moonlight, with hardly a breath of wind, and the water like glass.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

TRETHEVEY STONE, CORNWALL.

THE granite rocks of Cornwall, it is well known, present, in different places, an appearance so singular, that they have been mistaken for the efforts of human art in its earliest and rudest stage. It is, however questionable whether the group above represented (from a recent sketch by John Moore West) be one of these very interesting natural curiosities. It is situated about one mile from St. Cleer Church Town, on the road to the Caradoc Mines, on a barrow in a field of the tenement called Trethevey. The pile is of granite, and consists of six upright stones; and covering them, is one large slab in an inclined position. This impost measures 16 feet in length, and 10 feet in breadth, and averages 14 inches in thickness. This upper or covering stone has in it a hole, which is believed to have been used for a flag-pole, or a chain to drag the stone by; but these are merely conjectures.

The several stones of which this pile consists are thought to have been brought some miles from whence they now stand, as there are none of the same kind found near the spot. Our Correspondent states that no tradition exists as to the time of the setting up of the Trethevey Stone, but he considers its name determines it to be a work of the ancient Britons, and its object sepulchral; the term Trewedi (Treweth,) signifying, in the British language, the place of the graves. The common belief of the superstitious in the neighbourhood is, that the stone was set up by a giant, and the hole in the covering stone was made by the giant's thumb in lifting it to its present position!

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER V.—THE OLD BOROUGH OF SOUTHWARK.

LEAVING Smithfield, and the crowded City thoroughfares, we will pass over the bridge, and peep at the old Borough of Southwark. But, before crossing the river, we must glance at the Old London-bridge, covered with houses, that spanned across the Thames about a century ago; and which, with much patching and repairing, had endured the wear and tear of Time, with all the assaults of wind, water, war, and fire, for above six hundred years. Even until within the last quarter of a century, the wheels of the great water-works, first erected by Peter the Dutchman, continued to moan and groan, and splash and dash, just as they had done for between two and three hundred years—those ever-moving water-works seemed like the living spirit of the old bridge; and when they stopped, the ancient fabric, which had so long tottered to its crazy foundations, was soon swept away and numbered amongst the things that have been. Narrow, dark, and dangerous, was the gloomy old street, that, hung between the water and the sky, went stretching across the broad bosom of the Thames. Great darksome arches spanned overhead everyway, and if you looked up in the twilight of those past days, you saw grinning above you, and looking down from the battlements, the ghastly and grey heads of murdered men, which were stuck up on stakes, and left to bleach in the sun, wind, rain, and darkness, day after day, and night after night. When you looked down, you still seemed to see them, as if they moved side by side with you, past the windows of the old chapel—underneath the low-browed arches—beside the ancient shops; and ever below went the mad waters, gibbering, and groaning, and hissing; and, in the deep midnight, when the old piers echoed back every footfall, you almost fancied that all those bodiless heads had leaped off the battlements, and, with their gory locks streaming out, were at your heels, bullying and shrieking above and below the bridge, and "mopping and mowing" from every over-hanging gabel and grim corbel you hurried under.

When the wind was high, it ever went singing through those old houses and that silent chapel all night long; and the crazy old water-works sent out a thousand strange supernatural sounds; while all the ricketty casements chattered again like a thousand teeth that have no power over the bitter blast which sets them in motion. Then, too, the old swing-signs, which the least wind shook, swung and ground upon their rusty hinges, one against the other, and what with the creaking of the signs, the whistling and moaning of the wind, that went booming, with a hollow and unearthly sound under and over the vaulted street, minded with the rush of the waters, and the cries for help from those beneath, who had run foul against the jutting piers, you wonder how any one could ever get a wink of sleep in those high old houses. That ancient bridge was the only highway into Kent and Surrey, and many a time had it been crossed by the conqueror and the conquered; one day a kingly procession, the next a train of prisoners in chains; now the mob assembled to gaze upon a head on the gate, the to hail the entrance of Royalty. And sometimes, the drawbridge near the centre arch was raised, and the poor old Borough of Southwark left to the mercy of the rebels, while the citizens remained safe, with the deep river yawning and rolling through the open pier, which the uplifted drawbridge rendered impassable.

The first object that still strikes the eye when we have passed over into the Borough is the beautiful old church founded by a Saxon maiden called Mary of the Ferry, which in time was corrupted into Mary Overy, and is now called St. Saviour's. No young poet need wish for a finer subject to try his hand on than this beautiful, half holy old legend of the Ferryman's Daughter, who, day after day, winter and summer, was seen with her quaint, old-fashioned Saxon boat ready to row passengers from the Borough to the City, and back again to the landing-place where the Ferry-house had stood centuries before a bridge united the two shores. Pleasant to her ear must have been the lapping of the waves as they washed her little freehold, and fell with a dreamy murmuring upon her ear, while she sat revolving in her mind how she should begin to build a house for the reception of a few poor and pious sisters, in which they might live in content and comfort, and holy quiet; and when she was no more, there pray for the soul of Mary of the Ferry. And thus was the present St. Saviour's first founded. In this ancient cathedral-like church, Gower, the contemporary of Chaucer lies buried; his beautiful monument still exists Our own immortal Shakespere was no doubt a mourner here two hundred years ago, on the last day of December, 1607, when he attended the funeral of his brother Edmund in the forenoon of that day. Perhaps the funeral took place earlier, on account of the merry-making which our forefathers held at the close of the old year, and kept up until the new year had grown far into the day. And this was the cause why Edmund Shakespere was buried in the church "with a forenoone knell of the great bell." Edmund was himself a player, and we can easily conjure up the images of those who witnessed his interment. But were we to dwell upon the solemn memories which float around this hoary pile, we should never get further into the Old Borough in this article. Fletcher is also buried here, and Massenger, not in a gloomy corner amid a mass of misshapen and melancholy graves, as was supposed; he is buried "within the church."

But the spot to which the lover of poetry still directs his steps, is to the Tabard—Chaucer's old inn, still standing on the very spot, if not the identical building itself, from which the father of English poetry set out, when he accompanied his merry Pilgrims to Canterbury. The portion of this old hostelry, still remaining, dates much further back than the period of Charles the Second—a proof that it escaped the terrible fire which raged in Southwark in the year 1676. The very style of the building needs not a second glance to proclaim its antiquity; it is, beyond doubt, the very inn which the old chronicler Stowe mentions by the name of the "Tabard," and which he himself had seen in 1598, and called the "most ancient of the many fair inns in Southwark for receipt of travellers." The old sign of the Tabard formerly hung swinging and creaking across the road, and there were then no houses in front to shut it in, as now; it lay openly and temptingly, as when Chaucer's host, the merry "Harry Baily," stepped out in the front in the sunny mornings of spring and Summer, to see what the Old Kent and Newington roads were promising him, and what sort of customers were riding up.

"THE FOUR SWANS" INN-YARD BISHOPSGATE-STREET WITHIN.

Even now there is something venerable in the old weather-beaten and iron-bound posts which prop up its comparatively modern gateway: they tell of the grazing and grinding of thousands of old wheels, while the stones are worn away with the tramping of many a worn-out steed.

Merry doings were there in that old inn yard, on an April morning, our hundred and fifty years ago, for Harry Baily, the host, was

The early cock
That gathered them together in a flock.

And you might then have seen the Wife of Bath, leaning aside, and listening as she sat in her saddle, for she could not hear very well, as she tells us Jankin, her fifth husband, had given her such a blow,

For that she on a fat of his book a leaf
That of the stroke her ear was always deaf

Let those who have never read Chaucer, and who wish to become acquainted with the most quaint and beautiful painting of character which poetry ever produced, only read the Prologue to his Canterbury Tales; it scarcely occupies more than twenty moderate pages of print. If, after reading these, they are not tempted to proceed further, it will be because "they have no poetry in their mak." In no work can we find such a faithful description of the dress, manners, customs, and language of our forefathers, as in the pages of Geoffrey Chaucer.

What merry masques have been played in that old open inn-yard—what beautiful forms have leant over that antique and pilfered gallery. Oh! for a volume filled with the names of the noble dames who have slept under that high, sloping roof—who have popt through that ancient lattice-work at the end of the wooden gallery. What saddling and mounting in "hot haste" must there have been in former times at the doors of those lofty stables! What a tramping of feet on those spacious landing-places! What a staggering of jolly old Englishmen, who, when in their cups, went up that wide, old-fashioned staircase, which seems to mock the modern bed-rooms that now occupy the space of the "wide chambers" described by Chaucer. The house is now a labyrinth of small rooms gained by low doorways, and winding passages that almost lead "to nothing."

Nor is the "Talbot," as it is now called, the only ancient inn in the Borough. There are others which contain their surrounding galleries, and spacious yards open to the sky. Some years ago we glanced at other portions of this ancient Borough—especially that part called the Old Mint. This is now fast disappearing; many of the houses that escaped the fire in 1676 have of late been pulled down. The following is a description which we wrote seven years ago, after visiting the remains of this dilapidated neighbourhood:—Stretching from St. George's Church, in the Borough, into the high road which leads to the east-iron bridge of Southwark, are no end of narrow courts, winding alleys, and ruined houses, which a bold-hearted man would hesitate to thread after dusk. Here stand numbers of houses which are unroofed and uninhabited. Years ago they were doomed to be pulled down, and it was resolved that a wide, open street should be built upon the space they still occupy—years may still roll away before they are removed. There is no place like this in the suburbs of London—no spot that looks so murderous, so melancholy, and so miserable. Many of these houses, beside being old, are very large and lofty. Many of these courts stand just as they did when Cromwell sent out his spies to hunt up and slay the Cavaliers—just as they again were hunted in return, after the Restoration, by the Royalists, who threaded their intricacies, with sword and pistol in hand, in search of the fallen Roundheads. There is a smell of past ages about these ancient courts, like that which arises from decay—a mothy closeness—as if the old winds which blew through them in the times of the Civil Wars had become stagnant, and all old things had fallen and died just as they were blown together, and left to perish.

So it is now; the timber of these old houses looks bleached and dead, and the very brick-work seems never to have been new. In them you find wide, hollow-sounding, decayed staircases, that lead into great ruinous rooms, whose echoes are awakened only by the shrieking and running of large black-eyed rats, which eat through the solid doors, through the wainscot, and live and die without being startled by a human voice. From the Southwark-bridge Road you may see the roofs of many of those great desolate houses; they are broken and open, and long summer's oaken rafters are exposed to the summer sun and the snow of winter. Some of the lower floors are still inhabited; and at the ends of those courts you will see standing, on a fine day, such characters as you will meet with no where beside in the neighbourhood of London. Their very dress is peculiar; and they frequent the darkest and hidden public-houses which abound in these close alleys; places where the gas is burning all day long. Excepting the courts behind Long-lane, in Smithfield, we know no spot about London like this, which yet fronts St. George's Church, in the Borough.

Southwark, as all remember who are at all acquainted with history, beside containing Shakspere's Theatre, at Bank-side, was, in former days, famous for its Bear-garden; which, we fear, was often more crowded than the spot where the author of "Hamlet" so frequently played.

What a different feature does the Southwark entrance to London Bridge present, to what it did only a few brief years ago. Every few minutes omnibuses are now thundering to and from the railway terminus; while passengers think no more of journeying to Brighton and back, and remaining eight or ten hours there, on a long summer's day, than they formerly did of travelling to Greenwich; for it took the old slow stage-wagons so long to traverse the five miles to the latter, as our iron-footed and fire-fed steed can with ease drag the five hundred passengers at his heels, and land them within sight of the wide refreshing sea.

Were it possible to revive again the forms of those old Canterbury Pilgrims; and, instead of sending them out of the Tabard-inn like dogs, to place them in an express train, then start them off with all the quaint queer notions which haunted their living brains, what strange conclusions they would come to. Even the "perfect knight," who had fought in "fifteen battles," and seen many a strange sight in heathen lands, would, with all his wisdom, think he had at last fallen into the hands of the evil one, while gentle Chaucer would renounce his disbelief in fairy lore, and be ready to admit that the land was now filled with greater wonders than

In old days of the King Arthur,
Of which the Britons speak great wonder,
When all a land was filled full of faery—
The Elf-Queen, with her jolly company,
That danced full oft in many a green mead.
Wife of Bath's Tale.

What a change! to look up the ascent which led to that old London-bridge, with its Traitors'-gate and ghastly heads grinning above the vaulted gateway, and the scene that now meets the eye? Living heads piled high on moving omnibuses, and journeying in every direction, for twopenny or threepenny fares; steamboats passing from east to west, and carrying passengers for one halfpenny per head; such changes has the old square tower of St. Saviour's overlooked; such things has the wonder-working hand of man accomplished. And yet the world is believed by many to be still in its infancy; that two more centuries will see mankind as far advanced and improved as the last two have placed us in the land of our forefathers. That the living brains, at present day will then be as great a matter of curiosity to some future antiquary as old London-bridge and the ancient borough of Southwark is to us; that others will follow and exclaim as we do now,

The race of yore,
Who danced our infancy upon their knee,
And told our marvelling boyhood legends store
Of their strange ventures happ'd by land or sea,
How are they blotted from the things that be!—Scott.

As the "Tabard" has been often engraved, our Artist has preferred for an illustration of an old London inn—the "Four Swans," in Bishopsgate-street Within, the galleried yard of which remains almost entire.)

confess that they have been deceived by their possibly well-meaning, but in reality very injurious friends, the Communists. If not, there are still many difficulties and perils before the Assembly and the Government—difficulties which it will require great skill and honesty of purpose to surmount, and perils which, under the most favourable circumstances, must retard the consolidation of the newly-acquired liberties of the French Republic.

The Assembly, following out the line of conduct they had chalked out for their abandonment of the national workshops, has, it appears, refused, or is about to refuse, its sanction to the project of the late Provisional Government, for taking possession of the railways. A deputation of railway directors which had an interview with the Committee charged with the consideration of the subject, has reported its belief, founded upon the circumstances which transpired at the interview, that the sole object of the Chamber is to put the railways on the most advantageous footing for their completion and operation, without violating the existing rights of companies. Should this anticipation turn out to be well founded, the determination of the Assembly will be received in this country, as well as in France, as a very satisfactory proof of the wisdom, the prudence, and the justice which may be expected from it in other matters of as urgent importance.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS SOPHIA.

HER Royal Highness the Princess Sophia was the fifth daughter of King George III., the sixth child, and the fifteenth of the family, Princess Amelia, who died in 1810, having been the youngest. The Princess Sophia was born on the 3rd November, 1777.

Her Royal Highness was baptized at St. James's Palace, on December 1. Her Serene Highness the Prince Augustus of Saxe-Gotha, represented by the Earl of Hertford, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household; her Serene Highness the Duchess of Brunswick, represented by the Countess of Hertford, and her Serene Highness the Duchess of Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, represented by the Dowager Countess of Effingham

Her Royal Highness was remarried, laid a life of dignified and calm retirement; by all of her august relatives, and indeed by all honoured with her friendship and acquaintance, the Princess was deeply and sincerely respected and beloved; and she fully shared in that affection which every right-feeling person in these realms is so ready to bestow on the regal issue of the illustrious House of Brunswick

Her Royal Highness became alarmingly ill on the morning of Saturday, the 27th ultimo, at her residence at Kensington, she gradually grew worse, and expired the same afternoon. Her sole surviving sister, the Duchess of Gloucester, and also the Duchess of Kent, and the Duchess of Cambridge, were with the Princess when she died; the Duchess of Inverness was likewise present. The Duke of Cambridge arrived a few minutes after his sister had breathed her last. This death of one who had been the daughter of a King, the sister of three Kings, and the aunt of a Queen, happened during the celebration of her Majesty's birthday, and its announcement came mournfully over the festivity of the day

STEPHEN LORD STAVORDALE.

His Lordship, the second and only surviving son of the present Earl of Ilchester died unmarried, on the 26th ult., in his thirty-second year. His elder brother, Henry Thomas Leopold, Lord Stavordale, had predeceased him in 1837, at the early age of twenty-one. By the mournful loss of these, his only sons, Lord Ilchester is left without a direct male heir of his body. He has, however, two daughters, Theresa Anne Maria, wife of Edward St. Vincent Digby, Esq.; and Caroline Margaret, married to Edward C Kerrison, Esq. The present heir presumptive to the family honours is the Right Hon. Stephen Thomas Holmes Hornor Fox-Strangways, Minister Plenipotentiary to the Germanic Confederation, half-brother of the Earl.

The founder of the noble house of Ilchester, of which that of Holland is a cadet, was Sir Stephen Fox, the faithful adherent of King Charles II., during the Prince's exile, and the munificent projector of the great Military Hospital at Chelsea, to which he contributed £18,000. His son Stephen, the first Earl of Ilchester, considerably augmented the patrimony, by marrying Elizabeth, only daughter and heir of Thomas Strangways Horner, Esq., of Mells Park, Somersetshire, whose name of Strangways he assumed. By her he had Stephen, father of Henry Thomas Fox-Strangways, second Earl of Ilchester, whose son is the present Peer.

THE PORTLAND VASE.—We have the gratification to learn that Mr. Windus, R.S.A., the author of the new Elucidation of the Portland Vase, and the Sacrophagus in which it was deposited, has just presented the latter to the British Museum: it is placed in the Egyptian room; and, apart from its artistic interest, the presentation must be regarded as an act of individual liberality worthy of special record. The Portland Vase, it will be remembered, is still the property of the Duke of Portland.

POST OFFICE NOTICE.—Henceforth a mail for Jamaï (Hayti) will be dispatched, vid Jamaica, by the packet leaving Southampton on the 2nd of each month, as well as by the packet of the 17th of the month. It is calculated that letters by this additional mail of the 2nd will reach Jacmel about five days earlier than those dispatched by the succeeding mail of the 17th of the month.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The Select Committee on the Irish Poor Law was nominated

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS ADJOURNMENT BILL.—On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill, Lord CAMPBELL moved that it be read a third time that day six months, as it was perfectly unnecessary, for all that it professed to do could be already done by a resolution of either House of Parliament. After some discussion the amendment was negatived without a division, and the bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS

The adjourned debate was resumed by Mr. ALCOCK (London) who contended that the present was a most opportune moment for the alteration proposed in the Navigation Laws. He supported the Government proposition.

Mr. HUME opposed the measure

A tedious debate ensued, which was ultimately adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock by a majority, on division, of 236 to 73

The House shortly afterwards adjourned.

The Queen held a Court on Thursday, at Buckingham Palace, to receive an address from the Corporation of Dublin. At three o'clock the deputation arrived at the Palace. It was composed of the Lord Mayor, Alderman Keshin, Alderman O'Brien, M.P., Alderman M'Kenna, Alderman C. P. Gavin, Mr. Maurice O'Connell, M.P., D.L., &c. The deputation having approached the Royal presence, the Lord Mayor read the address from the Corporation, and, kneeling, presented it to his Sovereign. The Queen received the address, and returned a most gracious answer. Mr Maurice O'Connell, M.P., the mover of the address, and Town-Councillor Ferguson, the seconder, had the honour to kiss hands. The senior Alderman, Mr. Keshin, had also the honour of kissing hands. The deputation then retired The Queen gave audience to Sir George Grey

FUNERAL OF THE PRINCESS SOPHIA.—A deputation, consisting of the chairman and directors of the Kensal-green Cemetery, have had an interview with the Lord Chamberlain, to arrange the funeral of her late Royal Highness, which is to take place on Tuesday next, in the ground of the Company. Her Majesty having most graciously concurred in the wish of her late Royal Highness, the funeral is to be strictly private. Very few persons will attend, excepting the Royal Family, Officers of State, and the Household. The Bishop of Norwich will officiate on the occasion

SUMMER CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.—On Thursday the Judges arranged the summer circuits. Midland: Lord Denman and Justice Patteson Northern: Chief Baron and Justice Coltman. Oxford: Barons Rolfe and Platt North Wales: Justice Wightman. Vacation Judge. Baron Alderson will remain in town as Vacation Judge, and will sit daily at his chambers in Serjeant's-inn.

CHARITIES GATHERINGS.—On Thursday evening there was another attempt made to get up a "demonstration," as the phrase now is, in Clerkenwell green; but, as usual, the affair was a complete failure; the few hundreds of rabble, thieves, and pickpockets, who assembled, having been quickly dispersed by the police. It is said that sympathy with the unfortunate Mitchell is at the bottom of these senseless gatherings.

SICILY

On the 22nd ult. the two Houses of the Sicilian Parliament decreed a general mourning to be worn for three days, by all authorities in the island, as a manifestation of Sicilian sympathy with the martyrs to freedom who fell at Naples on the 15th ult.

AUSTRIA

Reports, as yet unauthenticated, have reached us of disturbances, and the erection of barricades by the populace in Vienna, on the 15th ult. From Prague, too, in Bohemia, similar news have arrived, but confirming tangible fact. All that is discernible amidst the obscurity of clashing, antagonistic rumours is, that in both cities there is much commotion, uncertainty, and apprehensions of all kinds agitating men's minds.

PRUSSIA

The accounts from other parts of Germany are equally glo In Berlin the public mind is in a very feverish and excited state. An outbreak is hourly expected, although people do not know the reason. From the gestures of the German Empire we have revolts and rumours of anticipated revolts—from the Rhine to the Weser, from the Elbe to the Danube; there is scarcely anything in the public papers but accounts of revolts, risings, &c. The press is free, which does not speak of some anarchy and confusion some demonstration of democratic power against the cause of peace and tranquillity.

SWITZERLAND.

The representative of the canton of Geneva in the Diet has proposed that, in consequence of the recent events in Naples, the cantons who have military agreements with the Neapolitan government shall be invited to recall their troops. The proposition was ordered to be taken into consideration at an early sitting.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

An engagement was fought on Sunday, the 28th ult., between the troops of the German Confederation and the Danes The attack, which was quite unexpected, was made by the latter on the occasion of the Germans relieving their outposts opposite Alsen. The engagement lasted several hours, and terminated in favour of the Danes. There were between 7000 and 8000 engaged on both sides, and the affair is described as very sanguinary. It is feared that this mal-apropos event will retard the negociations at present on foot for a peaceable arrangement of the quarrel.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has continued fine, and without rain till the last day of the month. The month of May has been remarkable for the clearness of the sky and the absence of rain. The following are some particulars during each day of the past week

Monday, May 22, the sky was free from clouds, except between the hours of noon and 2 P.M., during which time clouds were frequent; the direction of the wind was E., and the average temperature of the air was 60°. Friday, the sky was more or less covered with clouds till the evening, and it was free from clouds afterwards; the direction of the wind was E.S.E., and the average temperature for the day was 61°. Saturday, the sky was mostly overcast till afternoon; the evening and night were clear. The direction of the wind was E., and the average temperature was 57°. Sunday, the sky at times was nearly free from clouds, and at other times it was much clouded, the kinds of cloud were thin cirro-stratus and light cirri. The direction of the wind was E., and the average temperature was 59½. Monday, the sky was mostly cloudless till afternoon; and at times during the evening it was a good deal covered by large masses of dark cumulo and acrol. The direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the average temperature was 58°. Tuesday, the sky was mostly covered by clouds till the evening, and mostly clear afterwards. The direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature was 60°. Wednesday, the sky, in the early morning, was cloudless; afterwards it became partially clouded; at 8h. 45m. P.M. rain began to fall, and continued till the evening. The direction of the wind was S., and the average temperature was 58½°; and that for the week ending this day was 58°.

The following are the extreme thermometrical readings for each day:—

Blackheath, Thursday, June 1, 1848. J. G.

HUNGERFORD MARKET COMPANY.—A special meeting and a half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this company were held at the company's offices, Villiers-street, Strand. At the former meeting Robert Biddulph, Esq., was elected a director in the place of Lord Ashburton, deceased. The report of the directors to the half-yearly meeting gave a satisfactory statement of the company's affairs, and the same was received and adopted by the meeting. The five directors and auditor going out of office by rotation were unanimously re-elected; and after passing a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman and directors, the meeting adjourned.

THE COBDEN TESTIMONIAL FUND.—The committee at Manchester have published "An account current of the Cobden National Trust Fund, to April 25, 1848." The towns contributing over a thousand pounds are—Manchester, £26,318; London, £11,793; Liverpool, £2120; Ashton, £1119; Bolton, £1230; Oldham, £1205; and Birmingham, £1217.—Mr. Cobden, in his letter of acknowledgment to the subscribers, having stated his acceptance of the gift, observes:—"Whilst acknowledging that it is by your bounty alone that I am placed in a position to be able to devote myself to public business, I think I refer to ground you from being held responsible for my future political career. I accept the testimonial at your hands, with the understanding that it commits the donors to an approval of my free-trade principles only, and that it leaves me at liberty to take an unfettered course on all other public questions. Having secured my independence, you have a right to expect, that in all matters affecting the public interests, I shall act up to the dictates of a conscientious conviction—that I shall not become the slave of a party, the minister of the press, or the flatterer of the people; and in these expectations you shall not be disappointed. Happy, indeed, shall I be to find that my opinions generally have the sanction of your approbation. I have entered upon this explanation solely to prevent any attempt hereafter to place you in a false position, for want of a frank understanding upon our future political relationship. Let it not be thought for a moment that this candour is incompatible with the most profound and grateful sense of your generosity. I feel an inexpressible pride in owning my fortune to the spontaneous contributions of my countrymen. To be thus exalted by you, as a successful labourer in the peaceful cause of free-trade, is a distinction which I would not relinquish for all the honours or rewards which have ever been bestowed upon successful conquerors. With the sincerest good wishes for your happiness, I remain, my friends, your obliged and faithful servant, RICHARD COBDEN.—London, May 23, 1848."

MR. BLEWITT'S CONCERT.

We have received the following letter from the veteran English composer:—

(To the Editor.)

I beg to return you my best thanks for your kind notice of my concert in your last interesting publication. Allow me to correct an error as regards my friend Mr. Templeton, who, sooner than disappoint my friends, attended (notwithstanding he had hardly recovered from his late hoarseness), and sang "Old Towler" with great effect, and which elicited one of the most rapturous encores I have ever heard.

Last I read not the valuable services of Mr. H. Phillips and Miss Rosa Reeves is most certain, after being finally authorised to announce them in the programme. The latter gentleman sent an apology at nine o'clock (on that evening), to say he was labouring under severe hoarseness, which I was delighted to find had entirely left him on the following night, when he made his début at Her Majesty's Theatre, in "Linda di Chamouni." I had his success on that night as one of the greatest triumphs a British artist ever achieved. Query: If Mr. Sims Reeves could make the impression he did on the part assigned him in "Linda di Chamouni," what would he have done in "Lucia"?

It was stated by one of your contemporaries that Reeves's success was one of the greatest triumphs since Miss Kelly's appearance on the Italian boards. Surely they never could have heard him (which I judge very possible), as he had not the slightest pretension as a musician; and as to his vocalisation, it was far from pleasant to hear, from his nasal defect. In fact, the only recommendation he had for the then King's Theatre was his great patron, the Prince of Wales, and Mrs. Crouch. Now Reeves, whom I freely forgive ("if he will promise never to do so any more"), I am delighted to say, for the sake of the profession, a gentleman, and an excellent pianoforte performer. As to his singing, you are as qualified to appreciate it as myself

I am, Sir, yours most respectfully and obliged,

J. BLEWITT

OPENING OF THE NEW STEAM BASIN AT PORTSMOUTH.

THE ancient sea-port of Portsmouth is ever and anon the scene of some commemoration of national interest; such, for instance, as some splendid addition to our "wooden walls" an extension of the already vast resources of the Royal Dockyard Of the latter class is the event we are about to illustrate; the completion and opening of a New Steam Basin, on Thursday week, the 25th ult., which is the greatest work of the kind successfully completed in this country, and marks a new era in the history of our naval architecture. Additional éclat is given to the event by the setting of the last stone being executed before her Majesty, who had not permitted herself to her loyal subjects in so public a manner since the memorable 16th of April, when the security of the Throne was restored so remarkable and decided a guarantee from the conduct of the nation at large.

The basin, which occupies nine acres of ground, was the great point of attraction, and thither the population of Portsmouth and its neighbourhood flocked in great numbers. Booths and platforms had been arranged for their accommodation al. round the margins of the basin; the national colours were displayed at regular intervals, and three immense standards waved from the steam-factory, which, with its subjacent roof of ice in many parts with spectators more curious than cautious, and surmounted at one point by a huge crane, which also bore its proportion of occupants, presented altogether a very striking appearance. At the entrance to the basin were posted Her Majesty's barge, manned by her young apprentices, the Excellent, and a crowd of barges.

The Fairy was not expected to arrive till three o'clock, but long before two o'clock every available spot on the margin of the quadrangular basin was occupied by well-dressed spectators. The platforms and booths were filled with ladies and gentlemen, and only sufficient space remained for the military and police to keep the line, and by forming the front rank to preserve the regularity of the spectacle. In this service there were employed the Marine Artillery, and portions of the 9th and 17th Regiments, to the number of 1000, as well as 2076 men of the Royal Dockyard Brigade, this latter force consisting of the workmen employed in the dockyards, who have undergone a course of drilling, and are supplied with regimental uniforms. By two o'clock the arrangements required for the reception of her Majesty, and a very splendid spectacle the whole scene presented. Not less than 15,000 people were assembled to witness the spectacle.

It was a hot day; the sun poured down a blaze of light and heat, and the [illegible] of the civic authorities in their scarlet robes sent the blood up to [illegible] face. In this melting weather, with nothing visible on the uncovered [illegible] but a sea of brown parasols, the spectators waited for some time the [illegible]ppearance of the Fairy. About a quarter past three o'clock, the sound of guns from a squadron, somewhat muffled by distance, was heard, and it was known that the Queen had passed the fleet at Spithead. Then came the louder and more startling report of the cannon from the Platform Battery, and of the old Victory, the Rota, and the Bellerophon. Some duty took place which the Lord of Wellington and the Lords of the Admiralty got on board; but a few minutes after, the Fairy, with the Royal standard at the mainmast, the Admiralty flag at the foremast, and the Union-Jack at the stern, was seen gliding into the basin amidst the shrill cheers of the young crew on board the Rolla, and the thunders of a Royal salute from the Excellent, and from batteries on shore. As the little vessel passed along the narrow entrance to the Basin, on all sides arose the most enthusiastic cheers and acclamations. The ladies waved their handkerchiefs, the gentlemen shouted, the troops saluted, the bands struck up in succession "God save the Queen," and there was infinite rolling of drums. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, who were surrounded by a brilliant suite, stood on the quarter-deck while the Fairy slowly steamed round the Basin. The Queen was dressed in white, and the Prince in a Field-marshal's uniform; and both acknowledged gracefully, and with great cordiality, the affectionate greetings with which they were received.

It was at this moment that the scene assumed its most animated appearance. The Fairy was marshalled on her way into the Basin, and her wake was closed in by a whole flotilla of barges, from the fleet at Spithead, the ships in commission having been lent by the Admiralty. When the Fairy had steamed slowly round the Basin, she stopped a little above the north inlet, where the principal booth was erected. There her Majesty and the Prince landed, and passing under a handsome triumphal arch of flowers, reached a raised platform, which was erected, and upon which two chairs were placed for their accommodation. In the space around this platform were collected the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Anglesey, the Earl of Auckland, Admiral Sir Charles Ogle, Admiral Prevost, Admiral Sir John Ommanney, Admiral Sir F. A. Collier, Admiral Purvis, Admiral Parry, the Earl of Haddington, the Earl of Ilchester, Viscount Limerick, General Lord Frederick Fitzclarence, Lord Clarence Paget, Captain Sir Richard Grant, R.N., Sir J. Norbury, Captain the Earl of Hardwicke, Sir G. Cockburn, Sir E. Parry, R.N., Sir W. Pearson, Sir Baldwin Walker, Colonel Constance, Admiral Daly, Colonel Daly, Viscount Ingestre, Colonel Irvine, R.E.; Viscountess Limerick, Countess Ellesmere, Lady Frederick and the Hon Miss Fitzclarence, Lady Grant, Lady Parry, Lady Emily Dundas, Lady Pearson, Lady Nott.

The appearance of so many distinguished persons, old generals and admirals in uniform, the full board of Admiralty in court dresses, the fiers of lords surrounding the spot filled by elegantly-dressed ladies and gentlemen, but above all the Duke of Wellington standing behind the chair of his Sovereign, his remarkable features lighted up with the lively expression of pride—all this formed a scene sufficiently striking and remarkable.

The Mayor, having been called forward, presented addresses to Her Majesty and the Prince, which they received very graciously.

Her Majesty then examined a plan of the Basin, which lay on a table at hand for inspection, and which was explained to her Majesty by Captain James, R.E., surveyor in charge of the works.

Her Majesty, who stood the whole time she was on the shore, and was repeatedly cheered, next went over to a party of ladies who stood at some distance from the platform, and some of whom she recognised. The lady first greeted by her Majesty was Miss Eden; then Lady Ellesmere, Lady Fitzclarence, and Miss Fitzclarence. Sir Baldwin Walker was presented by the Duke of Wellington. Some little children were on board the tender, and the Prince of Wales particularly was loudly cheered by the spectators.

At five o'clock, the Dockyard battalion and auxiliaries, to the number of 2500, sat down to an excellent cold dinner provided by Mr. Woods, army contractor, at [illegible] of Common Hard, at the same time the contractor's force, numbering about 1600, sat down to a similar banquet provided by Mr. Rhoden, of the Poultry, London. The bands playing them in to the tune of "Roast Beef of Old England."

Some acknowledgment is due to the Admiral Superintendent Prescott and his able lieutenant Asplin, for the admirable manner in which the whole arrangements on the occasion were made by them.

Some little circumstance had nearly given rise to very awkward consequences. While the Queen was standing on the platform, and the ceremony which she had come to witness was proceeding, a police inspector was desired to go and call the band to strike up "Rule Britannia." This official, in the violence of his zeal, rushed forward with such headlong haste to give the necessary order, that he very nearly upset her Majesty. The Queen smiled good-naturedly when Lord Frederick Fitzclarence spoke to her on the subject

...ship-building basin on the east side of the Inner Harbour, each 300 feet long by 70 wide and 30 ... deep from the coping. It was set to ensure vessels whose refitments must be completed in a great hurry to be worked upon by the artisans on both sides at once.

The area of water in the Basin and inlets is 8¼ acres; the Basin alone, 7 acres.

In the south-west corner is a large graving dock, 80 feet wide at the entrance, and 305 feet long "over all," with a width of 101 feet between the coping.

he west brink of the Basin is a great factory of handsome architecture, 6...7 ...et long, 48 wide, and 51 high. In the south-west end of this building were feasted the 1600 men after the opening.

On the south wall is a new brass foundry, 90 feet by 110. This has been, for some time, in partial working.

The basin is considered capable of accommodating around its sides as many as nine steam-frigates of the first class. Besides the above materials, there have been used in various parts of the whole about 2500 tons of cast iron from Staffordshire. The rough cost of the labour already turned out of hand £400,000.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

"A SQUALLY DAY."—PAINTED BY T. CRESWICK, A.R.A.

(FOURTH NOTICE.)

We resume our criticism from page 328.

Mr. O'Neil, like Mr. Frost, has only one picture in the Exhibition, wisely determining to husband his strength for one great effort rather than scatter it over t[illegible]. His subject is "Katherine of Arragon appealing to Henry VIII." "Sir, I beseech you," said the injured Queen, "for all the love that hath been between us, and for the love of God, let me have justice and right: take of me some pity and compassion, for I am a poor woman and a stranger born out of your dominions. I have here no assured friend, much less impartial counsel, and I flee to you as to the head of justice within this realm. Alas! alas! wherein have I offended you?" This is a well selected incident for the purposes of art, and Mr. O'Neil has made the most of it. The grouping of his figures has been managed with great care, and some of the heads are admirably expressive. The face of th Queen is full of injured majesty and beauty. The King is not so good; but fo[illegible] artist to have succeeded in his principal figure, as Mr. O'Neil has certainly done, is indeed a great matter.

Mr. Creswick has extended his love for nature, and escaped from the cool sequestered glades where Dryads and Hamadryads haunt, to sea-shore scenes such as the late Mr. Collins loved so much, and painted so truely. In his "Home by the Sands" and his "Squally Day" he has shown an eye exquisitely alive to the varieties of nature; and has, moreover, gladdened his friends and the public, by giving greater variety to his works, and by achieving complete success in the new line he has chosen for his pencil. He must, however, desert his checquered walks and shady pools; for no one, not Mr. Lee himself, has a finer eye for catching the beauties of landscape nature. In a room, hung with pictures by Creswick, one enjoys a perpetual spring throughout the year.

191. "Henrietta Maria, Queen of England, and the Prince of Wales assisting at the Toilet of Mademoiselle Montpensier." C. Landseer. A small clever picture of three figures nicely painted in parts, and with some good character about it. The dresses and decorations of the period are elaborately worked up We prefer this to Mr. C. Landseer's larger picture, already noticed.

217. "Amalfi." C. Stanfield. A large and noble landscape occupying the centre of the south side of the great room. It is in Mr. Stanfield's best manner, and in the same style as his large landscapes at Bowood. The mariner's compass was invented [illegible]

223. "Mrs. Charles Lamb." F. Grant. A three-quarter portrait, painted in a manner something between Reynolds and Gainsborough. It is by far the best female portrait in the Exhibition.

229. "An old Cover Hack, the property of R. Heathcote, Esq." E. Landseer One of those common subjects which no one but Edwin Landseer succeeds in investing with something more than mere portraiture. The general arrangement is extremely tasteful, and the whole picture most wonderful for finish and fidelity.

"CATHERINE OF ARRAGON APPEALING TO HENRY VIII."—PAINTED BY H. N. O'NEIL.

230. "Portrait of the Lord Justice-General of Scotland." J. Watson Gordon. A fine full length in Mr Watson Gordon's bold broad style. Wilkie remarked that Mr Gordon reminded him of Raeburn (he had seen Raeburn first); and in Landseer's opinion "he [Mr. Gordon] worked

242. "Chancel of the Collegiate Church of St. Paul at Antwerp." D. Roberts. By far the finest work we remember to have seen from the pencil of Mr. Roberts, who has evidently stripped for a great effort, remembering at every stroke that the picture was a commission from Mr. Vernon, and that it was destined to form a part of the Vernon gift to the British nation. The effect of light is quite wonderful, the details faithful as well felt, and the management of the figures far superior to Steenwyck or any old painter of church interiors.

262. "Miss Forbes of Callander." T. M. Joy. A clever portrait by an able artist, who works too little for his own fame. Instead of painting bold landscape backgrounds and difficult bits for his brother artists—caring apparently very little who was to own the work—he will, we trust, work for himself hereafter, and send to future exhibitions more than his present contribution—a single portrait. A painter is soon forgotten, unless he manages to keep his name continually before the public.

268 "The Skirts of a Wood" R. Redgrave. In Mr. Creswick's manner, and a most careful transcript from nature.

277 "Portrait of Mrs. Charles Dickens." D. Maclise. A three-quarter portrait in a green velvet dress. The general arrangement is judicious, and the countenance expressive and pleasing.

370 "Mola de Gaeta, from the Appian Way." C. Stanfield. A small picture, and the artist's best work in the present Exhibition. Mr. Stanfield has very little imagination, but his eye is always sensibly alive to the varieties of landscape nature. His great merit is that he is always true to the scene and to himself. He is no cold imitator, and while at work is not thinking how Claude, or Cuyp, or Wilson, or Turner would have rendered this or that part, but is solely intent on transferring to canvas what he sees before him with the greatest fidelity and beauty. He feels, and properly too, that he can rely on his own observation, and that to attain original excellence he must think and work for himself.

383. "A Summer Morning." F. R. Lee, R. A., and T. S. Cooper, A.R.A. A neat composition of wonderful truth and beauty. The landscape is, of course, by Lee; the cows, of course, by Cooper. We remember, as many of our readers will no doubt do, a charming picture, the joint production by the late Sir Augustus Callcott and Mr. E. Landseer. It is surprising that our artists do not oftener work together.

395. "A old Woman accused of Witchcraft." W. P. Frith, A. One of Mr. Frith's best works, and altogether an advance on former years. The woman is accused of having bewitched a peasant girl, and the scene is supposed to take place before a country justice of the reign of King James I. The story is well told, and some of the heads most carefully elaborated. The details, too, are good.

413 "A Random Shot." E. Landseer. A deer dying or dead in the snow from the effects of a random shot. One of her young has followed her for nourishment. The incident is painful—the execution most felicitous. There is a capital effect of light.

464 "St. John the Baptist." W. Etty. A full-length figure, not very well drawn, and rich though dirty in colour.

476. "Highgate Fields during the Great Fire of London in 1666." E. M. Ward. A very clever picture, which we have made arrangements to engrave. We shall therefore abstain, for the present, from making any lengthened account of its incidents and episodes. This thoughtful artist is always full of meaning. He leaves no part of his picture "To be let."

487. "Caius Marius in the Ruins of Carthage." F. Danby. Rather "The Ruins of Carthage—Caius Marius looking on:" for the figure is very small, and quite subsidiary. This is a picture of fine imagination.

494. "Prize Fruit grown at Blenheim." G. Lance. In Mr. Lance's best manner. It is in our engraver's hands.

495. "Christ and the Sisters of Bethany." F. Stone. Very unlike Mr. Frank Stone's easily recognised style, and hardly a successful attempt, in another and more difficult line. There is, however, a religious air about the picture which is very pleasing.

503 "View from the Slate Quarries on the River Ogweir, North Wales." Lee and Cooper. Another Beaumont and Fletcher affair, and quite as happy as the effort already noticed.

511. "Palmer and Sir Guyon's Approach to the Bower of Bliss." W. D Kennedy. A long picture—the landscape quite Spenserian—the figures cold and uninteresting. Spenser's own heroes lack the vital warmth of flesh and blood, and Mr. Kennedy has not, to the purpose that he has chosen, caught the cold allegorical character of the heroes of the Fairy Queen, and all the rich exuberance of the landscape to which the poet succeeds in painting with so rich and mellow and yet so faithful a pencil. Mr. Kennedy, at one time, painted human flesh with all the warmth of Mr. Etty.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

Earl Howe was the director of the seventh concert on Wednesday night; but his Lordship was summoned from his house, where he was giving the customary dinner to his brother directors, to attend to his duty as a special constable, and was thus absent from the concert-room. He also left Lord Cowley for the same reason. The agitation of the Chartists, and the death of the Princess Sophia, have seriously affected all places of amusement, and a very thin meeting was the consequence at the Hanover Rooms. There were no novelties in the selection, which comprised stock pieces from Handel, Mozart, Purcell, V. Martini, Pergolesi, Gaglielmi, S. Bach, C. P. E. Bach, Dr. Boyce, Webbe, Callcott, and Graun. The vocalists were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Emma Lucombe, Miss E. Williams, Messrs. Barnby, Peck, Lockey, Phillips, and Machin. The return of Miss Lucombe after her studies in Italy and France was the interesting event of the evening. Her voice, always a very beautiful one, has gained in power and flexibility, and her style is more finished. She gave the "Gratias agemus" very nicely, with Mr. Willman's delicate clarionet obligato. Mr. H. Blagrove's delicacy in executing S. Bach's "Chaconne," with variations, is worthy of record.

The Duke of Wellington is the director for the eighth and last concert (next Wednesday), as locum tenens for the Earl of Westmoreland, now in Berlin.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The Symphonies at the sixth Concert were Mozart's in C, No 1, and Beethoven's in D, No. 2, both written in the early days of these great composers. The overtures were Weber's "Der Freyschütz" and Sterndale Bennett's "Parisina," the latter conducted by Mr. Lucas, in the absence of Mr. Costa, who directed, as usual, the remainder of the programme. There are some fine points in the Parisina overture, but it is written in a difficult key, and has evidently not gone through the ordeal of careful rehearsals. Miss Kate Loder (a very clever pupil of Mrs. Anderson) performed Mendelssohn's first Pianoforte Concerto in G minor with much ability, especially in the last movement, which was encored. Her execution is remarkably clear and brilliant, and her touch excellent. This gifted young artiste has already distinguished herself as a composer. Mr. Blagrove played Spohr's Violin Concerto, No. 12, Op. 79, by no means one of the best specimens of composition by that master. It was finely executed by the English violinist. The vocalists were Mdme. Dorus Gras, who sang the air "Perche non ho" from "Lucia," and "Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni" with great effect; and Signor Salvi, who gave "Una sposa" from "Maria di Rohan," and "Una furtiva" from the "Elisir d' Amore," being encored in the former.

THE MADRIGALISTS.—Lord Saltoun presided at the meeting, on Tuesday night, of this club, at the Freemasons' Tavern, when the prize of ten guineas for a melody, given by the Duke of Cumbridge, was awarded to Mr. Hatton for the first prize, and Mr. Blewitt for the second. There were three candidates. Mr. Lockey sang the songs, accompanied by Sir R. R. Bishop, whose fine glee of "Bold Robin Hood" was capitally executed. Thalberg played his "Don Giovanni" fantasia and his "Home, sweet Home" variations, and Miss Rebecca Isaacs, by Mr. Brinsley Richards. The Duke of Cambridge's absence was owing to the death of the Princess Sophia.

THE MUSICAL UNION. At the fifth meeting, on Tuesday afternoon, the scheme comprised Haydn's Quartet in D, No. 63; Beethoven's Quartet in A, No. 5; Beethoven's Duo, Op. 61, for Pianoforte and Violoncello; and two Pianoforte Solos, executed by M. Charles Halle, the one composed by Stephen Heller, and the other by himself. He played in the most exquisite style, Platti seconding him in the duo. Hermann, Deloffre, and Hill were the other executants.

MISS DOLBY AND MR. LINDSAY SLOPER'S MORNING CONCERT.—An excellent programme was provided on Tuesday morning, at the Hanover-square Rooms, which were crowded to excess by the friends and admirers of this popular and esteemed vocalist and very clever pianist. The first part was confined solely to the works of the late Mendelssohn, opening with his "St. Paul" overture, and followed by an Anthem, "Why, O Lord," composed to Dr. Bromley's version of the 13th Psalm. It is a fine work, and was well executed. Miss Dolby singing the principal solos, the chorus being chiefly composed of the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. The Serenade and "Allegro giojoso," Op. 44, executed by Mr. Lindsay Sloper in brilliant style; two duets nicely sung by the Misses Fyne; song, "By Calm's bower," given by Mr. Lockey; the duet "Oh rest in the Lord," from the "Elijah," sung by Miss Dolby; and two unaccompanied Quartets, sung by Miss Wallace, Miss Dolby, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Sergius, completed the Mendelssohnian gleanings—a graceful tribute to the memory of that celebrated composer. Bach's Concerto in D minor, for three pianofortes and orchestra, was capitally played by C. Hallé, Benedict, and Lindsay Sloper. The second part of the scheme was miscellaneous: Blagrove playing a violin solo; the Distin family, a quartet on the Sax-horns; Mr. Sloper, his own "Napolitaine;" and Madame Thillon and Signor Marras being added to the list of singers we have above. Mr. Weiss was an effective band, led by Mr. Willy. Mr. C. Lucas and Benedict officiating as conductors.

MRS. ANDERSON'S ANNUAL MORNING CONCERT.—The directors of the Royal Italian Opera having given permission to their artistes to sing at Mrs. Anderson's Concert, she was enabled to present a highly attractive scheme, and the Hanover Rooms were crowded with rank and fashion. There was an effective orchestra, conducted by Costa, opening with Weber's "Oberon" overture. Salmon performed his "Lucrezia Borgia" violin fantasia in brilliant style, and Platti played a violoncello solo excellently. The Distin family on the Sax-horns completed the instrumental treat. Mrs. Anderson executed in superb style Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat; and with M. Sainton, a Dohler's "Tarantella" for piano and violin, displayed first-rate mechanism. As regards the vocal gleanings, Mario was encored in an air, and Mdlle. Alboni in "Non più mesta." Mdme. Viardot, in addition to her powerful vocalisation in Zingarella, "Ombre adorate," sang some Spanish airs with Mdlle de Meudi most charmingly. Grisi, Mdme. Castellan, Mdme. Dorus Gras, and Miss Bassano, Signor R. Costa, and Signor Tamburini, sang divers pieces in this admirable concert.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—The evening performance of the Royal Italian Opera-house, Covent-garden, was given on Friday morning, a notice of which will appear in our next publication, as also of the performance of Haydn's "Creation" at Exeter Hall, on the same evening, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, Miss Lucombe, Sims Reeves, and Phillips being the vocalists. On Saturday (this morning) the concert of the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music will take place. On Monday morning will be the public rehearsal of the eighth and last Ancient Concert, which will take place on Wednesday evening. Signor Negri gives his annual morning concert on Monday, and in the evening Mr. Noble will have his concert at the Hanover-square Rooms, and Mr. H. Wylde at Exeter Hall. The London Sacred Harmonic Society, on Friday next, will give Haydn's "Creation," in aid of the funds of the Early Closing Association. M. Vivier, the famed horn-player, whose performances in Germany, Russia, Belgium, and France have created such a sensation, has arrived in London. The musical accounts from Italy, France, and Germany continue to be deplorable. In Paris the only attraction is at the Opéra Comique, with Auber's "Haydée," in which Roger is so great, both as an actor and singer.

ANNUAL CONCERT OF MR. AND MRS. W. H. SEGUIN. These excellent vocalists gave an illustration of their talents on Tuesday evening, at the Hanover-square Rooms, singing Mozart's duo, "Crudel, perche," very successfully. Madame Dorus Gras gave "Va dit-elle," from Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable;" and Madame E. Lafarelle (Hallwerth) sang the "Gravedigger." Miss Bailey, Miss Duval, Miss Birch, the Misses Williams, the Misses Fyne, Mr. Reeves, and Mr. John Parry were also included in the selections; and the instrumental attraction was great—the performances of Charles Hallé; Holmes; his pupil, Noble, Sutton, and Haydon, as pianists; Giulio Regondi, concertina; Belsir Chatterton, harp; and the Distin Family, Sax-horns.

MR. JULIAN ADAMS.—The miscellaneous matinée performed by this Professor at his first Chamber Concert, given in Willis's Rooms, was judiciously selected. He was supported by Richardson, Sommeberg, Jarrett, Waterbottom, G. Regondi, and the Collins family, in the instrumental department; and Madame Lazarus, Miss Miran, and the Misses Collins, as vocalists. Mr. T. Baker was the Conductor.

THE GERMANIC SOCIETY. A German band from Berlin, conducted by Herr Lenschou, has arrived in this country, with M. Goria, a pianist, to give concerts. There is nothing in the order of talent evinced by this troupe to entitle it to much consideration, and it is only as a specimen of what can be done on the home market is so severe, that our own profession has enormous difficulty to sustain itself.

EXETER HALL.—The Concert given on Wednesday night, under the direction of Mr. John Hullah, exhibited the advantage of continuous training, for the choral singing of the classes is decidedly improving. Part the first was confined to Handel's "Acis and Galatea," Mr. Sims Reeves was encored rapturously in the airs "Love in her Eyes," and "Love sounds the alarm;" as also Mr. Whitworth in "O ruddier than the cherry." The part song, by Mendelssohn, "O hills," was also demanded a second time; and the "Adelaide" of Beethoven was most fervently given twice by Mr. Reeves, whose popularity is unbounded at the present moment. Charles Hallé played some of Mendelssohn's songs without words, with truly practical feeling. The fine Walpurgis Night terminated the scheme, the solos sung by Miss Duval, Mr. Benson, and Mr. W. H. Seguin. These Concerts are very praiseworthy, as exhibiting a sound musical purpose.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Mdlle. Lind was to have performed Linda for the second time, on Saturday night, but, owing to her indisposition, the opera of "Linda" was substituted, which enables us to pay a tribute to the fine acting and singing of Coletti in the part of the heroine's father. Antonio may rank with the finest impersonations of this admirable baritone.

On Tuesday night Mdlle. Lind, recovered from her indisposition, repeated her performance of Lucia, the house being brilliantly attended. From first to last she was received with continued acclamations. There are few parts in the lyric repertoire better adapted to develope the powers of Mdlle. Lind than that of the heroine in Sir Walter Scott's masterly romance. Lucia is gentle, winning, and sentimental; and the Italian librettist has skilfully retained the attributes of the character in his poem. The presentment of a horrible future is depicted in the opening scene, and seems harmonised with the feelings of Lucia in her first entrance—a gentle melancholy prevails, and she shrinks instinctively from the proposition of Edgar to address her brother for his consent to the union. For nothing of the wild passion of Edgar against her race was administered with great delicacy. In what is designated the "display of fioriture" there is nothing novel in the part not introduced by Mdlle. Lind; but her powers are in good taste, and therefore appropriate. She is in truth, it may be remarked, a highly conscientious artiste; and a composer's inspirations in her hands, as well as his intentions, are equally respected.

The duet with Enrico in the second act is characterised by a striking point in the perusal of the letter announcing the falsety of her lover twice over, before she can believe the evidence of her senses. The delivery during the signing of the contract is skilfully enacted; but the grand effort of Mdlle. Lind is in the scene of insanity. In her hands the sacrifice of art is carried to the most finished limits, and she seems "terribly in earnest." Her stringendo singing, as in the "Sonnambula," is displayed in the most exquisite light, and one or two of her ornaments were perfect in their originality. In Mdlle. Lind's musical execution, her most splendid touches are those received in the upper octave; and she is naturally tempted to dwell upon, and at times to force these high notes from the chest, and thus give a vigour not being sufficiently relieved by contrast. Her Lucia is a very fine conception, displaying much talent degree the highest intellectual qualifications, as well as exquisite vocal excellences.

The Enrico of Coletti is superbly rendered; but the proud spirit of Edgar, his impetuosity, and his final despair, exact a rare combination of histrione as well as musical powers to excite sympathetic but weak organ of Gardoni cannot realise what is anticipated by the imagination.

For the extra night on Thursday, "Lucia" was given for the third time. The house was fully and habitually attended. Mdlle. Lind's performance was received with the greatest applause, she being recalled at the end of each act.

Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" is to be revived, in which Mdme. Tadolini will appear with Labloche. We learn that the next part for Mdlle. Lind will be either in the "Elisir d'Amore" or in the "Gazza Ladra."

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Donizetti's "Favorita" was repeated for the second and third times, on Saturday and Tuesday. On the last-mentioned evening it was received with enthusiasm from beginning to end, Mario being encored in the romance in the first act, Grisi called before the curtain at the end of the second act, and Grisi and Mario at the termination of the third and fourth acts. The divertissement has been curtailed, and if it were cut out altogether the opera would gain in interest in the earlier acts.

Grisi's Leonora is one of her finest creations, fully equal to her Norma, Lucrezia, or Sonnambula. In this new part she has proved herself to be in the plenitude of her powers. It may be questioned whether the wonderful richness and roundness of her splendid organ could have been heard to greater advantage than in her scene in the third act, and in the duo in the last act. The music is well adapted for her, requiring, as it does, overwhelming dramatic force in the delicacy, finish, and pathos of her vocalisation in the scene of Leonora's reconciliation with Fernando, her sisters, and many of her listeners to tears. Mario seconded her with considerable feeling and energy: he has not the overpowering qualities of Duprez in this part: but his deportment is dignified, and his singing, easy, intelligible, and at times truly impassionable. He was rather husky on the Tuesday; but on the two previous occasions his cavatina, in the gorgeous convent-scene of Grieve, was full of exquisite sensibility. The excitement produced, indeed, by the last act, with its scenic accessories, the vocal genius of Grisi, the effect of the pealing organ, and the solemn strains of the monks, is, indeed, as unparalleled as it is indescribable.

On Thursday, for the extra night, "Norma" was given with Grisi, Corbari, Salvi and Marini; and the second and third acts of "La Sonnambula," with Viardot, Corbari, Mario, and Tamburini, were to have followed, but owing to the hoarseness of Mario, the last scene of "La Concorenzia" was substituted, and Mdlle. Alboni was rapturously encored in "Non più mesta," as usual. Grisi's Norma electrified the house, and she was recalled at the end of each act. A call was then raised for Corbari, and after a little delay she was brought on by Grisi, and received an emphatic ovation. The house was crowded to excess On Tuesday, being the day for the funeral of the Princess Sophia, the theatre will be closed; but there will be a subscription night on Monday.

Camarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto" will be revived next Thursday, with Grisi, Castellan, and Alboni; Mario, Rovere, and Tamburini, in the cast. The novelty of a morning performance of Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" will be given on Wednesday We believe we may also add the agreeable information that Mr. Reeves will make his début forthwith in "Lucia," having been engaged at this theatre.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

Auber's popular opera of the "Crown Diamonds" has been revived at this theatre, with great success, Mr. Allen having been engaged to resume his original part of Don Henrique. This favourite tenor is always heard to the greatest advantage at this lyric establishment. Madame Thillon's charming impersonation of La Reine is nothing if not piquancy and vivacity. Mrs Weiss, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Barker, and Mr. Bodda were included in the cast, and the operatic company is now strong enough to produce the répertoire which first ensured for the Princess' Theatre a great and deserved popularity.

On Monday evening the theatres were closed, upon a very short notice received from the Lord Chamberlain, in consequence of the death of the Princess Sophia.

No novelties have been produced; nor has the business at any of the houses been particularly good, the fine weather causing people to prefer out-of-door recreations to a hot theatre The return of the Keans, however, to the HAYMARKET, with Lovel's attractive play of "The Wife's Secret," will be sure to prove of advantage to the management. Mr. Gerhard Taylor, the harpist, has been engaged also for an entr'acte; and a new three-act drama, by Mr. T. Parry is announced for this evening, very powerfully cast.

The company of the Théâtre Historique is announced to open on Monday at DRURY-LANE with "Monte Cristo." M. Alexandre Dumas will, it is said, superintend the rehearsals, having arrived in London for that express purpose; and the drama will occupy two successive nights in its performance, as in Paris—a novel and very bold experiment with an English audience. The other pieces announced are "La Reine Margot" and "Les trois Mousquetaires." We believe the stage management is entrusted to M. Bourdicault. Some anonymous placards have been circulated against our own, and for the same reason that we prefer Spanish chestnuts and Portugal grapes to those indigenous with ourselves.

The Newgate school of melodrama occupies the attention of the audiences on the other side of the Thames but at present we complain. "Sixteen-string Jack" and "Dick Turpin" are the attractions at the VICTORIA and SURREY theatres this week.

VAUXHALL AND CREMORNE.

The two public gardens, VAUXHALL and CREMORNE, opened on Monday evening, and were unusually well attended, the performances of the theatres being closed contributing to increase the number of visitors. The order of the Lord Chamberlain that permitted dancing, horsemanship, ballet, and fireworks, on the same evening that is prohibited dramatic performances, was curious enough.

Vauxhall is under the management of Mr. Wardell, who held it last year, confidently with a Mr. Pike. The order of entertainments remain as it has been time out of mind. There is singing, equestrianism, and fireworks, with various bands of music, suppers, and dancing; but some new line may be struck out with advantage. There is a great lack of seats, for those who choose to rest without going into the supper boxes; and there is wanting also some kind of amusement during the concert. Since the days when people believed they were entertained in listening to songs from the orchestra tastes have altogether changed in music of the first order; has been so widely diffused, and cultivated, even at home, that nothing but the very best will satisfy the public; hence for the groups who are constantly promenading upon the walks a preference to standing for so long a time in front of the orchestra, some light games in the fashion of the Jeux Bleu, Billards Anglais, Jeu de Bagues, and others, constantly going on in the French Vaudeville and Ranelagh, or Mabille Gardens, not only with advantage to the public, but considerable profit to the proprietor. The view of Constantinople, on the Waterloo ground, is very good: and the fireworks, as usual, most effective.

CREMORNE GARDENS have had a great deal of money laid out upon them since last year; and, in addition to Laurent's band, and Arban for the principal concert-piston, offer many attractions. A balloon, capable of carrying eight persons, has been added to the "stock" of the establishment; and it is placed under the direction of Lieutenant Gale, who distinguished himself in the aëronatic excursions of last year, by descending from an upper to a lower car, by a rope ladder. Aquatic tournaments are announced; and, provided the weather will only hold favourable, a flourishing season may be expected.

THAT deservedly popular actress, Miss Woolgar, has announced her benefit at the Adelphi Theatre, on Monday next.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Modern Antique."—"Exchequer," in all probability is derived from the Scaccarium, or table of accounts, which the Government used in former times to facilitate their accounts of the revenue. The "Scaccarium" is described as a quadrangular table, about ten feet long and five broad, with a ledge all round the border, to prevent anything rolling off. It was surrounded by seats for the judges or tellers, a name derived from tallies, from whence we have tally. The chequered board, to this day frequently seen at the doors of public-houses, originates in the Scaccarium, and served to denote an office for money-changing. The Chinese still adopt this method of arranging their abacus, which is an instrument which resembles the ἄβαξ of the Greeks, and the Roman Abacus.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The House of Peers did not sit on Monday, because it was the anniversary of the Restoration

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

CHELTENHAM ELECTION.—The Chairman of the Cheltenham Election Committee reported that Sir W Jones was not duly elected, and that he was found guilty of bribery by his agents.

THE WEST INDIES.—Lord G. BENTINCK brought up the report of the Sugar and Coffee Committee; and Mr HUME gave notice that he would submit his West India resolutions for discussion this evening, unless the Government should give him up an early day for that purpose. Lord J. RUSSELL said that, as the debate on the Navigation Laws would possibly occupy the week, and, as he had promised Mr. Barkes to name his first open day for a Committee of Supply, in order to allow of the discussion on the Spanish transactions, he could not give up an earlier day than Thursday week; but he promised to name a day this evening. The noble Lord, in reply to a question, said that it was not the intention of the Government to propose any alteration in the measure of 1846, either as to the amount or duration of the differential duties.

SPAIN.—Mr. H. BALLIE asked the Foreign Minister why the case of the Spanish Government was omitted upon the papers just laid before Parliament. Statements were in circulation that the Spanish Government had charges against Sir H. Bulwer, but these did not appear in the correspondence.—Lord PALMERSTON briefly answered that he had no such statements

IRELAND.—To questions put by Mr. KROOK, in reference to the late Irish trials, Lord J. RUSSELL read letters from the Irish Attorney General and the Lord-Lieutenant, setting forth that the principle adopted was not to set aside jurors on account of their religious opinions, but to set aside all persons who entertained political opinions in accordance with the persons tried. That he considered a proper principle, without which justice would not be done

Lord J. RUSSELL moved an address of condolence to her Majesty on the decease of the Princess Sophia, to whose virtues and charity he paid a short but ate.

After a short passage of arms between Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. GRATTAN on Irish affairs, Lord J. Russell's motion was agreed to unanimously.

NAVIGATION LAWS

On the motion to go into a Committee of the whole House, to consider Mr. Labouchere's resolutions on navigation and regulation of ships and seamen,

Mr. HERRIES moved, as an amendment, "That it is essential to the national interests of this country to maintain the fundamental principle of the existing Navigation Laws, subject to such modifications as may be best calculated to obviate any proved inconvenience to the commerce of the United Kingdom and its dependencies, without danger to our maritime strength.

Mr. LABOUCHERE admitted that the resolution moved by Mr. Herries fairly raised the issue whether we should wholly depart from the principle hitherto regarded as the fundamental principle of the Navigation Laws, or whether we should merely make some partial regulations to remove the inconveniences of these laws. He did not deny that he proposed to introduce a great innovation, and to deal largely with a subject of immense magnitude to this country; but he contended the time was arrived when we should do entirely away with the colonial monopoly with the restrictions that secure to us the long voyage trade, and with the restrictions that secure to us the European carrying trade. The right hon. gentleman insisted that our naval power would not be impaired by the abolition of the Navigation Laws, and urged the House, with the least possible delay, to come to a decision on the question, advising them to reject Mr. Herries's resolution

Alderman THOMPSON said he was not interested in this question as a shipowner, and though, as a great employer of ships, he would be largely benefited by the reduction of freights which it was said would follow the repeal of the Navigation Laws, he could not shut his eyes to the ruinous effect of the measure proposed by the Government. The hon. alderman warmly supported Mr. Herries's resolution

Dr. BOWRING asserted that, as by agitation the public opinion on the Corn Laws had been changed, so it had been changed with regard to the Navigation Laws. The hon. member expressed his approval of the Government plan, with the exception of the power reserved to the Queen in Council to make reprisals on foreign countries that would not meet us on equitable terms.

Mr. HAMILTON examined the question in a two-fold point of view as a bore on our colonies, policy, and as it affected our shipping interests, commercial marine, and consequently our naval power. He was forced to believe that the Government regarded our colonies as costly appendages to the mother-country, and not as elements of her power and greatness, and all the measures they had introduced were calculated to convince the colonists that he could have they must look for no advantage from England. The hon. Member for Dundee contended that the repeal of the Navigation Laws would decrease our commercial marine, and against the colonies from us; and, for the slight advantage of making a reduction in the rate of freights, it would be madness in the extreme to sacrifice our naval superiority of this country.

Mr. WILSON referred to a array of figures to establish that the years 1817-1823, during the acute restriction of our Navigation Laws, our shipping was in a declining condition; whereas, after the changes made by Mr. Huskisson, during the operation of reciprocity treaties, up to the present time, our shipping went on increasing, and he (Mr. Wilson) had experience derived from the facility of British shipbuilders and shipowners to compete successfully with foreigners. The hon. Member also contended that free Trade was the best means of supporting our naval defences, and he read letters in support of the assertion made by Mr. Labouchere on a former occasion, that our ships could not obtain freights in consequence of the carelessness of the captains—these inferior, that unrestricted competition with the world would improve the qualities of our vessels and the character of our commanders.

NEW CHURCH OF ST. PAUL AND SCHOOLS, BERMONDSEY.

ST. PAUL'S DISTRICT CHURCH, BERMONDSEY.

THIS is the first of the Churches erected by the Committee of the Southwark Fund, commenced in the month of June, 1845, for the purpose of endeavouring to supply the spiritual and educational deficiencies of a most extensive and important district. The crowded neighbourhood embraced by the Boroughs of Lambeth and Southwark, comprising a population of 150,000 souls, was found, at that time, to have accommodation in Churches for no more than one in eight persons, and educational provision in schools for no more than one in fifty-four of its entire population. To meet a destitution so fearful in itself, and so pregnant with every future evil, it was proposed to obtain means for providing additional clergy-schools and churches in Southwark and the contiguous parishes.

St. Paul's is the first of the Churches erected by the Committee. The site was presented by the Governors of Guy's Hospital. It is in the early English pointed style, and consists of a nave and aisles, and an apse, the extent of ground being insufficient to admit of a chancel. The entire length is 73 feet 6 inches; and the width, including the aisles, is 56 feet 7 inches: calculated to accommodate upwards of 1200 persons. It is built with Swanage stone, having the quoins, and jambs, and other dressed portions, of Bath stone. The height of the nave is 47 feet; the height of the tower, including the spire, is 110 feet; and the entire cost, including a very deep foundation of concrete, is 8350*l*. The adjoining schools, in corresponding style, are for boys, and girls, and infants, and there is a residence for a mistress over the infants' school.

As an effective architectural group, the designs of the Church and Schools reflect high credit upon the taste and skill of the architect, Mr. S. S. Teulon. The Church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of Winchester, with the accustomed ceremony, on Friday last, the 26th ult.

THE VICTORIA TOWER, GUERNSEY.

THE laying of the first stone of the Tower destined to commemorate the gracious visit to this island of her Majesty Queen Victoria and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on the 24th August, 1846, and the presentation to the four Infantry Regiments of the Royal Guernsey Militia of the new colours which her Majesty had been pleased to send to them, took place on Saturday last, being the day appointed for the celebration of her Majesty's birth.

"The object of the first ceremony," says the Guernsey Star, "was not to enact a pageant, to form a show, or to celebrate a triumph, but to do an act of duty to themselves, to their Queen, and to posterity: an act which should perpetuate the remembrance of a Sovereign's goodness and a people's love. Similar feelings attached to the presentation and reception of the colours. The militia had been represented to her Majesty as wavering in its faith, as lukewarm in its attachment to its Sovereign and her Government. Her Majesty had declared that she knew the men of Guernsey better; and by now confiding to their hands the banners which her representative was to deliver to them, she gave a precious assurance that she relied on their loyalty and honour. In such a spirit it was felt that the new colours were confided to the militia, and in such a spirit were they accepted."

At an early hour on Saturday morning the whole island was up and stirring. From the country parishes the militiamen were seen hastening to their respective places of rendezvous. By seven o'clock, the whole of the town, and the shipping in the harbour and the roads, were profusely decorated with flags; whilst, at various parts through which processions were expected to pass, there were erected beautiful arches composed of branches, flowers, flags, and military emblems.

At eight o'clock the militia regiments were on the spots severally appointed for their musterings; and, having been formed and received their ammunition, the whole, with the exception of nine guns which were posted on the New Ground, and the right flank companies of the four Infantry regiments, which were detached to the residence of Colonel Brock, to act as a guard of honour to the new colours, took position on the vacant ground adjoining the site of Victoria Tower, between nine and ten o'clock, seven guns being placed in battery to fire a Royal salute.

At eight o'clock, the members of the three Masonic Lodges of the island met at the Assembly-rooms, to arrange the form of their procession. By the same time the persons who had taken tickets for the scaffolding erected near the site of the tower began to take their places: and, shortly after nine, the members of the committee, the magistrates, the clergy, and various ladies and gentlemen who had the entrée to the platform, began to assemble; the interior circle being kept by a company of Rifles, from each of the four regiments, under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Falla.

At about half-past nine o'clock, a movement in the crowd and the sound of music announced the approach of the masonic procession, which, having left the Assembly-rooms, proceeded along Market-street, Fountain-street, High-street, Smith-street, Grange-road, and Doyle-road, through an immense crowd of spectators.

Precisely at ten o'clock, his Excellency Major-General John Bell, Lieutenant-Governor, accompanied by Lady Catherine Bell, and attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Bainbridge, Fort Major and Adjutant, and other officers, arrived at the site of the Tower, where his Excellency and suite were received by Thomas Carey, Esq., President; and other members of the Committee, clergy, gentry, &c.; and were greeted by bands of music. Lady Catherine Bell, Mrs. Stafford Carey, and other ladies being seated near the apparatus for lowering the foundation-stone, and the members of the Committee, the local authorities, the Freemasons, and others having arranged themselves round the spot, the President, Mr. Thomas Carey, addressed the Lieutenant-Governor, and solicited his Excellency to lay the Foundation-stone of the edifice, and Lady C. Bell to name the edifice; both which requests were assented to.

Lady Bell and his Excellency having briefly addressed the company, General Bell was invested with a masonic apprentice's apron, and presented with a silver trowel, a glass cup of coins, and a brass inscription plate. A mallet having now been delivered to the Lieutenant-Governor, his Excellency placed the coins in the foundation-stone, covering them with the inscribed plate, and having spread some mortar on the upper stone, which was then suspended, the stone was lowered to its place, and the General striking it three times with the mallet, said, "I declare the stone just laid to be the foundation stone of the tower to be erected in honour of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria." The announcement was greeted by loud and long-continued cheers. On their cessation, the Rev. Thomas Brock, rector of St. Pierre-du-Bois, approached the stone and delivered in a solemn and impressive manner a prayer, which was listened to with deep attention, the whole of the male part of the assembly standing with heads uncovered. This was followed by the Lord's Prayer.

At the conclusion of the prayers a flag was hoisted on a staff when a salute of twenty-one guns was fired by the Artillery, and the bands struck up "God save the Queen." The music having ceased,

Peter Stafford Carey, Esq., the Bailiff and President of the States of Guernsey, addressed the assemblage, asserting the warm attachment of the men of Guernsey to the throne and the country.

The address excited the greatest enthusiasm, and was continually responded to by hearty cheers.

The National Anthem, with additional verses in honour of Prince Albert, was then sung, accompanied by the band of the 1st Regiment, nearly the whole of the assemblage heartily joining.

Cheers were then given for "The Lieutenant-Governor," "Lady Catherine Bell," "The Bailiff," "Mrs. Stafford Carey and the Ladies," &c.; after which the assemblage moved off to the New Ground in order to witness the PRESENTATION OF THE COLOURS.

The infantry regiments, on arriving on the ground, formed contiguous double column of companies at quarter distance, on the centre facing the north. The 1st and 2nd Regiments then wheeled up, and, with the guard of honour to the colours, formed a square, the ranks open, and officers and colours in front of the regiments, the ground being kept by the men of the Artillery. On the arrival of his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor the troops presented arms, and the band of the 1st Regiment played "God save the Queen." The commanding officers then dismounted, and, with the officers appointed to receive the colours, advanced towards the General, the band of the 2nd Regiment playing in quick time. The colours were then brought forward, when the Lieutenant-Governor addressed the troops. The colours were then delivered to Colonel Bell and other officers, the Colonel addressing his Excellency

The Rev. Richard Potenger, Rector of St. Martin's, being then requested by the Lieutenant-Governor to ask a benediction on the colours, pronounced prayers, the officers who held the colours kneeling during the sacred ceremony.

The regiments then deployed and formed a hollow square of four regiments, the artillery manned their guns, and the guard rejoined their regiments. The colours were then trooped from the right of the 1st Regiment, keeping three paces in front of the line of officers. On the colours of the 1st Regiment reaching the centre of the corps, they took the place of the old colours, which passed to the rear through the centre, and so in succession to the 3d, 4th, and 2d Regiments. The brigade fired a feu de joie, as did the infantry; and after other exercises, the troops marched off the ground, and thus terminated the ceremony.

The troops, which on this occasion were under the command of Colonel Bell, consisted of about 2000 men, with sixteen nine-pounders.

The above proceedings closed soon after one o'clock. From that time till night the town was a scene of festivity and rejoicing. At Marshall's, Gardner's, Cole's, Laval's, and other hotels, parties were collected to do honour to the day: and at Renier's Crown Hotel a numerous party of Freemasons sat down to an excellent dinner. The shops and other places of business were kept closed throughout the day; in short, the holiday was as complete as it was gratifying.

We annex an engraving of the foundation ceremony, from a clever drawing by Mr. Paul J. Naftel, of Guernsey, whose graphic aid in illustration of her Majesty's visit to the island will be pleasurably remembered by our readers. Beyond the scene of the ceremony are shown in the view, the town house of Lord De Saumarez, towards the centre; and to the right, Castle Court, St. James's Church, and Elizabeth College.

Appended, also, is a perspective view of the Victoria Tower, a massive castellated structure, of noble design, by Mr. W. B. Colling, architect. The bold corbel-work, the embattled turrets at the angles, and lantern or flag tower, are entitled to the warmest commendation.

BRONZE STATUE OF THE LATE SIR CHARLES MORGAN, BART., OF TREDEGAR PARK, MONMOUTHSHIRE.

It will be in the recollection of our readers that, some time since, a Committee was formed of noblemen and gentlemen, of which Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., M.P., is Chairman, and John Heilbar, Esq., Honorary Secretary, for erecting a public Statue in honour of the late Sir Charles Morgan, Bart., on some eligible site in the rising town of Newport. To the schools and other institutions of this town the late venerable Baronet was a liberal benefactor, and will long be remembered for his princely munificence in promoting the interests of agriculture, and establishing prizes at his annual Tredegar Cattle Show, which have been liberally carried out by his son and successor to his vast estates the present Sir Charles Morgan, Bart.

The Statue is upwards of nine feet high, and is rapidly progressing in the studio of the sculptor, Mr. J. Evan Thomas, by whose permission our artist has made the above sketch.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

FASHION has not yet resumed its empire at Paris. However, many pleasing novelties display their attractions to the eyes of the Elégantes, who, not scared by the sound of the drum, beating day and night, still dare venture on the "Chaussée d'Antin," the only part where new and graceful toilets present themselves. But, before detailing the fashions for June—which a heat of 27 degrees (Centigrade) has somewhat regulated—let us glance at the novel physiognomy of elegant Paris.

Fashion, the queen of every epoch in France, would not exile herself from this country: frightened at first, she hid herself at the back of our most celebrated Magazines: then, emboldened by the apparent calm and the reiterated appeals of the fine days of the youthful Republic, she ventured within a few perfumed boudoirs, from whence she issued her decrees to all Europe, eager for her decisions. Never at any period have summer materials been fresher or more inviting than this year: the most diaphanous tissues envelope elegant ladies with their folds, and the luxury of ribbons is carried to its apogee. The foreigner who about seven o'clock in the evening would walk from the Madeleine to the Boulevard Montmartre, would soon learn whether the recitals which he has read in the newspapers, and in his private correspondence, are not mysteries: there order, tranquillity, elegance, and pleasure abound; the women are pretty and graceful, and their costumes are recherché. The newest dresses, the most becoming bounets, the most tasteful chaussure, attract admiration. At Tortoni's, brilliant colours predominate; and the men, with all the profusion of a "mise comme il faut," relate their warlike exploits of the morning. In this little retired corner of the metropolis, Fashion appears furtive and fearful, but always new. Still, do not go beyond the Boulevard Montmartre, for there the truth of the position is revealed to you, with all its terrors. There, as far as the Bastille, no more flowers, no more gauzes, no more light materials, beautiful laces, or slender figures of Parisian elegance; but the sovereign people enveloped in coarse houses; and crowds of caps and haggard faces, rendered thin by suffering, seem to demand the solution of a great social problem.

Notwithstanding all this, an important point of fashion has been decided at Paris. The form of mantles has been, at last, definitively settled, and our engraving represents the new shape. The mantles are all made of silk glacé, as long before as behind; ribbon, pleated à la vieille, surrounds the mantle; a deep lace falls on the dress all round it, and forms a kind of second skirt, extremely graceful. three large rosettes of ribbon the same colour close the mantle up the front, and two others ornament the openings as high as the elbows.

The Dress is in material d'écorce d'arbre, a very light grey, trimmed up the front with a row of buttons of the same stuff; the bodice is high, and rich Valenciennes lace is placed round the top.

The Bonnet is of white rice-straw; and three yellow shaded flowers are worn on the right side. The shape of the bonnet is wide, but close under the chin, in the form of a balloon.

The second figure in the engraving is prettily attired for visiting: a high full bodice of silk plaid, light lilac, and a long sash of lilac watered silk; the sleeves, tight at the top, but gradually full from the elbow, discover puffing under-sleeves of Indian muslin, drawn in at the wrist by an embroidered insertion. The skirt of the dress is trimmed with four flounces of the same material, festooned with lilac silk; the flounces are nearly plain. A little collar, finely embroidered, completes this novel toilette.

The silk bonnet, rose de Rengale, is covered with thin gauze; and a simple twist of stout ribbon, with a small bow and long end, suffices to ornament it.

Children's dress is more than ever the study of mothers. The little boy represented in the engraving has on a little velvet tunic, closed up the front, a fine French cambric collar, very short white trousers à la matelot, plaid stockings, with gaiters of grey castil, and japanned leather shoes.

The men's coats are made very open up the front; the lappels are wide, the collar of the coat sets close to that of the shirt, and the lappels descend almost perpendicularly, growing wider on the hips. Striped trousers are quite the fashion. The shirts are worn plain, of magnificent French cambric. The bows of the cravats are small, and without ends. Some young men have attempted to bring into fashion waistcoats à la Robespierre; but good taste has speedily rendered justice to these extravagances by consigning them to ridicule.

The Republican tendencies exercise no longer influence in the ladies' dress. Red and blue, in the same toilette are rigidly avoided; and the mixture of divers colours is seldom seen even on elegantly dressed persons. They prefer very pale shades; the colour of nankin is still fashionable, but gris de lin, gris d'artoise, pale lilac, and ash colour, are much worn by those who usually display good taste. The shoes for boots are scarcely thought of) are made of the same colour as the dress. This reform in the chaussure has at length occasioned progress in stockings, so long neglected. Nothing can equal the fineness, the transparency of those which are worn at Paris, and form part of a lady's trousseau; they could be drawn through a ring. With these fine stockings, and small shoes of gros de Naples, colour isabelle, and an imperceptible rosette in the centre, the women are exquisitely chaussées.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

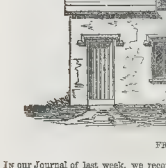
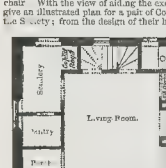
FRONT ELEVATION. END ELEVATION.

In our Journal of last week, we recorded the very interesting proceedings at the Anniversary Meeting of the Society for Improving the Condition of the Labouring Classes; his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the President, in the chair. With the view of aiding the excellent objects of the Association, we now give an illustrated plan for a pair of Cottages for Agricultural Districts, issued by the Society; from the design of their honorary Architect, Mr. H. Roberts, F.S.A.



GROUND FLOOR PLAN.

In this plan, the ground-floor provides a living-room, entered through an internal porch or lobby, a small wash house or scullery, a pantry, with a store or coals under the staircase, and other conveniences.



UPPER FLOOR PLAN.

The upper-floor, which is partly in the roof, provides three bed-rooms, varying in size, and one of them with a fire-place.

The cost of such a pair of Cottages, built in a substantial manner, either in the country or in the neighbourhood of London, must depend on the price of bricks and other materials, the expense of labour and carriage, and other varying circumstances.

The Committee recommend that, where practicable, the front of these Cottages should have somewhat of a southern aspect, and that particular attention be paid to securing a dry foundation; and where this is not otherwise obtainable, artificial means should be adopted, by forming a substratum of concrete, about twelve inches thick, or by building slate in cement through the whole thickness of the wall under the floor-level; or asphalte may be used for the same purpose.

SECTION.

The ground-floor should be raised not less than six inches above the external surface; and, where wood floors are used, they should be ventilated by means of air-bricks built in the external walls.

For the external walls, brick being usually less porous—is preferable to stone, unless the latter be rough-cast; and with a view to securing a perfectly dry habitation, the external walls to the living-rooms should be built hollow, twelve inches thick, with stretchers laid flat, having a space of three inches between them; and the headers twelve inches deep, bonding through the wall, or nine inches deep with a three-inch closer.

Hollow bricks have been recently introduced for Cottage walls with good effect, and in some parts of the country, concrete walls, twelve inches thick, have been adopted, as the Committee are informed, with satisfactory results, and considerable saving of expense.

The roof may be covered with slate or plain tiles.

The partitions on the upper floor should be framed an inch and a half thick, and the same to those on the ground-floor between the scullery, pantry, and living-room. The remaining partitions on the ground-floor to be half-inch plank.

The windows to have chamfered wood frames, with strong zinc or cast-iron casements. The shutters to the front ground-floor windows may be conveniently arranged to answer the purpose of a table, by hinging them at the bottom to fall into a recess; the support being formed with two moveable bars, hinged at the back of the shutter.

The flue from a small copper may be carried up in the back external wall; and, where brick ovens are required, they should be built as shown, by the side of the kitchen fire-place, the oven doors being formed on the opposite side.

For efficient ventilation, an air-flue, 9 inches by 4½, should be carried up in the jamb of the ground-floor chimney, towards the window, commencing under the floor-level; and passing into the flue from the bed-room chimney; an opening being formed into it immediately under the ceiling of the living-room, filled in with a plate of perforated zinc. The bed-room over the living-room may be aired and warmed by a pipe, two inches diameter, passing through this flue from the side of the fireplace on the ground-floor, and opening into the bed-room above; or a distinct flue may be carried up for this purpose on the opposite side of the fireplace. The bed-rooms without a fireplace should have an aperture in the partition over the door, filled in with a perforated zinc ventilator.

Lithographed Working Drawings, with a specification for these Cottages, have been prepared, and may be had of the Secretary to the Society, Mr. Wood, No. 21, Exeter Hall.

A pair of Cottages upon this plan has been built by Mr. J. L. Osler, of Grantham, at a cost, by contract, of £140. These cottages are situated at Gonerby, about one mile from Grantham. The gentleman Mr. George Dans, of the same place, has completed his contract in the most satisfactory manner. The doors, window jambs, and tables, are of stone, which gives the exterior of the cottages a very neat effect. The flues in the chimneys cross each other, to prevent smoaking. There are zinc gutter-pipes back and front; and there is a boiler-range in the living-room. Mr. Martin, the Society's agent, has inspected these cottages, and reported as above. He is prepared to let the contract in any part of the country, on condition of being allowed the extra cost and carriage of materials, according to the district, compared with Grantham. Mr. Osler intends letting the above cottages, with thirty poles, or garden ground, attached, at £4 per annum each.

GERMANY UNMASKED; or, Facts and Coincidences, Explanatory of her Real Views in Seeking to Wrest Schleswig from Denmark: with Remarks on the Chevalier Bunsen's "Memoir." Richardson.

The purport of this volume is to show that, whilst the plea put forth by Germany, represented by Prussia, in justification of her aggression upon Denmark, is the preservation of an alleged indissoluble connection between Schleswig and Holstein, the object which she really has in view is to enforce, under cover of this plea, the accession of Schleswig as well as Holstein to the Zollverein, in order to obtain possession of their ports, and the navigation of the Elder. The author bears out this conclusion by a variety of facts; more especially, by a translation which he gives of part of an important German work, entitled "Our Present and Future," published in 1845, wherein the line of conduct that the German Governments have since adopted in regard to Schleswig is laid down, and the project for rendering Germany a great maritime and commercial power developed. The concluding part of the volume consists of animadversions on the Chevalier Bunsen's "Memoir," this being shown to contain some serious errors and mis statements.

The author of this work is entitled to praise, for placing within the compass of a hundred pages the actual state of a question, which it is the interest of party-spirit to invest with difficulties which have no existence but in the minds of those who raise them. The present publication must, therefore, be regarded as of instant value and interest, especially to the commercial community.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

A great reckoning in a little room.—SHAKSPEARE

In the next edition of the Encyclopædia of Rural Sports we shall find the particulars of a pastime of modern origin, the description of which is supplied by our motto. Racing, abstractedly considered, has yielded its popularity to tarbetting. A few scores of gentlemen of sporting tastes and habits supply the machinery whereupon hundreds of thousands, gentle and simple (and the antitheses of both), gamble, "without remorse or ruth." Everything is set aside for the idolatry of the Golden Calf. Had Monday been settling day for the Derby, does anybody suppose there would have been a regatta on the Thames? As it fell four-and twenty hours later, however, the lover of amateur aquatics has not deayed his diversion. To be sure, had it turned out otherwise, there would have been nothing to regret, for, without a sign from Zephyrus, what is a sailing race in water fresh or salt? On Monday, then, to speak within the letter, the Royal Thames Yacht Club had its first drilling match of the season, a nautical achievement, wherein several yachts, of different classes, for various prizes, floated with the ebb from Erith towards Southend, and back again, at the mercy of the calm, and by reason of the flood, to the place from whence they came. Since Coleridge wrote his "Ancient Mariner," there hath appeared no tale of the waters so pitiful as the narrative of this voyage given in the journals of the following day. For fifteen mortal hours did the hapless company, on board the City of Canterbury, gasp at a degree of temperature that would have grilled a salamander. In vain they shouted for champagne, and all liquids afterwards, even to extremest ginger-beer. As wonderful, they never betbought them of the element on which they swam—

"Their mouths gaped like to cracks of earth
When dried to summer dust; till tongues by pain
Men really know not what good waters worth."

It was drawing fast for midnight on this sad sailing was brought to an end. The Darring won the £80, the Secret the £60, and the crew of the Canterbury their freedom from their floating purgatory. This latter word reminds us of our theme . . . .

"To our muttons," as the French say when they would "hark back" from digression: . . . . to our muttons . . . .

The spoonist brutes in question are, it is stated, all to sticks.

On Tuesday last there was "a great reckoning in a little room" night Tattersall's, at Hyde Park Corner. From the details of the doings the journalist is deterred by fcon of the law of libel. Levanting hath its privileges. The reckoning was better than could be expected. habit hath taught the floaters in the sea not to be too sanguine about returns. Several legs have "gone," some it is said to come again, others on a perpetual pilgrimage. As yet, what has befallen the "sweeps" is not known. It is to be hoped that they have some dew with the dust. In the Sheet Calendar of the 3.st ult. there was published an order of the Jockey Club to this intent: "An alteration shall be made in the betting-posts on the flat at Newmarket: there shall in future be one instead of two, and it shall be more completely enclosed, and none but subscribers admitted to it." . . . That is to say, the speculation shall henceforth be more circumscribed a very wholesome determination.

The Royal meeting at Ascot Heath commences on Tuesday next. It is, as befits the occasion, the most legitimate, and, at the same time, the most gorgeous passage of horse-racing in which it is to be found that they have some dew with the dust. In the Sheet Calendar of the 31st ult. there was published an order of the Jockey Club to this intent: "An alteration shall be made in the betting-posts on the flat at Newmarket: there shall in future be one instead of two, and it shall be more completely enclosed, and none but subscribers admitted to it." . . . STATE PROSECUTIONS.—CONVICTION AND TRANSPORTATION OF MR. JOHN MITCHELL.

On Friday, last week, Mr Mitchell was put on his trial, in Dublin, for sedition, under the act passed in April last, and having been found guilty, was, on Saturday, sentenced to 14 years' transportation.

On the same (Saturday) evening, at half-past four o'clock, Mitchell was removed from Newgate in the police van, which was guarded by a strong force of cavalry, and conveyed to the North-wall, where he was put on board the Shearwater, government steamer, which immediately sailed for Spike Island, near Cork. There was a large crowd near the point of embarkation, who cheered the ill-fated man as the vessel steamed away with him

There was much excitement in the court after the sentence was passed, and M. Doheny, Mr. T. F. Meagher, and other friends of the unfortunate man having applauded some sentiments of defiance which Mr. Mitchell addressed to the court, they were taken into custody for contempt of court; but subsequently, on stating that they had chosen to show any contempt by the demonstration may had made, they were released.

ARRIVAL OF MR. MITCHELL AT CORK.—The vessel that brought John Mitchell to Spike Island in the harbour of Cork on Sunday, and hence it dropped its anchor he was landed on the island, and handed over to the custody of the governor. He was brought on shore from the vessel by two of the Dublin police, and the Irish felon. Shortly after his arrival, Captain Atkins, of Walworth, the Inspector of the Penitentiary, gave orders that a separate room should be provided for him, and that he should not be interfered with for that day; but that, on the next, he would be obliged to wear the convict dress, and be treated in all respects as an ordinary convict.

On Monday morning the Scourge, Commander Wingrove, left Portsmouth to proceed to Cork, for the purpose of conveying Mr. Mitchell to Bermuda, at which place he is to undergo his sentence of transportation for fourteen years

A subscription has been commenced throughout Ireland for the unhappy man's bereaved wife and children, and on Saturday evening it already amounted to £400. Since then small subscriptions are pouring in every day to the Mitchell fund. The following note is from Lord Clonearry :—

"DEAR VANS AGNEW, SIR,—I request you will be SMART.

"Very few, and Dear Sir,—I pray you to render the enclosed acceptable to Mrs. John Mitchell for herself and children. The miserable state to which the country has been reduced by the Union, and the flagrant abuses of our Government to which we have been subjected, prevents my offering more to that unhappy lady.

"Very sincerely and respectfully yours,
"CLONCURRY."

Mrs Mitchell is a niece of Sir W. Farn, M.P., and was married at the early age of fifteen years. She is the mother of four children, the eldest of whom is nine years old.

The two indictments against Mr. Mitchell for sedition, which were to have been tried in the present term, have been abandoned by the Crown. Notices have been served upon the two juries which had been struck for the trial of those two cases, intimating that their attendance will not be required

The Crown has yet taken no step in proceeding with new trials in the cases of Messrs. Smith O'Brien and Meagher; but it is said they will be tried in the present term.

The United Irishman newspaper is extinct, the Crown having fully carried out the sequestration against the property of Mr. Mitchell, so far as the printing materials are concerned, by a seizure, on Saturday afternoon, at the office of that paper. However, a new journal, or rather the United Irishman revived, is announced by the following characteristic notification :—

"THE 'UNITED IRISHMAN.'

"TO THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND

"John Mitchell is a captive in the hands of our enemies. His office, types, and newspaper machinery are in the hands of the police. The United Irishman is at an end: but, under another name, we are anxiously preparing to resume it; and, as soon as we can get together the necessary material of a newspaper, the United Irishman will again appear under the sovereign style, title, and dignity of the Irish Felon, to sustain the principles and accomplish the intentions of the illustrious man who is taken from amongst us. In this case we but discharge our clear duty to our country and to him.

"The signature of the Irish Felon shall be found in new dress.

"All debts due to the United Irishman, though not recoverable by English law, should be paid to William Mitchell, 8, Ontario-terrace, Rathmines, Dublin, to whom all communications should be addressed for the present. All debts due by our friend shall be paid as soon as possible, or be made chargeable on the Irish Felon, which shall be ready, though not legally, his property

"Subscribers to the United Irishman shall be supplied with the Irish Felon as soon as possible, and any time that may intervene shall be allowed them in the form of subscription.

"T. DEVIN REILLY.
"JOHN MAGEE."

The Roman Catholic clergy of four dioceses have adopted addresses to the Queen, praying a repeal of the Union. In a fifth diocese, Ardagh, a similar address has been altered by the clergy to suit their views. The Roman Catholic Bishop of that diocese, Dr. O'Higgins, is at present in Rome.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

The weekly meeting of this body was held on Monday in Conciliation Hall, Dublin. The meeting was more crowded than on ordinary occasions, in the expectation that reference would be made by some of the speakers to the proceedings of the past week

Mr Burke, Barrister, having been called to the chair, proceeded to refer to the trial of Mr. Mitchell. He described the packed jury, and how the loaded dice Whigs (blesses) had cast aside the mass, and proclaimed as practically as if they had written it on the walls of the city, that they had suspended the constitution

Mr Galwey proposed the following resolutions :—

"That in the late case of the "Queen v. John Mitchell," the jury selected to try the accused was packed to secure a foregone conclusion.

"That, therefore, the verdict of that jury is no evidence of Mr. Mitchell's guilt

"That any punishment based upon that verdict is an act of arbitrary power, and a blow struck through the medium of jury-packing at the lives and liberties of Irishmen.

"That, under the circumstances, it is the bounden duty of Ireland to adopt the resolutions of Mr Mitchell's friends, and to provide for their comfort and education at the public expense, during that gentleman's absence from this country.

"That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to Mr. Mitchell, accompanied by an expression of sincere condolence on the part of this Association."

Mr. J. O'Connell, in seconding the resolutions, observed of the conviction of Mr. Mitchell, that it was fully and completely done. It was an act of vengeance on the part of the Crown, and had lost the character of justice. (Cheers.) Lord Clarendon was revenged. (Hisses.) Lord John Russell was revenged. (Cheers) for the past reproaches which Mr. Mitchell had flung upon him. (Cheers.) But he could tell them that Mr. Mitchell, an Northern Island, or in whatever place the sent him, would be more powerful against the Government in his banishment for principles and doctrines, than ever he could be at home. (Cheers.) He (Mr. J. O'Connell) most sincerely regretted, that, if that unfortunate man the Attorney General (hisses) should speak to any of his fellow-Catholics, they would not upon him. (Loud cheers.) He had spit upon his fellow-Catholics, and he had proclaimed that they were unworthy of being boatved upon their oaths. He (Mr. J. O'Connell) trusted he would not dare to speak to Catholics. Any one once, but would consider himself degraded by continuing to know him. (Loud cheers.) He (Mr. John O'Connell) was almost ashamed of the name of Catholic, in which he was accustomed to glory, because that man could do so, and by the same name. (Cheers.) He should not occupy the attention of the Association with anything so base, so unfounded, and so degrading. (Loud cheers.) But those who would defend him after such an act must fall into the same depth of infamy and degradation into which that unfortunate man had himself fallen (Cheers.) He would call on the chivalrous spirits that knew how to use its claims, not sing,y to expose themselves to be struck down, but let them, and themselves together, and present the unbroken front of determined and united firmness. (Cheers.) They should not be driven to the extremity of saying they would not sit down in tame submission if the constitution were taken from them, and for for ever the degraded slaves of England. ## THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.

Mr. Hume has communicated the following letter to the journals

London, 5, Bryanstone-square, May 31, 1848

SIR,—I beg to say, in reply to your letter, that no more official notice has been given to my motion of the 29th of June, in favour of reform, than by petitions to parliament, emanating from public meetings or otherwise, confined to the inhabitants of the several districts, and I recommend that the petitions be adopted through the medium of the representatives for the respective local ities where such petitions are originated. As I find it impossible to reply separately to the numerous letters being addressed to me from different parts of Great Britain, inquiring by what means co-operation can be best afforded to the reform movement, I have availed myself of this mode of sending you an answer, in order that it may be read by my correspondents generally in the columns of the public press.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, JOSEPH HUME

MR. W. Livesey, Chairman, Preston, Lancashire.

P.S.—I recommend great care in receiving signatures, and only those residing in the locality, as much discredit has been brought upon petitions by the insertion of fictitious names.—J. H.

REFORM IN MARY-LE-BONE.—On Wednesday, at a meeting held in the Mary-le-bone Court house, to consider the necessity of securing a diminution of the taxation of the country by means of an extensive reform in the constitution of the House of Commons, Mr. Moore, a member of the Mary-le-bone vestry, presiding, the following resolutions were unanimously carried: 1. That any agitation for a reform of the Commons House of Parliament, or the introduction of any other system than the present, on a more extended measure of political enfranchisement, would be calculated to excite popular discontent and disaffection among the country. 2. That the Prime Minister or her Majesty's government having failed to introduce a measure for the purpose of extending the elective franchise, and thereby to secure a reform, it is hereby resolved that a public meeting of the parishioners of [illegible] be called to express their opinion on the propriety of petitioning the House of Commons in favour of the suffrage, vote by ballot, triennial parliaments, and equal electoral districts.

WEST LONDON REFORM ASSOCIATION.—On Wednesday evening, a large meeting of the inhabitants of Chelsea, Kensington, Hammersmith, and Fulham was held at the Wellesley Arms, Robert-street, Chelsea, in support of the local association formed for obtaining an extension of the suffrage, triennial parliaments, vote by ballot, and the equal representation of the boroughs of the kingdom, as an efficient measure of sanatory reform, a reform of the existing laws relating to the relief of the poor, a proper application of the funds known to exist in this country for charitable purposes, and the formation into a borough of the above [illegible]. Resolutions in accordance with those objects having been passed, the meeting separated.

REFORM IN LIVERPOOL.—On Wednesday, at noon, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Liverpool, promoted by the Financial Reform Association recently formed in that town, was held in the Amphitheatre, Lime-street. The meeting was convened by the requisitionists, and was called to express their opinion on the propriety of petitioning parliament to take immediate measures, by wise and prudent retrenchment and just revision of taxation, to equalise the ordinary expenditure with the ordinary income of the country. The meeting was convened by J. B. Forwood, Esq., the mayor, in compliance with a requisition numerously and respectably signed. Several speeches having been delivered, resolutions in favour of the new Reform Movement were unanimously adopted.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

There has been an increasing demand for money within the last few days, and a decided improvement in the home trade. The shortness of Stocks that has been general, both in the country and with retail houses, for some months past, now naturally requires renewal, the fine weather giving an impetus to the summer demand. Till very recently business has been nearly confined to actual daily requirements, but gradually the tone of confidence has returned, and hopes that extended transactions are now becoming daily apparent; and, as the prospect of harvest promises favourably, increased employment in the manufacturing districts would be confidently anticipated.

Although superficially the aspect of Continental affairs is more tranquil, no relief in events progressing towards permanent tranquillity is entertained. Many vague feelings of uneasiness are still entertained in the Continental towns as to the manufacturing districts, have caused a heaviness in the English Market, Consols registering a fall of about ¼ per cent. during the week. At the opening of the Market on Monday Consols opened at 84¾ to ¾, the last quotation of the preceding week closing, after a quiet day, at 84¾ to ¾. This trifling decline increased on Tuesday, Consols closing about ¼ per cent. lower than on Monday. Sales were again effected on Wednesday at the same quotations as on the previous day, Consols to 83⅞, ultimately quoting 84¼. On Thursday the week was scarcely a fluctuation; Consols opening at 83⅞ to 84, and closing at that price The absence of speculative business in the Stock Exchange continues in a great degree, the close high for Bullion, and the account draws too near its termination to make it a safe operation. Exchequer Bills are firm, at an improvement (taking into consideration the reduction in the rate of interest) to-day. The last quotations for Consols for Reduced have tended to somewhat equalise prices, but Reduced is still the cheapest stock. At the close of the week the market was tranquil, at the following prices:—Bank Stock, 191; Reduced, 92¾; Consols, 84¾; New 3 per Cents, 84¾; Annuities, 1885, 83⅞; Long Annuities, 1860, 8⅞; Do., 1885, 8¼; India Bonds, £1000, 19 pm; Do., under £1000, 22 pm; South Sea Stock, 92¾; Do., Old Annuities, 89; Bank Stock for Account, 191; Consols for Account, 84¾; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 34 pm; Do. Small, 32 pm; Do. Advertised, 22 pm.

The Foreign Market has been very inanimate during the week, and since settling day (Wednesday), when the backed-off quarter's dividends left a large disposition evinced to open new accounts. Fluctuations have scarcely exceeded the difference between the buying and selling price, with the exception of Spanish Three per Cents, which have improved about ¼ per cent. At the close of the week the market was dull, and the only transactions registered were as the following rates:—Brazilian Bonds, 79; Grenada Bonds, 1 per cents, 11; Mexican, 5 per cents, 1849, 19; Do. Deferred, 18¾; Russian Bonds, 105; Spanish 5 per cent., Passive, 9¾; Ditto 3 per cent., 23; Ditto, Account, 23; Dutch 2½ per cents., 52 guilds., 43.

The demand for Railway Shares has still very subsided; rates are consequently lower. Still there is disposition to fluctuate, and the panic that had seized the public mind with regard to the description of investment is yielding to time and reason. The dividend-paying lines continue in the same demand, as the following list will show:—Caledonian, 31; Eastern Counties, 14; Do., New Guaranteed 6 per Cents, 3; East Lincolnshire, 20; Great Northern, 94; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 22; Great North of England, 175; Do. New Cuts, 66; Great Western, 92; Do., Half shares, 53; Do., Quarter Shares, 16; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 69; Do., Thirds, 19; Do. Thirds (Reg.), 84; Leeds and Thirsk, 23½; Do. New, 8½; London and Blackwall, 4¾; London, Brighton, and S. Coast, 3¾; Do. Lond and N. Western, 128; Do., New, 8½; Do. Fifths, 7¾; Do., £10 (Lond and B.), 4½; Do., £10 (L. and B.), 2¾; London and South Western, 47½; Ditto New, £40, 7½; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire New £10 Preference, 7¼; Midland, 10½; Ditto Birmingham and Derby, 75; Ditto North British, Half shares, 10½; North Staffordshire, 10; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 3¾; Shrewsbury and Chester (Nor. W. Ass.), 5; Shropshire Union, 1½; South Wales, 8¾; Wilts, Somerset, and Weymouth, 1½; Do., New Guaranteed, 1; Do., New, 1; Ditto Original, New and Berwick, 2½; Ditto, ditto, No. 3, 11¾; Ditto, ditto, New Preference, 9¾; York and North Midland, 70; Ditto, Preference, 1½; Do., Loans and Arrears, 5; Madrid and Valentia, 4; Northern of France, 4¼.

SATURDAY MORNING. The Markets were quiet yesterday, and but few transactions occurred. Consols scarcely fluctuated during the day, closing at 83¾ to 84; while in Foreign Stock and Shares no important alteration was quoted.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The quantity of English wheat received fresh up to our market since Monday Last being one fair, the trade was very dull, and prices were barely supported. ## JUVENILE DESTITUTION AND CRIME.

The attention of earnest philanthropists and Christian men has long been directed with painful interest to the subject of Juvenile Destitution and Ignorance. The immensity of the evil has been repeatedly dwelt upon. Society has been over and over again warned of the urgent duty it neglected; of the peril it encountered; of the abominations which it allowed to increase, by its refusal to undertake, as a whole, the mighty task of elevating the moral and physical condition of the children that swarm in our great towns and cities in all but incredible and yearly increasing numbers. These children are steeped to the lips in misery; they are adepts in evil doing, apprentices to swindling, robbery, and murder. To say nothing of the disgrace, the evil, the misery, and all the imaginable pollution and wickedness of which they are both the instruments and the victims, they cost this nation annually immense sums for their punishment. It is they that are the feeders of our penitentiaries in their youth; of our prisons, hulks, and penal settlements, in their maturity. It is they that force us to keep up an army of gaolers and policemen. It is they that make necessary our fearfully large expenditure for criminal justice in all its various forms; from the policeman's truncheon to the penal fortress of Newgate—from the manacles that bind the hands of the solitary felon, to the fleets of convict ships that are employed in transporting him and his compeers to the Antipodes. We punish them, but we fail to correct them. We expend our resources upon them, but we get nothing but their curses in return. We rule them by terror, and are repaid by their hatred. We treat them as if the sole object of law was to make war upon and destroy them, and they pay us back after a similar fashion, and live as if the sole object of their lives was to make war against law and against society itself; of which law is but the minister. The warning voice has often been raised; but our legislature has hitherto paid but little attention to the matter. The remedy has been suggested, but it has been left untried; the powerful have agreed that the subject was important, but have done nothing; and benevolent men in every part of the country, and in every walk of life, struck by the enormity of the evil, have endeavoured to alleviate the mischief which they could not cure, and lessen within their own sphere of usefulness the ignorance and the misery which they found it impossible to remove. In this way something has been done. A beginning has been made; and a hope of better things has been removed from the category of the visionary into that of the practicable. But all these efforts, noble, disinterested, humane, and Christian as they have been, have hitherto been directed to but one development of the evil. They have coped to some extent with the IGNORANCE of these multitudes of children, but they have been unable to do anything to lighten the load of the appalling and augmenting DESTITUTION. Sunday Schools, Ragged Schools, and Industrial Schools of all kinds, supported by Churchmen and Dissenters, separately or together, have been established in various districts of London and throughout the country generally, and have each and all been instrumental in effecting good. To teach a few of these outcasts a portion of their duty to God and man, has been found practicable. To provide employment for them, and to put them in a way, after being instructed in their duty, of gaining an honest livelihood, has been beyond the strength of all the agents that have hitherto attempted it. Benevolence, however, has been nothing daunted. Always hopeful, and always cheerful, it has contented itself with doing its best in the meantime; and with appealing, even amid constant discouragement, to the State, to undertake as a whole the great task, upon which the safety of the country may, perhaps, depend, amid the perils that environ us. Many others, as earnest as the "Earnest Man" in Mackay's "Vision of Mockery," have exclaimed in the same sense:—

"Lo the children die—
The little children—and ye heed them not.
The children die: they perish, body and soul,
In pestilent lanes and rotting alleys vile—
Thousands on thousands, more than eyes can count.
God's sun shines on them, but they never heard
His name who made it. The fair world they tread
Is foul to them that never saw the fields,
The green trees, the great mountains, the bright streams,
Or knew that God, who fashion'd all things, loves
All He has made, and children most of all.
* * * * *
They prowl in fetid ways, and lie, and steal,
And curse; and never know that words can bless,
Or that such thing as blessing in this world
Was ever heard of. Save, oh! save them all;
If not for their sakes, for our own! Not one
Of all these myriads, were we truly wise,
Should perish thus, for, though they live in shame,
And fill the world with crime and miseries,
Great is their sorrow, but the guilt is ours."

Such appeals have been listened to. A movement has at length been made to consider the subject in all its vastness, and to ascertain whether society, represented by the State, would not, even on the point of economy, as well as that of civilization and Christianity, be a gainer, by devoting its care and its money to these children before they become convicts, instead of after. On Tuesday night, Lord Ashley, with this view, delivered to a very thin, but highly attentive and deeply interested House, one of the most affecting and valuable speeches ever heard within the walls of Parliament; a speech which reflects honour upon his understanding and his heart; and which, if he had made no other effort to deserve such renown, would have been sufficient to enshrine his name in the grateful remembrance of his contemporaries and posterity. His Lordship traversed the whole subject, and allowed no branch of it to escape him; but as his object was not to devise a scheme of National Education, but to remove, or diminish, by the agency of the State, the destitution of these young and unhappy Pariahs of our cities—the ulcer spots in the fair body of our civilisation—he dwelt at greatest length upon that portion of the evil which he considered to be of the most pressing kind, and the most susceptible of immediate remedy.

We must, however, before commenting on his Lordship's propositions, record our own belief, our most thorough and earnest conviction, that the question of National Education is even more important than that which he brought forward—that it must be considered immediately, in all its magnitude—that it is the question of questions for this country, and that we fail as a nation in doing our duty to ourselves, while we neglect to declare as a fundamental principle of our Government, that every child born within our boundaries has not only a right to its food from our charity, if food fails it from other sources (which we have already conceded), but a right to its education, from our justice (which we have not conceded.) We therefore wish that Lord Ashley had gone to the root of the matter in the measure which he presented all classes so thoroughly upon these mighty topics as to force unwilling Governments to undertake them, those who insist upon the importance of them both can but welcome every right attempt which is made in the direction of either. Of this kind is the movement of Lord Ashley—a movement which, as far as it goes, has our most cordial approval and sympathy. We will not follow his Lordship through the details of his speech, or attempt even a summary of the painful story of misery, ignorance, destitution, and crime, which he narrated with harrowing minuteness. The speech will be read through the length and breadth of the land; and society will, we trust, be startled by the convincing proofs thus brought under its cognizance of the danger which it fosters in its breast, to undertake without loss of time the remedy which good policy and self-preservation would demand, were there not higher principles of Christianity and philanthropy to urge it to the task. In order to make a beginning, and with the hope that the Government would aid the experiment—and, if it were found to answer, extend its operations to other large towns and cities, and to the rural districts of England, Scotland, and Ireland—his Lordship simply moved that it was expedient that means should be annually provided for the voluntary emigration to the Colonies of a certain number of young persons of both sexes, who have been educated in the schools usually called Ragged Schools in the metropolis. In the debate that ensued, the principle was fully conceded by every speaker; and the House in the most satisfactory manner expressed its acquiescence in the desirableness and expediency of ceasing to make a graduation in crime the necessary preliminary of any extension of the paternal care of the Government to the destitute youth of our empire. It was admitted on all hands that to make good conduct in Ragged or other schools the stepping-stone to the aid of the State, for conveyance to profitable and honourable employment in the colonies, was a vast improvement upon the course hitherto pursued—a boon to the recipients of the aid—a boon to the old and over-peopled country from which they were removed—and a still greater boon to the rich but under-peopled Colonies that would be but too happy to receive them. Sir George Grey, on the part of the Government, begged the withdrawal of the motion, distinctly affirming that Government were already acting upon the principles embodied in it, by the removal of youthful offenders at an earlier age than formerly from the scenes of their former contamination, and pledging himself and the Administration that no exertion would be omitted by the Home ration Commissioners, the Colonial Office, and the Government generally, to carry his views into operation as rapidly and as effectually as possible. Mr. Hawes followed on the same side, and was a little more precise than the Home Secretary. He stated, on the part of the Government, that the question of Emigration had engaged their earnest attention; that they proposed to ask for £10,000 this year, partly to defray the cost of sending the wives and families of convicts to Australia, and partly for the purposes of voluntary emigration from the Ragged Schools. He also stated that the colonies to be benefited would be called upon to contribute towards the expense, and expressed his conviction that if Lord Ashley would allow the Government time to mature a plan, something practicable might be devised, not limited in its operation to the metropolis, but extended to the whole kingdom. Upon this understanding Lord Ashley withdrew his motion. We trust, however, that his Lordship will be vigilant, and that he will not consider he has done enough in the matter, or trust too implicitly to the promises which have been made. The Government is not very certain of a long lease of power. More exciting topics will, in all probability, monopolise its attention while it lasts. The question will require constant working, that it may not be lost sight of amid the whirl and turmoil of party politics. We believe, however, that it is in good hands, and that Lord Ashley has given it an impetus that will expedite its solution.

BURNING OF THE ELECTORAL LISTS AT PARIS.

THE Engraving upon the preceding page represents one of those striking and fearful episodes of the great drama of the French Republic, of which the city of Paris has, for [illegible] four month's past, furnished so many instances for artistic composition.

It is truly melo-dramatic scene was enacted on Sunday night, at the Porte St. Denis, a favourite rendezvous of the turbulent. Thither a vast crowd flocked, [illegible] with open all the affiches bearing the name of Thiers which they could [illegible] the well placarded walls of Paris.

To these materials, they resolved to have a great auto da fé; the lists were, accordingly, torn to pieces with contempt, and burnt amidst the furious joy of the mob. There was a huge inflammable heap; but, not content with this bonfire, they wreaked their vengeance by burning the placards in their handkerchiefs to serve as another new light for the incensed ass! The blaze was tremendous, and, contrasted with the dark masses of people, had a sort of Rembrandt-like effect

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

ON Saturday last the National Assembly at the close of a most stormy discussion, divided on the proposition that it we be given to prosecute M. Louis Blanc for guilty participation in the events of the 15th of May, when there were—

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| For the proposition | .. | .. | .. | 337 |
| Against it | .. | .. | .. | 361 |
| Majority against the proposition | .. | .. | .. | 24 |

On this subject much difference of opinion was expressed in Paris. The prevailing one of the journals seemed to accord with the vote of the Assembly, that is, against the application for permission to prosecute the gentleman in question. This conclusion was founded on the absence of any evidence against M. Louis Blanc. If, however, in that respect the decision was favourable to M. Louis Blanc, there occurred in the course of the discussion incidents which showed that, as a political personage at least, the majority of the Assembly is opposed to him.

The state of Paris during the week may be described as "feverish." The elections going on for members of the National Assembly, in the room of those who, having been elected for Paris and other places, had chosen to sit for the latter—the question of the National Workshops—the obvious disunion between the members of the Government—the resignation of the law officers of the Republic, and the extraordinary scene between those gentlemen and M. Ledru Rollin in the Assembly on Monday, all leading to symptoms of agitation as well the tide of excitement. With respect to the elections, the Conservative party calculated on an increase of their strength in the Assembly, particularly in the returns for Paris, as the large number of candidates (60 for 11 vacancies) served to puzzle and distract the Ultra-Republicans, while the Modérés were understood to be acting with unanimity.

The Moniteur announces that the resignations of M. Portalis, Attorney-General of the Republic, and M. Landrin, Advocate-General, have been accepted by the Executive Government; and also publishes a proclamation, signed by M. Armand Marrast, Mayor of Paris, forbidding tumultuous assemblages in the streets.

Rumour continued to ascribe to the partisans of more than one pretender efforts to dispose the population to disaffection. Among other assertions of this kind we are told, that "there is at present in Paris an association composed of friends to Henry V., who pay idle men to assemble in groups at the Porte Saint Denis and the Porte St. Martin to create disorders." It is further asserted, that two white flags, decorated with fleurs-de-lis, are ready in the same quarter to be hoisted when the moment shall arrive.

A collision, which might have led to consequences of a very serious nature, was threatened on Monday evening. A large crowd of persons gathered together at the barracks in the Rue Faubourg du Temple, and insulted the soldiers. The latter became exasperated, and rushed out to attack the mob, but the officers interfered, and ordered their men to re-enter the barracks. The mob then attacked the officers themselves, calling them "Aristocrats," and continued to insult the troops, who had retired. The officers remonstrated for some time with unabated violence, when the exasperation of the troops rose to such a pitch that they attempted to force open the doors, which had been shut by order of the officers. Seeing that the men could not be controlled much longer, an officer came out of the barracks and addressed the mob, urging them to withdraw, and saying that if they did not he could not answer for the consequence As at the same time the troops were continuing their efforts to force their way out, the mob found it would not be safe to stand their ground any longer, and [illegible]

[illegible]ce of the railroads was not interrupted on Monday in Paris, notwithstanding the strike against the employment of English workmen. The trains left at the usual hour for Orleans, Versailles, and St. Germain's. Precautions had been adopted, and troops stationed along the lines for their protection.

The attempt of the engine-drivers on the Boulogne Railway to stop the working of the line, by striking en masse for higher wages and less work, has been completely foiled by the firmness of M. Thy, the chef d'exploitation. That gentleman immediately addressed a letter to the Journal de la Somme, declaring that the demands of the engine-men being altogether unreasonable, he, the engineers, and the other scientific men connected with the line, would rather work the engines themselves than allow such conditions to be imposed on them. On Sunday night M. Thy had completed his arrangements for a supply of new hands, and at present the regularity of the service is ensured.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

MONDAY.—The President took the chair at half-past one o'clock.

General Clement Thomas ascended the tribune to give some explanations relative to the words which had fallen from him when speaking of the decoration of the Legion of Honour. In designating it "a gewgaw of vanity" (hochet de la vanité) he never meant to allude to those brave men who had received it as a reward for their conduct on the field of battle. His thought, when he spoke, was directed to the dreadful abuse of the decoration during the last two reigns, when it was notoriously employed as a means of corruption. No one could suppose that he referred to any honourable man who had really merited the distinction by his services; but to prevent any misapprehension he now declared that he had not meant to offend any one.

The ouvrier honourably received.

The President: The order of the day is the monthly ballot for the nomination of the President of the Assembly. But before honourable representatives proceed to it, I wish to say a few words in relation to myself (Movement of attention; deep silence.) From the repeated declarations of many of my colleagues, I am given to understand that it is their intention to maintain me in my present position. I feel grateful for the kind feeling which prompts such a mark of respect, but I have to declare that my health prevents me from accepting it. I had at first undertaken these functions from a sense of duty, and I applied to the Chamber for aid in order that many matters in everything committed to my care, all the strength and ability of which I am possessed. But after having occupied the arm-chair for two-and-twenty days, I found myself so exhausted that I was obliged to yield to the entreaties of M. Senard. On Saturday I again tried to perform my duty, but I find my chest so fatigued that I am obliged to give way. In consequence I have to request you to allow me to take an ordinary seat amongst you, where I shall do all I can to be useful. (Hear.)

The report of the Committee on the salary of the President was presented; it gives 600f. a month for the expenses of all his attendants and of his table, and 1,200f. a month for the salary; and to each of the questors 300f. salary a month.

The Minister of the Interior announced that intelligence had been received of a great victory obtained by the Italians over the Austrians; the former with 15,000 men against 30,000. (Applause.)

M. Payers wanted to know why the Minister of Justice had on Saturday voted against his own law officers? Why had not he and they been agreed beforehand as to their acts in so grave a matter? Or, was it true that the minister had separated from the law officers?

M. [illegible], Minister of Justice, said he knew that the law officers of the Republic were in most conscientious in their opinion relative to the affair on that day before the Council, and had consented to matter not as a member of the Government, but as a simple representative. The hon. member entered into a long account of the proceedings which had taken place between the law officers of the Republic and the Executive Committee, before the authorisation to accuse M. Louis Blanc had been demanded, from which it appeared that the law officers had declared that they must resign if the Executive Committee did not give permission to have the matter discussed in the Chamber. The Executive Committee had acceded, declaring that they did not wish to trammel the course of justice. He had been perfectly free of all opinion in the matter; and it was only when he found the Executive Committee determined that they were also free to vote since all (with one exception) had expressed their opinion.

M. Portalis (late Procureur-General) said that he had given in his resignation, not because of the result of the discussion, but because he had received a disavowal which he ought not to have expected. (Hear, hear.) The honourable Minister of Justice was well aware of the repugnancy, and when he (M. Portalis) had appeared before the Council to demand permission to bring the matter before the Chamber, that honourable minister was the very first to declare that the authorisation ought absolutely to be demanded. ("Oh, oh" and marks of the strongest astonishment.) He had even gone further, and, when the question arose as submitted to him, said, "I quite agree with you in all your views of the matter." (Great astonishment—great agitation.) The Louvre-de representatives went on explaining the circumstances of the case, saying that he was in very clear and unmistakeable language of having shown one face to the law officers and another to the Assembly, on Saturday. (Extraordinary agitation.)

M. Ledru Rollin (late Procureur of the Republic) wished to ask a few words to [illegible] had just been said. When the affair of May 15 was brought forward for [illegible], it was found that a representative of the people ought to be impeached, the Minister of Justice was not ignorant of any one act of the whole proceeding ("Oh, oh!" sensation.) It was he even that had recommended the law officers of the Crown to carry the matter before the Executive Committee. It was he that [illegible] them as to what they ought to do; it was he who went with them to the Executive Committee; it was he, when the law officers declared that there was nothing of politics in the matter, had exclaimed then, "I quite agree with you in all your views." (Renewed demonstrations of surprise, and great agitation.) The honourable representative concluded by declaring that he failed any one to deny [illegible] had said.

M. Crémieux, Minister of Justice, had heard of the course of the [illegible] only up to Wednesday. From that time it naturally be [illegible] had not heard anything [illegible] that was that the Procureur-General had declared absolutely that Louis Blanc could not be accused. It was evident, however, that [illegible] declaration of Minister went on to repeat what he had said before, and that, [illegible] to the phrase "I agree with you," said that it was said in reference to the question of consulting the Executive Committee. He argued that further than that he could not have gone, since, if he had given his perfect acquiescence to the law officers in the matter, it would follow that if the Executive Committee had refused to allow the demand to be made to the Chamber, he would have been obliged to give in his resignation with the law officers. (Laughter.) The Minister went on speaking for some time, but towards the [illegible] amidst an [illegible] been entirely [illegible] he had said that he [illegible] with M. Ledru and M. Le [illegible] he came so, and afterwards [illegible] he had done, he would be a worthy of a seat in the Chamber. (Great [illegible].)

M. Landrin maintained in the most positive terms that his assertion was correct; and going over the circumstances, stated the very precise moment and the exact spot when and where the Minister had declared to him that they were all of the same opinion. (Continued agitation.)

M. Crémieux, Minister of Justice, said that he was evidently accused of falsehood. (Movement.) He could declare that he had not the slightest recollection of the words attributed to him. (The hon. Minister's statement was received with very marked disfavour. The agitation became, if possible, greater after he had concluded.)

M. J. Favre, Under-Secretary of State, and reporter of the committee which decided on indicting Louis Blanc, tried to obtain a hearing, but could not succeed.

A cry of "The order of the day!" was uttered, but it was met with cries of "No, no."

The President put the question of the discussion being closed, but nearly the whole House rose against such a course

Mr. J. Favre said that after what had occurred on Saturday he had thought it his duty to resign. When the whole ministry had risen against the law officers of the Republic, it was time for him to withdraw. (Hear, hear.) It was evident that the vote of Saturday was of great gravity, since it showed that the government was divided, that there was a schism in the body when discuss the affairs of the state; it showed that the Government was not what the Assembly wished to see it, strong and united. He had thanked when he saw the Minister of Justice vote as he had done. (Loud cheers.) He could affirm that after he had read his report to the Minister of Justice, that functionary was very far from being contrary to the sentiments therein expressed. (Agitation.) Yes, the Minister had not said one word against it—had, to all appearance, looked on it as perfectly correct in its views—had not uttered one remark against it, and consequently, as is the custom in most cases, had implied there was nothing against it by his silence. (Hear, hear.) The honourable deputy went on for some time speaking strongly against the conduct of the Minister.

Great confusion followed. It was then proposed to pass to the order of the day motive, that "after the frank and loyal explanations of M. Portalis and M. Landrin, the Assembly here passes to the order of the day." Some members acceded this most loudly, but eventually it was not put to the vote, the feeling being apparently that it would not be safe to thus pass a vote of censure on a Minister.

The order of the day, pure and simple, was then put and carried.

M. Bucher announced the result of the ballot for the post of President:

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Number of voters | .. | .. | .. | [illegible] |
| For M. Senard | .. | .. | .. | 703 |
| Lost votes | .. | .. | .. | 103 |

In consequence, M. Sénard was declared duly elected for the present month. The representatives then withdrew to their bureaux, to ballot for six Vice-Presidents and three Secretaries, two—M. E. Lafayette and de George—going out by rotation, and M. Lacrosse having resigned.

The following is the result of the ballot for the Vice-Presidents:—M. Bethmont obtained 621 votes: M. Marrast, 590; M. Corbon, 577, M. de Cormenin, 537, M. Recurt, 426; and M. Lacrosse, 420. These gentlemen were accordingly declared duly elected.

The Minister of the Interior presented, in the name of the Executive Government, twelve bills:—1, relative to the indemnities to [illegible] agreed upon or unarmed assemblages; and 2, one demanding a credit of 500,000f. for secret service money.

The Assembly rose at six o'clock.

TUESDAY.—At one o'clock, M. Bucher, the President, took the chair, and read a valedictory address to the Assembly, in which he recapitulated its labours since the opening of the session. After he had concluded, he invited M. Sénard to replace him in the chair, and embraced him. M. Sénard, in his turn, thanked the Assembly for the honour it had conferred upon him, and proposed a vote of thanks to M. Bucher, which was unanimously agreed to.

The Minister of Finance deposited on the table the amended budget for 1848. The first article stated that the credits opened to defray the ordinary and extraordinary expenditures of 1848, and amounting to 1,748,600,000 francs, should be augmented by twelve millions, and diminished by seventy-eight millions, and so fixed at 1,690,000,000. The resources calculated in the original budget at 1,686,000,000, were augmented by 126 millions, and reduced by 111, and remained fixed at 1,686,000,000.

The Assembly voted an indemnity of 4000 francs a month to its President, and of 400 francs to the Questors.

M. Bineau, reporter of the Finance Committee, deposited on the table the report on the Railroad Reduction Bill, which it proposed to reject.

M. Léon Faucher asked that the project of decree proposed by the Committee of Finance should not be undistinguished on the order of the day, the Minister having demanded that it should be postponed until the fate of the Railroad Bill be decided. The Minister, however, thought the urgency of the moment by any satisfactory reason. The Minister besides had refused to give any explanation to the Committee respecting the means at his disposa. to execute the railroads, but the entire Committee saw [illegible] could vote with any knowledge until the Minister should have disclosed his [illegible].

M. Garnier Pagès said that the Government had good reason for proposing the adjournment of the discussion of the project of decree relative to the consolidation of the Treasury bonds into Five per Cent. stock. It was evident that if that project was first adopted an immense quantity of these Treasury bonds would be thrown on the market, and cause a great depression in that stock

After a long discussion the division on the question of priority in favour of the Railway Bill gave the following result.

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| For giving priority to the bill | .. | .. | .. | 347 |
| Against it | .. | .. | .. | 322 |
| Majority | .. | .. | .. | 25 |

The Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of the Interior, demanded that a credit of 100,000f. per month should be opened for the expenses of the bureaux, archives, &c., of the Executive Committee.

WEDNESDAY.—The President announced that the Executive Committee had appointed M. Duclerc Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the room of M. Crémieux, whose resignation had been accepted.

The whole of the day the Assembly was occupied in discussing the provisions of the bill relating to tumultuous assemblages in the public streets. The various clauses were agreed to without amendment.

SPAIN.

Advices from Madrid to the 2nd inst. have been received. The Gazette announces a number of promotions in the army.

Letters from Seville, dated the 29th ult., state that the leader of the Seville insurrection, dated Beja, 23d ult., and signed by various other officers of the insurgent forces, had been published. It accuses the Seville Liberals of having been wanting to their promises, and says that the rising of the troops was in order to execute a plan agreed upon with a committee of the inhabitants, who had pledged themselves to rise, and that a body of 400 armed citizens were to have seized and imprisoned the authorities, but had not one of them manifested. He claims the victory in the affair between a portion of his forces and those of Shelley at San Lucar, and says he remained three days near Huelva; but finding the movement not supported as he had expected, he and the other officers resolved to march into Portugal, which they did in perfect order.

A great number of persons had been arrested.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY.—The news from the seat of war this week is more cheering for the cause of Italy than any of the preceding ones. The Austrians received a most decisive defeat from the Italians on the 30th ult. On that day we learn that 30,000 Austrians attacked the Italian positions at Goito, which were defended by 15,000 troops. A brisk fire of artillery took place, which lasted for three hours, when the Italian regiments of cavalry vigorously repulsed and drove the enemy towards Mantua. In the engagement the Italian army completely routed the enemy. The King was much exposed to the greatest danger, and had a horse killed and a spent ball wound in the eye. The Duke of Savoy was also wounded, but neither the one nor the other dismounted.

On the same day Peschiera surrendered to the Italians on honourable terms of capitulation. The greatest extremities to which the Italian troops were reduced, both by the inhabitants and the garrison, for weeks previous to the surrender. The Austrian garrison had marched from Peschiera on the 31st May, and embarked at Ancona, under the condition of not again serving against the Italians during the war. Charles Albert again offered battle, but in vain, to the enemy, who had taken refuge within the walls, or under the guns of Mantua

The next conflict similar in that country occurred in Paris on the 15th of May took place on the 26th at Milan. A mob, headed by the students, attacked the Palace of the provisional Government, and compelled the members to resign. Their resignation was followed by the formation of a National Guard, augmented by the mass of the population, restored order within three hours; and a demagogue named Urbano was arrested. The most perfect tranquility prevailed at Milan on the 27th ult.

The votes concerning the annexation of Parma to Piedmont were published at Parma on the 25th with great pomp. The result was, that of 39,703 votes given, 38,754 were for Charles Albert, and 1,559 for the people and the sovereign. The new Minister of Justice, Count Scarabelli, has published an address to the people of Parma, declaring that the Duke of Bourbon, ex-Duke of Parma, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, the Pope, and the Republic, which obtained one vote. In the evening the town was illuminated.

ROME.—Letters from Rome of the 28th ult. state that Monsignor Morichini had been sent by the Pope to Vienna, to negotiate peace with Austria on the terms of general pacification contained in the letter addressed by His Holiness to the Emperor on the 3rd ult. Pius IX. had received all his popularity, and on the feast of St. Philip Neri the population made a brilliant manifestation in his favour. The Abbate Gioberti was still at Rome, labouring unceasingly for the people and the sovereign. The new Ministry consists of the following personages.

The Gazzetta di Roma says:—"His Holiness, as the common father of the faithful, according to the views manifested in his Encyclical Letter, has just sent an extraordinary apostolic delegate to the belligerents (with the exception of the Emperor of Austria, to whom his Holiness had already written), for the purpose of pressing negotiations for the termination of the war. His Holiness will also do all in his power to prevent the German nation from staking its honour on sanguinary attempts against Italy, and to induce it to recognise the latter country as its sister, all those states being, in faith and charity, the common children of the Holy Father. His Holiness will pursue these negotiations with all the zeal that can be inspired by the conviction of thus fulfilling the duty of the supreme pontificate confided to man by Jesus Christ. His Holiness has thanked the Pope for having written in his letter to the Emperor of Austria, on the condition of peace, namely, that the natural boundaries of the people of Italy shall be respected by them. Italy does not aim—she even abhors and execrates—the conquest nations, but as the Germans recross the Alps,—let them swear to observe the laws prescribed by the natural law of nations, and then will the Italians embrace them as brothers."

PRUSSIA

The latest intelligence from Berlin is still of a very unsatisfactory nature. Uncertainty, distrust, and suspicion still predominate, and not only the ministry but the Constituent Assembly itself is falling into bad odour. The many [illegible] sessions of the Assembly, in direct or indirect opposition to the wishes of the people, and the [illegible] fused to attend either to corpore or by deputation the procession in honour of the victims of the March revolution, have caused it but general dissatisfaction. From some provincial districts, moreover, addresses of the most insulting kind have been forwarded "to the people of Berlin." Meantime, commercial affairs are as bad as ever, and employment is comparatively scarce. The ministry have strenuously opposed in the Constituent Assembly the appointment of a committee to report on the origin and causes of the disputes and animosity between the Polish and German races in the grand duchy of Posen. This opposition on their part, which can only be accounted for by their unwillingness to have the truth made known, has increased their unpopularity. Matters cannot long remain as they are in Berlin, and some change for better or worse may be shortly looked for.

AUSTRIA

Accounts from Vienna state that quiet and confidence are gradually returning in that city. Business has resumed its proper course. The damage done to the streets was almost wholly repaired on the 20th ult., on which date the last military barricade here and there remained as an outward sign of the last popular commotion. Collections had been made for the labourers, most of whom had returned to the work which was provided for those who were out of employment. Their behaviour throughout the late excitement is generally acknowledged to have been exemplary, and their honesty and forbearance are eulogised in glowing terms by the Vienna papers and the correspondents of the German press. Several foreign ambassadors had gone to join the Emperor's Court at Innspruck.

On the 2d instant the resignation of Lieutenant Field-Marshal Count Hoyos, as Commander-in-Chief of the National Guard, was officially notified by a circular signed by the Emperor.

Count Latour, the Austrian Ambassador to the Court of Rome (who recently received his passports), arrived at Trieste on the 30th ult., on board her Majesty's steam-ship Locust.

GERMAN STATES.

FRANKFORT.—The Committee of the German Parliament, who are engaged in the preparation of the German Constitution have agreed to the following important proclamation, which is from the pen of M. Dahlmann, and which has been officially published. It is expected that this most sensible document will have much effect in calming the apprehensions of those Schleswic populations of the empire, who feel themselves every day more and more surrounded by the baneful influences which are set in motion by Russian wiles and Russian gold.

The Constituent National Assembly of Germany solemnly declares—

"That it fully recognises the right of the non German peoples on German Federal ground to proceed in their national development, and in Church, schools, literature, administration, and law courts, to enjoy a perfect equality in the use of their languages, as far as they extend. It is of course understood that they, too, are entitled to any right which the joint constitution (now framing) may guarantee to the German people.

"Germany, henceforward, free and united, is great enough, without jealousy, to grant to tribes of other tongues that have grown up in her bosom all their natural liberty with [illegible] Neither the Swiss nor the North Schleswiger, who speaks the Danish language, nor the inhabitant of Southern Germany, with his Italian tongue, nor any one else belonging to us, shall have reason to complain of an infringement of his national ways, or of being abandoned by the German brotherhood in the hour of necessity or danger."

No dissension upon the subject of this proclamation was permitted by the Assembly, its majority, no doubt, being prompted by the desire of keeping aloof for the present from the Schleswig-Holstein question

HANOVER.—The Revolutionary leaven is fermenting here, and one of its first effects is the issuing of a proclamation, on the evening of the 1st instant, by the civic authorities of Hanover, whereby all houses are ordered to be closed at ten P.M., and all loitering in the streets is forbidden.

MECKLENBURG-SCHWERIN.—Numerous bands continue to levy black mail in the rural districts of this Duchy. In the vicinity of Warren there is a band consisting of from 2000 to 3000 men. The landed proprietors have fled from many quarters.

BOHEMIA.

The Convocation of a Sclavonic Congress at Prague, and the establishment of a Provisional Government in Bohemia, have caused not a little excitement in that part of Europe.

This usually quiet streets of Prague are thronged with deputies and deputations, and the jaunty colours of the Hungarians, Bohemians, Croats, and other numerous tribes, each speaking a different dialect, mingle gaily together. A letter from Prague describes the scene as most animated.

The programme of the central committee of the Congress has appeared. The first clause points out the necessity of a league, defensive and offensive, between all Sclaves. It is only by a people's league, by the constitution of Austria into a confederate state (Bundesstaat), that she can reacquire her lost strength. By the free union of tribes, constitutional liberty and habitual nationality would be guaranteed, as on the other hand additional splendour would accrue to the Imperial Crown, even should a portion of the empire be lost. The second clause discusses the bases of this Volksbund, or people's league. The key-stone, as it were, is in the preservation of every distinct nationality. A People's Diet is proposed to be held even at Vienna, where each nationality would be duly represented. The Magyars of Hungary are called upon to put aside all their own internal dissensions. After expressing sympathy with the Sclavonic tribes without the Austrian dominions, namely, the Poles and the Sclaves in Turkey, clause the third urges a literary intercourse between all Sclavonic races. Clause four treats of the position of the Sclaves in the German Parliament. They will never allow Austria to occupy a subordinate position under another power. Between the Emperor and the Austrian people there shall be no other organ than their own Parliaments "The Sclaves never will recognise the decrees of the Frankfort Diet as binding." Clause five proposes that a deputation shall wait upon his Majesty the Emperor, to inform him of the resolutions of the Sclavonic Congress.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN.

The re-commencement of hostilities by the Danes and Germans, which we briefly noticed in our Postscript of last week, has been confirmed by full details which have reached us of the affair at Dappel, on the Sundewitt. These accounts, however, differ very materially as to the number of the troops engaged on both sides; although it is generally admitted that it was between 14,000 and 16,000 men. That of the Danes was, however, not so great as supposed; and they owe their success in this instance more to the determined courage and patriotic zeal displayed on behalf of their King, than to any superiority of numbers, in addition to the masterly manner in which they were brought into action gradually, after being landed. A vast number of wounded had been conveyed to Flensburg. The Danes took 90 Mecklenburg prisoners, and six pieces of cannon, according to the Flensburg report; but a great many more had fallen into their hands than was stated public.

Accounts from Schleswig, of the 1st inst., mention the capture of two Danish battalions on the preceding Tuesday. Gravenstein was bombarded by them; but they were eventually repulsed by General Wrangle. A rumour accompanies this intelligence to the effect that a Danish corps d'armée of 6000 men is surrounded by the Prussian troops. The Radical party in Copenhagen is said to have gained its point; that is to say, the proposals for peace have been successfully resisted

There is nothing said of any advance to the northward by the Germans. The retreat of the Prussians from Flensburg took place on the 2nd, Apenrade and Hadersleben being abandoned by the Danes.

The inhabitants of Kiel have addressed a petition to the National Assembly at Frankfort, protesting, by anticipation, against any partition of Schleswig.

SWEDEN.

From Stockholm, under the date of the 26th of May, it is stated that the governor, Baron de Sprengtporten, was to go on a special mission to Denmark. The Danish Government had announced, to Sweden and Norway, that, until further orders no volunteers from either of those countries would be received in Denmark.

HOLLAND.

On Monday last there was a ball and dinner at Court, in honour of his Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia. On the previous evening his Royal Highness Prince Frederick of the Netherlands also gave a grand dinner in honour of the Prince.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia has left the Hague, for Berlin.

The Nederlandsche Staats Courant contains the Royal decree announcing M. Van Bosse, Referendary of the Department of Finance, Member of the Council of State. By another decree of the same date (June 3) his Majesty has provisionally confided the portfolio of the Minister of Finance, ad interim, to Councillor Van Bosse. His Majesty has appointed Count de Byland, Governor of the province of South Holland.

BELGIUM.

From Brussels, under the date of Tuesday last, we learn that there has been a strike for wages among the workmen employed on the public works. The gendarmes were called out to disperse the mob. One shot only was fired in the air but no accident or any kind took place. Two of the ringleaders were arrested and sent to prison.

UNITED STATES.

Advices have been received this week by the packet Cambria, which brings on freight £74,000 in specie. By this arrival we learn that the last news received from Europe had had a favourable influence upon the other side of the Atlantic, and strong hopes were indulged in that it would materially assist in the improvement of trade.

General Scott had arrived in the United States from Mexico, and expressed a very strong conviction that the treaty of peace between Mexico and the United States has already been ratified, and that the news thereof might be reasonably expected every day.

The people were in the midst of the preliminary steps of a new Presidential election, and both parties were marshalling their forces to name candidates to represent their respective principles.

The "democrats" held their Convention of Delegates for nominating candidates for President and Vice-President at Baltimore, on the 23rd ult. We have, as yet, no information of a choice having been made

The opposing or Whig party will not hold their nominating Convention until the first week in next month, Philadelphia being the destined place for the Whig nomination of President

The prospects of the growing crops of all sorts—the grain crops especially—to all appearance and universal report, are described as being most exuberant; for a greater breadth of land than ever was sown with wheat, and, unless some unforeseen blight falls upon it, the yield will be unprecedented.

CENTRAL AMERICA

A treaty is said to have been concluded between Guatemala and Honduras, by which the latter state recognises the independence of the former, and the population of the peninsula of Yucatan [illegible] the province of the said now before the United States Congress to enable the President to interfere by force of arms

THE BRAZILS

Her Majesty's steamer Firebrand arrived at Portsmouth on Tuesday night, having left Rio de Janeiro on the 26th of April. Lord Howden, British Ambassador to the Argentine Republic, arrived in her.

The effect of the news upon the Brazilians, of the revolutionary affairs of Continental Europe, was so astounding, that French business was stopped, and monetary transactions were suspended.

The Emperor was in Rio, much affected by the expatriation of the house of Bourbon, with which he is so closely allied.

The affairs of La Plata are mending, but so slowly as to be almost imperceptible.

WEST INDIES.

Advices have been received this week. The weather generally had been favourable for the crops, which throughout the West Indies were [illegible] exception of Barbadoes, where a few cases of fever had occurred. With respect to the condition and prospects of the West India colonies, the accounts are of the most gloomy and despairing character which the Chronicle has received for some time past. Meetings continued to be held in Jamaica to take into consideration the alarming state of affairs.

The Lord Bishop of Jamaica arrived at Kingston on the 2nd of May, in the Teazel steamer, from his visitation of the Bahama Islands

ST. DOMINGO.

The following details of the revolutionary movement in this fine island, which we briefly adverted to in our last Number, have come to hand:

The insurrection commenced at Port-au-Prince on the 23d of April, with a large body of armed men marching into the capital and parading the streets, giving out as their intention to depose the President, and appoint another in his place. This was immediately met by the President sending a messenger to the insurgents, accompanied by a detachment of soldiers and two hundred Horse Guards; but, every effort to effect a compromise proving abortive, a serious conflict took place, which ended in the defeat of the insurgents, with considerable loss on both sides. The bodies of those who fell belonging to the Government were removed during the night, while the remains of the insurgents were exposed on the following morning as a public example, their heads being chopped off, and their bodies hacked about in the most horrible manner; many in which life was not extinct being subjected to the same treatment. For several days after not a person of colour was able to walk the streets without being instantly assassinated by the Government people, to whom the utmost license was given; but the absence of a British ship of war was severely felt. These proceedings in Port-au-Prince were shortly followed by an insurrection in the south, to quell which the President Soulouque had marched, it was reported, at the head of 6000 men, but the result had not transpired. Another disturbance broke out at Mirogoane, to which the President forthwith repaired at the head of a considerable force, and meeting the insurgents on the 8th of April, routed them with little trouble, and was thence on his way to Aux Cayes A proclamation had in the meantime been issued by the Government, denouncing several persons as traitors, to be seized and shot without the slightest ceremony.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.

LAMBETH.—A meeting of electors and other inhabitants of the borough of Lambeth was held at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, on Tuesday night, under the auspices of the Lambeth Electoral Association, to give expression to the sentiments of the borough upon the recent anti-reform declaration of Lord John Russell, and to adopt measures in support of Mr. Hume's motion, now before the House of Commons. The Hall was crowded to excess, and the members for the borough (the Right Hon. T. C. D'Eyncourt and Mr. Charles Pearson) attended by special invitation. The following resolutions, accompanied by suitable speeches, were agreed to:—1. "That, in the judgment of the meeting, the declaration of Lord J. Russell in the House of Commons, on the 23rd ult., must be regarded as a real or affected ignorance of the state of public opinion, and a willingness to mistake the determination of the people at large to maintain peace and order for their satisfaction with the present course of legislation; and that, therefore, it is incumbent upon all who would avert civil commotion, to accelerate the progress of freedom, and promote the national welfare, by the constitutional expression of their views and wishes; and determines to seek such further reforms as it believes will be conducive to the prosperity of all classes of the community."

2. "That this meeting declares its conviction that the House of Commons does not truly represent the population, and that, so long as it is constituted as it is at present, it cannot become the proper organ for the expression of the nation's will, and that any reform in our representative system which fails to recognise the right of every man to the franchise, limited only by the regulations necessary for its legitimate exercise, can neither be considered nor satisfactory; but that, regarding Mr. Hume's motion as a practical advance towards a full and fair representation of the people, it determines to give that movement its earnest and utmost support."—A petition to the Legislature embodying the sentiments of those resolutions was agreed to, and the meeting separated amidst "cheers for the Charter and Mitchell."

BERMONDSEY OR FINSBURY.—On Tuesday night there was a meeting of the members of the borough of Finsbury Reform Association, at the Belvidere Tavern, Pentonville, on the subject of Mr Hume's approaching motion. They resolved on the adoption of a petition in its support; and that it should be sent to the different parishes in the borough for signatures: and the hope was very strongly expressed that all parishes, boroughs, districts, &c., would pursue a similar course, as the best means of calmly and peacefully collecting the people's opinions, and of procuring genuine signatures.

MEETING IN MARYLEBONE.—On Wednesday morning, a meeting of the electors and inhabitants of this borough was held in the Workhouse-yard, pursuant to a requisition signed by several of the rate-payers, for the purpose of taking into consideration Lord John Russell's recent declaration respecting reform in the House of Commons, and of passing some resolutions on that subject. Sir. J. Walmsley, Sir B. Hall, M.P., Mr. Hume, M.P., Mr. J. Williams, M.P., Mr. W. Williams, Mr. Jacob Bell, Mr. Secker, Lord Dudley Stuart, and many other influential gentlemen residing in the parish, were present. The number present was about 1500. Mr. J. Williams, M.P., on the motion of Mr. Hume, took the chair. The following resolutions, and a petition to Parliament founded upon them, were agreed to, after a somewhat stormy discussion, caused by the Chartists, who endeavoured to force some of their amendments upon the meeting:—"1. That the present state of the representation of the people in the Commons House of Parliament is partial in its nature, and in its practice tends to class legislation, is no security against unequal and oppressive taxation, and produces no comprehensive measures for the benefit of the people. 2. That her Majesty's Prime Minister having stated his opinion that the people require no extensive measures of political and fiscal reform, it is hereby resolved that, in the opinion of this meeting, in order to secure the stability of the institutions of the country and maintain public order, it is indispensably necessary that the elective franchise be extended to all men of mature age, who are registered as residents for a period of twelve months; that the duration of Parliaments does not exceed three years; that votes should be taken by ballot, and that there should be an equal apportionment of members to population." Towards the close of the proceedings the following resolution was also carried:—"That the petition made by Lord John Russell, in his place in the House of Commons this session, that the people of this country do not desire either the great measure of reform, as proposed by Mr. Hume and other members of the House, nor the other great measure as advocated in the People's Charter, is evidence of his ignorance of the present state of the country, and a proof that he is utterly unfit to conduct the affairs of the nation."

MEETING IN CHELSEA.—A numerous meeting, for the same purpose, convened by the West London Reform Association, was held also on Wednesday evening, at the Oddfellows' Hall, Sloane-street, Knightsbridge.

BATH.—A crowded and influential meeting of the electors, non-electors, mechanics, tradesmen, and working classes of the city of Bath was held on Wednesday, in the Guildhall of that city, for the purpose of furthering the movement at present going on for reform in Parliament. The large room was crowded, and on the platform the mayor, H. Hunt, Esq., was surrounded by several aldermen and town councillors, and other influential citizens. Resolutions and a petition similar to those adopted at the meetings above mentioned were agreed to.

WAKEFIELD.—A numerous meeting of the [illegible] character was also held at Wakefield, on Monday evening, in pursuance of a requisition presented to the mayor, who declared the object of the meeting to be for the purpose of considering the propriety of petitioning Parliament in favour of Mr Hume's motion for the proposed measure of Reform. Resolutions, &c., were accordingly passed.

BURFORD'S PANORAMA OF PARIS

THIS is a well-timed addition to the Sights of the Metropolis, both as regards novelty of subject, and the season of its exhibition. The new picture has been sketched since the late revolution, and it represents that scene of Republican excitement, the Place de la Revolution. The Luxor obelisk, the colossal fountains and statues, are in themselves picturesque novelties; but, in this picture, they are superseded by the political excitement in each direction, such as forms the every-day out-door life of Paris. From two or three directions vast processions are pouring towards the gorgeous and graceful diaperies, where the Provisional Government are proclaiming the Republic—the great event of the 24th ult., full of theatrical effect

In another direction is a tree of liberty, on its way to be planted, accompanied by a shouting group; next is a priestly procession—what a juxta-position! There are also numerous holiday parties, in their flaring blue blouses and red sash and head-gear. In short, most of the actors are playing at Republicanism in high glee. All the life of the scene is cleverly characteristic, in the localities, the grove of the Tuileries, the Vistas of the Champs Elysées, the Chambre Deputés, the long lines of palaces and street, and the busy scene—all are painted with that spirit and accuracy for which Mr. Burford has so long enjoyed high and deserved reputation.

STATE OF EMPLOYMENT IN MANCHESTER.—The official report for the past week, indicating the state of employment in the borough of Manchester, distributed through each of declining trades. Nearly 900 hands, heretofore engaged in full work, have been discharged from that rate of employment, whilst upwards of 80 are placed on short time, and from 300 to 400 are thrown wholly out of work. The hands of the reports are as follows:—Number working full time the previous week, 36,272; in the past week, 29,390. Number working short time previous week, 6073; past week, 7229. The number of hands wholly out of employment the previous week was 8520; in the past week the number is 8114.

CHARTIST COLLISIONS WITH THE POLICE. The north-eastern districts of the metropolis, on Sunday last, were the theatre of rather serious disturbances. At Virgin's-fields, Bethnal-green; London-fields, Hackney; Bishop Bonner's fields, Victoria Park, &c., from an early hour of the morning, crowds of the lowest and most disorderly characters assembled, and, in some cases, attempted to hold meetings in favour of the Charter, and in sympathy for Mitchell. Some of the police, foot and mounted, who were assembled contiguous to these localities, having been assailed with brickbats, stones, and sticks, defended themselves with more vigour, and regular engagements ensued between the parties, the police being always victorious. Several persons, with very severe wounds, were conveyed, in the course of the day, to the London Hospital, and towards night all the comparatively disturbed localities were restored to tranquility

A RIVER STEAMER SUNK.—On Monday, at noon, as the Witch, a steamer belonging to the Old Woolwich Steam-packet Company, was on her passage to London, on heading in for East Greenwich pier, she ran upon the anchor of a brig, of whose position the master was not aware, and sustained such injuries that she sank almost immediately. There were several passengers on board, but the tide being low, and the steamer not wholly submerged at the time, though the flood tide rapidly covered her till nothing but the top of the funnel was visible, it does not appear that any personal injury was sustained by any individual on board

BIRTHS AND DEATHS FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 3.—The number of births registered in the metropolis and suburban districts during the week ending Saturday, June 3, was 1544, of which 794 were males and 750 females. The deaths during the same week were 924, of which 450 were males, and 473 females. This number is less by 10 than the weekly average of the last five springs. The deaths, it will also be seen, are less than the births during the same week, by 41.

DEATH OF THE "ESTATICA."—Lisbon de la Reinosa of Saturday last contains the following:—"The celebrated stigmatised Estatica, Maria Dominique Lazzari, of the valley of Cyprilani, in the Rabon Tyrol, died in the month of April last, at the age of three years. HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS SOPHIA WHEN A CHILD.—FROM A PICTURE BY HOPPNER.

THE LATE PRINCESS SOPHIA.

THE very characteristic Portrait of the Princess Sophia, when a child, is from a celebrated picture, painted by Hoppner, who chiefly excelled in females and children. The composition is a charming one; and, many years since, became very popular in consequence of its being engraved on copper by Caroline Watson, and dedicated to Queen Charlotte.

In our Obituary of last week, we gave a brief Memoir of the lamented Princess. We append to the Portrait a few anecdotes of her Royal Highness at the engaging age which the painter has here so successfully pourtrayed.

Madame D'Arblay, in her "Diary," continually speaks of the amiability and good-breeding of the young Princesses, particularly of the Princess Sophia. The Queen, when she went to early prayers, frequently sent her favourite little dog, Badine, to Miss Burney, to take charge of. One day, after the page had fetched it, the little Princess Sophia rapped at her door, and curtseying and blushing, said her mamma had sent her for the little dog's basket. Miss Burney begged to be allowed to carry it to the Queen's room, but the little gentlewoman insisted upon taking it herself, with a mingled modesty and good-breeding very striking in one so young. Miss Burney adds:—"The readiness and grace of their civilities, even in the midst of their happiest wildnesses and freedom, are at once a surprise and charm to all who see them."

On one occasion at breakfast, whilst the King was reading the newspaper to his family, the Princess Sophia, then very young, said, "Mamma, I can't think what a prison is?" Upon its being explained, and understanding that the prisoners were then often half-starved for want, the child replied "That is very cruel, for the prison is bad enough without starving; but I will give all my allowance to buy bread for the poor prisoners." Due praise was given for this benevolent intention, which was directed to be put in force, together with an addition from the Royal parents; and many a heart was relieved that knew not its benefactor.

The late Princess was the twelfth child of King George the Third and Queen Charlotte; and an amusing circumstance connected with her birth is thus related:—

The fast increase of the Royal family appears to have been a serious obstacle in the path of Zoffany, the portrait painter. When he commenced his first picture of the Royal Family, there were ten children: after finishing his sketch and proceeding with the colouring, various circumstances prevented him from proceeding. The completion of the picture was, consequently, delayed, when a messenger came to inform the artist that another Prince was born, and must be introduced into the painting. This took some time, when a second messenger arrived to announce the birth of a Princess (the late Princess Sophia), and to acquaint him that the illustrious little stranger must have a place on the canvas. This was impossible without a new arrangement; one-half of the figures, therefore, were obliterated, in order that the grouping might be closer to make room. To do this was the work of many months, and, before it was finished, a letter came from one of the Maids of Honour, begging the painter to make room for another addition to the family group. "This," cried the perplexed painter, "is too much! If they cannot sit with more regularity, I cannot paint with more expedition, and must give up the task."

Soon after the birth of the Princess Sophia, the King occupied himself in making arrangements for the future settlement of his numerous family, and sent a message to Parliament, calling on the two Houses to enable him to make suitable provisions for his younger children out of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, which could not be done without an act of Parliament for that purpose. This proposal went to the settling an annuity of £60,000 on the six younger Princes, and of £50,000 on the five Princesses; but these annuities were only to take effect on the demise of his Majesty. The message was received with good-will by Parliament, and a bill passed, to which the Royal assent was soon afterwards given.

THE remains of her late Royal Highness were privately removed on Tuesday morning from her residence, Vicarage-place, Kensington, for interment in the cemetery at Kensal Green.

A Guard of Honour was on duty in front of the residence of her late Royal Highness.

The ladies and gentlemen invited to the solemnity having assembled at an early hour, the funeral procession left the Princess's residence at a quarter past five o'clock.

It consisted of several mourning coaches drawn by four horses each, and conveying the late Princess' domestics and medical attendants; also the Lady of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Augusta Bruce; the Lady of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, Lady Augusta Cadogan; the Equerry of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, Lieut.-Col. the Hon Augustus Liddell; and the Equerry of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Col. Sir George Couper, Bart.; two Ladies of the Queen Dowager, the Marchionesses of Ormonde and Lady Charles Somerset; and two Ladies of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, Lady Georgina Bathurst and Lady Caroline Murray; the Lord in Waiting of the Queen, the Earl of Morton; the Groom in Waiting of the Queen, Sir Frederick Stovin; the Equerry to the Queen, Col. Buckley; and the Equerry to the Queen-Dowager, Captain Somerset; the Lady of the Bedchamber of the late Princess, Lady Cartcret; the Bedchamber Woman of her late Royal Highness Miss Vyse; and Lieut.-General Sir Charles Wade Thornton; the Coronet of her late Royal Highness; the Vice-Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household; and Sir William Martins.

Next came

THE HEARSE,
Containing the Body of the late Princess,
Drawn by six horses.

A mourning coach, drawn by four horses, conveying the chief mourner, the Duchess of Norfolk, and her attendant, Lady Couper.

The funeral procession arrived at the chapel of the Cemetery at seven o'clock. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, his Royal Highness Prince George, the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household, the Clerk of the Closet to the Queen, the Bishop of Norwich, the Deputy Clerk of the Closet, the Dean of Hereford, and the Chaplain in attendance upon her late Royal Highness, the Rev. Evan Nepean, had assembled at the Cemetery, and met the procession at the entrance of the chapel.

His Excellency Count Kielmansegge, the Diplomatic Representative of his Majesty the King of Hanover, the brother of the late Princess, was present in the chapel.

The funeral procession passed into the chapel, the pall-bearers being Lady Charles Somerset, Lady Georgina Bathurst, Lady Augusta Bruce, and Lady Augusta Cadogan. Prince Albert was attended by the Groom of the Stole, the Marquis of Abercorn; the Lord in Waiting, Lord George Lennox; the Groom in Waiting, Colonel Wylde; and the Equerry in Waiting, Colonel Bouverie. The Duke of Cambridge was attended by Baron Knesebeck, and Mr. Edmond Mildmay.

The body of the late Princess was placed on the bier, and the burial service commenced, the Clerk of the Closet, the Bishop of Norwich, officiating, assisted by the Deputy Clerk of the Closet, the Dean of Hereford.

The chief mourner, the Duchess of Norfolk, sat at the head of the corpse, with her attendant, Lady Couper—the ladies of the Royal Family on either side the bier; the Lady of the Bedchamber of her late Royal Highness, Lady Carteret, and the Bedchamber Woman, Miss Vyse, being nearest the head of the corpse. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and his Royal Highness Prince George, sat near the chief mourner.

The Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household stood at the foot of the corpse. The remainder of the ladies and gentlemen assisting at the solemnity stood on either side of the chapel, or were conducted into the pews.

The part of the burial service before the interment being read, the coffin was deposited in the vault beneath the chapel, and the Clerk of the Closet, the Bishop of Norwich, then concluded the service.

After which his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and his Royal Highness Prince George, were conducted by the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's Household out of the chapel, followed by the ladies and noblemen and gentlemen present at the solemnity.

THE ROYAL CHENILLE QUILT.

WE are much gratified in laying before our readers the annexed representation and details of the magnificent Chenille Quilt, worked in crochet, which was presented on the christening day of the infant Princess to her Majesty by Mrs. Hairs, of Exeter, by the hands of the Countess of Charlemont, the Lady in Waiting; on which occasion the Queen was graciously pleased to express her admiration of such an unprecedented display of female taste and skill. Mrs. Hairs is, we understand, the authoress of several small publications on knitting, netting, and crochet work.

The designing and working of this superb Quilt occupied Mrs. Hairs three months. The sketch will convey but an imperfect idea of its magnificence; though the outline and shadowing are correct. The materials of which it is made were all manufactured in England, and consist of the richest silk chenille, gold-coloured crochet silk, and gold and silver thread. The whole of the design is worked in gold-coloured crochet silk, the shading in oak-coloured chenille, and the dark shadow on the outer edge of the scrolls and leaves in black, except where it falls on a white ground, when grey is used. The scrolls on the outer edge of the shield are worked on a Royal purple ground; and there is a relief of pure white between the purple and scarlet, which is indicated in the pattern by the letter W.

The whole of the centre is Royal scarlet, shaded towards the right and left to a deep claret. In the centre of the shield are the Royal arms. These are composed of gold and silver, with every colour and shading that is used in the most perfect painting; in many parts it being necessary to hold as many as seventeen colours in the hand at one time. The lace is of gold thread over scarlet silk ruffles plaited, and is not made separately. It is lined with quilted rich white satin, and measures 6½ yards round within the lace.

DESTRUCTION OF PARK CHAPEL, CAMDEN TOWN.

ON Tuesday night, shortly after nine o'clock, a destructive fire broke out in the school-room attached to Park Chapel, situate in Grove-street, Camden Town. The alarm was instantly given, and a great number of the inhabitants hastened to the spot, when they found smoke in dense bodies pouring forth from the lower windows of the chapel, which the flames had reached. A very short period elapsed before the engines of the parish, London establishment, West of England, and County Company arrived; the fire, however, had, during the interim, extended along the flooring and communicated with the pews. The engines were soon got ready for work, but, unfortunately, the supply of water was not sufficient to subdue so large a body of flame; and, notwithstanding the utmost exertions of all parties present, the work of devastation continued, and before eleven o'clock nearly every part of the building presented one broad sheet of fire, which, as it broke through the roof and the different windows, illuminated not merely the neighbourhood, but also the surrounding district. The firemen kept to their work, and tried all they could to prevent the conflagration from extending through the building; but their exertions met with little success, and by twelve o'clock the greater portion of the chapel was destroyed, little more than the walls remaining.

The loss by this disastrous event must be very considerable, but it is understood that the trustees were insured in the General Fire Office. The calamity is attributed to an escape of gas. The Chapel, which belonged to the Independents, was built in the year 1844, and was ministered to by the Rev. Mr. HARRISON.

DESTRUCTION OF PARK CHAPEL CAMDEN-TOWN, BY FIRE, ON TUESDAY EVENING.

BURNING OF A RAILWAY BRIDGE.

BY this extraordinary conflagration, which occurred on Wednesday morning the 31st ult., has been destroyed one of the most magnificent works upon the South Wales Railway—a vast timber bridge crossing the Usk, at Newport. The details of the catastrophe are as follow:—

At six o'clock in the morning, the workmen were engaged in completing the central arch, which was an immense pile, consisting of several tons weight of timber and iron bolts. In driving the latter, one man used a bolt which had been heated to an extraordinary degree. This immediately set fire the adjoining timber, which being highly kyanized, or "pickled," was like gunpowder to ignite. The man had a bucket of water at hand, as was usual, but it was of no service; for instantly the flames leaped along on each side, from the centre to each end of the bridge, and the whole structure was in a blaze. The men with difficulty escaped with their lives. A team of trains was passing at the time; the horses, put to their utmost gallop, dashed through the flames to escape. The alarm was given in Newport, and a great crowd rushed to the great stone bridge adjacent: there were hundreds of "navvies," carpenters, masons, labourers, tradesmen, and gentlemen, but it was of no avail. The town fire-engines were brought, but they were useless, the flames continuing to burst from the surface of the piles, the rails, the arches, and, in fact, wherever the fire could lay hold of wood to burn. The timberwork was so enormous that it took a considerable time to burn any portion wholly away; while the flames rose up with vast columns of blue and black smoke. At about nine o'clock, the ponderous work of the central arch, having lost its abutments in the fire, gave way with a terrible crash; and soon after this had fallen in, portion after portion gave way, until, with the exception of here and there a solitary black and charred fragment, with some portion on the banks, the whole of this magnificent work was totally destroyed. The river was black with burning wood which fell into it; and the tide being receding, the banks became strewn with enormous pieces of half-burnt wood, like the coast after a wreck. The engine from the barracks did great execution, worked by two companies of soldiers under the command of officers.

The bridge was almost completed when this unfortunate calamity occurred. It was built of kyanized timber by Messrs. Rennie, Logan, and Co., and cost upwards of £20,000 in the erection. Fortunately, the firm insured recently or the full amount, so that their loss will be covered. The bridge will now, it is said, be built of stone, and the work, consequently, is delayed two years.

Our Artist's sketch is taken from beneath an arch of the old stone bridge: he describes the steam from the burning timbers, as they fell into the water, to have had a very striking effect against the dense black smoke.

DESTRUCTION OF THE INDIAN STEAM-SHIP "BENARES."

We regret to find that the fears entertained respecting the fate of this fine Indian steamer have been confirmed by authenticated intelligence announcing the almost complete destruction of that vessel by fire, attended with lamentable loss of human life. The steamer was of nearly 400 tons burthen, and at the period of her returning from Calcutta had upwards of 150 passengers and seamen on board. The catastrophe happened when the vessel was about four miles below Rajmahal, on the 29th of April; and is thus described by Lieutenant H. O. Mayne, who was among the fortunate passengers who escaped a horrible death:—

It was about half-past seven o'clock in the evening when the alarm was given, the fire having kindled in the after-part of the vessel, but from what cause it is impossible to ascertain. The whole of that portion of the vessel in one minute became a raging blaze; and so instantaneously did it spread, that those who were right aft could not come forward. Captain Townsend, the master, at once apprehended the whole danger, and called out to the man at the helm to run the vessel into shallow water, which, luckily, was nigh, and she grounded close to the shore. By this time the whole of the steamer abaft the engine was enveloped in flames; the upper or awning deck had caught, as well as a number of carriages, which were placed beneath it. The scene on board was most heart-rending.

Shortly before the vessel grounded, the general impression was that she would blow up every instant; this was increased by the fear that directly the flames reached the boiler it would burst, and also the danger of some gunpowder on board igniting. This made every one expect the worst; and one gentleman, thinking there was no hope, ran down to his cabin, divested himself of all but his shirt and trousers, and sprang overboard. He was never seen after. On the vessel foundering, it was discovered that the people could stand in the water up to their waists a few yards from the vessel, and this led to fearful loss of life. In spite of the entreaties of the captain, many got out at the bows, and were seen no more. Those who were handed over to a small rock, which was partly uncovered, imagining they were really on terra firma, got into deep water, and were quickly swept away by the current. Among them were Mrs. Hartley, Captain Whistler, Miss Nash, Captain Sneyd, Mr. Gross, Mr. Houlten (chief officer of the Benares), Mr. Shanahan, and some twenty others. All of them perished. The fire continued burning till eleven o'clock, when it ceased, after consuming the whole of the after-part of the ship to the engine-room. The destruction of the cargo was a heavy loss to the owners, it being estimated at nearly £30,000.

The accompanying Engraving, from a sketch by Mr. Frederick Vizetelly, represents the appearance of the vessel after the fire had been extinguished, and furnishes a view of the country off which the catastrophe took place: the hills in the distance are those of Rajmahal. The fire is supposed to have originated through the carelessness of some Syces (native ostlers), who had been smoking their hookahs among the horses.

Had Captain Townsend's (the commander) entreaties to the passengers been regarded, all of them might have been saved. Mr. Houlten, chief officer, was the first to jump overboard, and was swept away by the current, and those who followed his example shared the same fate.

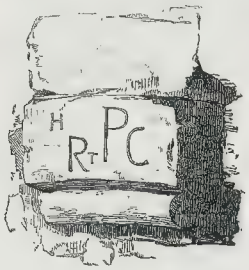
As soon as the survivors were landed, boats were sent in search of those missing, but none were picked up. Tents were erected on the banks for those who escaped. The Feiroz, a vessel belonging to the same company, was hourly expected on her downward trip, but had unfortunately grounded. On her arrival, she would of course render every assistance.

The Benares, one of a fine line of Ganges steamers: she was launched last summer, and an Engraving of her appeared in our Journal for September 11, 1847.

REMAINS OF ST. PANCRAS CHURCH, SOMER'S TOWN.

The above ancient church, after many revivals—although evidently without any striking departure from its original plan and dimensions—is now undergoing the process of enlargement; and this operation is already so far advanced that in the course of a month or six weeks, the homely but venerable edifice may be expected to have assumed the appearance of a structure in the style derived from examples of the eleventh century.

CHISELLED BRICK NICHES, PISCINA, SEDILIA, &c.



KEY-STONE OF THE SOUTH PORCH.

Although we have other churches, in the City and elsewhere, dedicated to the same patron, his shrine in Somer's-town, distinguished as Old St. Pancras, has been the especial goal of a sauntering pilgrimage for London antiquaries even before Dr. Stukely had peopled its environs with heroic phantoms, conjured from the twilight regions of history, when, standing upon his beloved prætorium, he proclaimed "Hare was stationed Cæsar; here was stationed Mandubrace, King of London," &c.

NORMAN ALTAR STONE.

REMAINS OF THE H ON STEAM-SHIP 'BENARES.'

But it is in the quaint yet earnest words of Nordden, a topographical pilgrim of the 16th century, that we find a striking picture of the true Old St Pancras, old even to desolation: and as it may have appeared ere the devices of the plasterer and carpenter and the abomination of whitewash had obscured those salutary lights which, however, have again been revealed during the demolition.

The economy of the old Church indicates the premature type, consisting of a nave and contracted chancel: and tradition, likewise, claims for the spot on which it stands an especial degree of sanctity derived from the circumstance of the Gospel having been preached on that site by one of those missionaries who are said to have partially instigated the general conversion effected by St. Augustine; and, as the spot distinguished as the scene of Augustine's ministration subsequently became the abode of a hermit whose cell was still existing in the time of the itinerant Leonard, so likewise is Pancras said to have had its hermit, whose ascetic meditations were probably mingled with the guardianship of the mineral spring, the healing waters of which were celebrated in early time, but which, in the progress of faith, have entirely disappeared from the situation, on the south side of the churchyard, where they are said to have sprung forth.

In Domesday Book the Canons of St. Paul's are stated as holding four hides of land at Pancras for a manor; and in the records belonging to the Dean and Chapter is a deed, by which William de Belmes (bishop) gave the tithes of the above manor, yielding a rent of twenty pence, to the Canons of St. Paul's, which conveyance was confirmed by Bishop Gilbert in 1183.

In the same archives is a visitation of this Church in 1201, which specifies, among its appurtenances, a good stone font, and a small marble stone, ornamented with copper, to carry the pax. It likewise mentions a very small tower as a part of the Church. Likewise there is mention of two srana—one prope ecclesiam, and the other ad aquebenedictam, which latter circumstance may probably suffice to involve one of Dr. Stukeley's camps, even the prætorium of Mandubrace on the north of the Church, with some conjectures touching the probable site of the rectory and parsonage-house, with the weights of what, in early times, may have been a mote.

Weever, after an overdrawn evidently borrowed from his predecessor Norden, says, "I find (in St. Pancras Church) a wondrous ancient monument, which, by tradition, was made to the memory of one of the right honourable family of the Greyes and his lady, whose portraitures are upon the tomb, whose mansion-houses, say the inhabitants, was in Fort Pancras, or Pancras Fort-lane, now in Inns of Court. But these are but suppositions, for by whom Grey's Inn was first possessed, builded, or begun, I have not yet learned, yet it seemeth, with Stow, to be since Edward the Third's time. These standing at the words left undefaced:—

"'Holy Trinity, on God, have mercy on us.'

[illegible] Roberius Fee [illegible] Francisci Fee filii Thome Eve dicti cerne cancellarie Anglie . . . . quorum."

It is curious to observe here how unconscious the Clerkenwell chronicler appears to have been of the disparity between that which his eye gathered from the traditionary lore of the inhabitants and the matter which his eye witnessed upon the monument itself. Indeed, the only way in which the difference can be reconciled is in the supposition that the family of Eve may have appropriated the older tomb of the Greys, i.e. supposing the necessity of utilizing the tradition [illegible] one inscription existing in Weever's time. And upon examining the appearances on the removal of this monument, there seemed grounds for conceiving such an appropriation. The words one ancient monument ought not to have appeared to Weever, at the date when he saw it, so much as a century old; but on taking it down there were found striking indications of patchwork. An elliptical arch with quatrefoils, which served as a canopy, turned out to be a concoction of stones, probably belonging to the middle of the 16th century; within that appeared a block of fine Purbeck, with the matrices of effigies, with labels, and an appearance similar to a representation sometimes found, containing the first and second persons of the Trinity. The whole had been rendered uniform by successive coats of whitewash. The family of Eve, or Eve, who may be supposed to have taken possession of this monument, whether by family claim or otherwise, were of old standing in the parish, as appears by a grant of the time of Henry VI. in favour of one of them residing in Kentishtown. It may likewise be hinted that the figure of the "Adam and Eve," abutting on the Church, may have sprung out of a canting allusion to the family name.

A curious feature of the old Church is represented in one of the accompanying [illegible] a small [illegible] in chiselled brick, a mass of rare occurrences, and, from the style of the arches, indicating an [illegible] commonly found, even in domestic buildings. These had been covered by a substantial coating of plaster, but were discovered at the first instance on the removal of some of the stone-work at the exterior of the chancel. That operation being suspended, and the labour of plastering being removed, the upper niche was discovered perfect, with mouldings and quarrels of chiselled brick, but the lowest being of stone, coloured so as to resemble the former. The back of the niches was in plaster, likewise tinted and [illegible] to correspond with the brick, and the whole of this had been a double niche, divided by a mullion, the principal part of which, however, was destroyed by the above-mentioned removal of the materials from without.

These decorations were on the south side of the east window in the chancel, and had probably contained effigies. There was no corresponding appearance on the north.

An early English piscina, and a sedilia, (represented in the same cut) were likewise found on the removal of some heavy wainscoting on the south side of the chancel; the mouldings of the sedilia retaining vestiges of a red colour, with which it had formerly been tinted.

A relic of considerable interest was likewise found during the removal of the vestry. This, which appears to have been the key-stone of the south porch, contains the letters H R P P of Ireland, and is probably contemporary with the [illegible] of the Norman [illegible] and [illegible] of the Norman [illegible] members of the other, in the manner imitated by the Normans from Roman inscriptions, in which such insertions are common. Of this and of the Norman altar stone, there are accompanying cuts. The latter was found at the depth of [illegible] during the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] decoration of altar stones, viz. five crosses, typical of the five wounds of our Lord.

The fourth cut is the interesting monument of Cooper, the eminent portrait painter, commonly distinguished as the miniature Vandyke. He was born in London, 1609. Anne, his sister, was Cromwell, Charles II. and his Queen, the Duchess of Cleveland, James Duke of York, and others of the Court. Louis XIV is said to have offered Cooper 3750 francs for his famous miniature of Cromwell, which, however, he would not be induced to part with. Cooper's wife was sent to the celebrated poet Prior. He died in 1672. His elder brother Alexander held the appointment of courtpainter to Christina, Queen of Sweden. This little monument is surmounted by the palette of the artist. The inscription is no longer legible—we read from it only an appeal for restoration. The forty of the Royal Academy might do it out of twenty crowns, and thus honour the memory of an eminent and characteristic [illegible] with little detriment to their funds

A short while since, the tombstone of William Woolett, the celebrated engraver, outside the Church, was in like condition, and, being overthrown, might, [illegible] have been among the things not accounted for, but for the contribution of a few of the faithful, who have now the satisfaction of preserving the memorial of [illegible] restored tombstone is [illegible] (No. 226 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

A large monument on the south side of the nave is dedicated to Hugh Platt, [illegible] The memorial is of the seventeenth century; but, by a curious mistake, it is stated upon the plate to have been repaired and beautified in the thirteenth century. This monument, it is understood, will be restored by one of the Colleges. A small brass on the north wall is in memory of Mary, wife of John Boresforde, gent., outer barrister of Gray's Inn, 1588: arms, a bear rampant, chained and muzzled; quartering, per chevron, three plumes. This small memorial Mr. Wykeham Archer undertakes to restore.

Other monuments, from the date of Queen Mary down to recent times, will be replaced in the New Church; and several flat stones, some of them records of honourable families, will be laid down in the pavement of the nave.

This Church is stated to have been the last in which the mass was celebrated, at the time of the Reformation, which circumstance, with other considerations,

Although the desideratum of the ancient Church will not fail to be regretted, it is satisfactory to observe, from the plans, &c., of Messrs. Gough and Rouleu, the architects, as well as by the specification of the contract, that the old [illegible] will be replaced by a [illegible] of an increasing congregation, soundly constructed, and in good architectural taste. (A view of the ancient Church appeared in No. 29 of our Journal.)

We conclude this notice with a hearty acknowledgment of the attention which has been shown by the architects and others concerned in preserving and rendering accessible the numerous vestiges of the ancient building which have appeared during their operations.

[illegible] termination of this monument (now taken down), the supposition [illegible] upon an earlier monument thus appropriated was confirmed [illegible] of memory, having over it a shield of early form, and surmounted by a cross. The holes for the rivets, and the lead by which they had been secured, shewing that it had contained brass. This was probably the monument of Gray, as indicated by the tradition alluded to by Weever.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1848.

THE surrender of Peschiera to the Piedmontese army, under the command of King Charles Albert, is the most important event of the week. The independence of Italy may be said to be affirmed by it. The double defeat of the Austrians—first, by the capture of this fortress; and, second, by the repulse of Marshal Radetski, with an army of 30,000 men, who marched to its relief—will have the double effect of giving to the cause of Italian freedom a still greater moral support throughout all Italy than it formerly enjoyed, and of increasing the resources in men and money of the Italian Generalissimo. The Italians have much to be proud of in this result. A native Sovereign and a native army have been found sufficient to expel the German oppressors, that lay like an incubus upon Italy. The aid of France—always dangerous for Italy to receive—has been found to be unnecessary; and Italy, relying upon herself to conquer her independence, will learn to rely upon herself for maintaining it. The good effect of this victory upon Italy it is easy to calculate; its effect, whether for good or ill, upon the tottering and divided empire of Austria is more difficult to speculate upon.

THE symptoms of the so-much-talked-of reaction in France are becoming more apparent; and the imminence of protracted commotion, or even civil warfare, not in Paris alone, but in the provinces, is made daily more evident. The once-idolized Lamartine has ceased to command the respect and love with which all parties received him in the earlier days of the Revolution; and the Executive Government, of which he is a member, has lost all its popularity. It is at feud with the National Assembly, and the National Assembly itself is looked upon with distrust by the working classes, and by such of the middle classes as are sincerely democratic in their principles, and anxious for the firm consolidation of the Republic. M. Thiers, who was not even proposed for the National Assembly [illegible] great was the distrust and hatred with which his name was regarded during the first heat of the revolutionary fervour—is likely, it appears, to be elected for the Department of the Seine, and for half-a-dozen places besides, in which new elections have been ordered, in consequence of the double returns of the first convocation. This is a proof of reaction, which, of itself, will sorely tax the patience of the ultra-democratic party. Add to this, the insurrection in favour of the Duke de Bordeaux (Henri V.) at Perpignan; the alleged presence of two of the sons of Louis Philippe at Paris; the intrigues of the vain Buonaparte so notorious for his onslaught upon Boulogne; the measures of severity adopted by the National Assembly to prevent attroupements or large assemblages in the streets of the capital, and, to crown all, the financial embarrassments necessarily caused by the Revolution, and which affect every class of society more or less severely: and we shall have more than sufficient evidence to show that the state of affairs gives no present hope of tranquillity. But the greatest alarm is felt for the possible result of the great banquet of reform which is to be held on Monday, under the very walls of the fortress of Vincennes, in which Barbès and Blanqui, the present heroes of the people, are confined. The price of a ticket, which originally was only five sous (twopence halfpenny) has been doubled; for which sum, bread and wine will be furnished to each guest. One hundred thousand tickets have already been sold; and the committee expect to dispose of another fifty thousand before this (Saturday) evening. There are to be one thousand tables, each sufficient to accommodate 150 guests.

The present state of things in France arose from a Banquet that was forbidden; it is not likely that the actual Government will imitate the dynasty which was overthrown, by forbidding the Banquet of Vincennes. It is, however, sufficiently alive to the danger which menaces it, and has taken precautions not only to prevent a sudden surprise of the fortress and liberation of the prisoners of the 15th of May, but to preserve the peace of the capital and the inviolability of the Assembly. It remains to be seen whether the precautions are sufficient for the emergency, and whether the friends of reaction, and of the ancien régime of Louis Philippe, and the still more ancien régime of which the Duke of Bordeaux is the impersonation, have not thrown off the mask too soon. Those who are best informed of the condition of France are those who are most deeply impressed with this danger.

LORD PALMERSTON seems to have issued with something like a triumph from the debate in the House of Commons on Mr. Bankes' motion for inquiry into the expulsion of Sir Henry Bulwer from Madrid. No party or individual in the House thought it expedient to come to close quarters with his Lordship. Nevertheless, it seemed to be a very general impression in the House, as it is out of it, that his Lordship's discretion in this particular affair was not equal to that which the relations between the countries demanded at his hands, and at those of his subordinates. It is possible that our Government made a mistake in its instructions to our Ambassador, or that our Ambassador made a mistake in his mode of acting upon them; but it seems positively certain that whatever our mistake may have been, that of the Spanish Government in spelling our Minister was infinitely greater. Circumstances, indeed, have since transpired which go far to show that Lord Palmerston, in giving his instructions to Sir Henry Bulwer, was much better informed of the real state of affairs in Madrid than he has received credit for being; and that General Narvaez and his Ministry have been playing a very desperate game in the interest of the Montpensiers, which his Lordship, in the interest of the reigning Sovereign, endeavoured to defeat. Our Government has invariably lent its support to Queen Isabella; so, it appears, has the Belgian Government. Our Minister at Madrid has been expelled; so has the Minister of the Belgian Court. The people of this country, and of Europe, knowing the designs of Louis Philippe in the Spanish marriages—aware also of the presence of his wife in the Spanish capital—aware also of the part that England took in that affair, will draw their own conclusions from these two facts. They have followed in rapid succession, and doubtless hang together. People will ask for what reason General Narvaez removes from Madrid the representatives of those powers that are most sincerely attached to the constitutional throne of Queen Isabella?—and what can be the stakes for which he and his party play, which they do not fear in pursuit of it to insult such a power as Great Britain?

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their Lordships met at half-past four o'clock, when the Royal Assent was given by commission to a number of bills.

Several petitions against the Scotch Registration Bill were presented.

SPANISH PENSIONERS.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY complained that the return for which he had moved, of the names of the Spanish pensioners on the English Pension Bill, did not furnish all the information which he required of it. There were several persons on the list who had no claim whatever to any pension from the English Government. He wished to know who had given these pensions to those unworthy persons, and for what services they had been granted.—Lord MONTEAGLE said, the Government had invariably confined in the representations of the Horse Guards with regard to these pensions. He objected to the publication of those names as unjustifiable to the feelings of private individuals.

IRELAND.—Earl FITZWILLIAM gave notice that on Monday, the 19th, he should bring the present condition of Ireland under the attention of their lordships.

The Petty Bag Office Bill, and the Collectors of Cess (Ireland) Bill, were read a third time, and passed.

On the motion of Lord CAMPBELL, the Registration of Births, Marriages and Deaths (Scotland) Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee. The House then adjourned for the Whitsun holidays until Thursday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

A number of petitions were presented in favour of Parliamentary Reform.

THE WEST INDIES.—Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that on Friday, the 16th instant, he should make a Motion to this House of the views entertained by her Majesty's Government in respect to the present distressed state of the West India Colonies. (Hear.) And that on Thursday the 15th inst., on the re-assembling of the House, he should move that the first order of the day proceeded with be the consideration of the Health of Towns Bill. (Hear.)

Several petitions were presented in favour of and against the Navigation Bill.

NAVIGATION LAWS.

The order of the day having been read for resuming the adjourned debate on the Navigation and Regulation of Ships and Seamen's Bill,

Lord G. BENTINCK rose and addressed the House against the measure.

Mr. HUME said, that so far from destroying our navy, and injuring our commerce, as the noble Lord (Bentinck) and his supporters contended, the repeal of the Navigation Laws would tend materially to strengthen the one and develop the other of these sources of our national welfare, and voted for the measure.

Admiral BOWLES thought if the House consented to a repeal of those laws, it would be acting in a rash, hasty, and regrettable manner.

Mr. CORDEN said the repeal of these laws would benefit the ship-owner, the ship-builder, the seaman, and the whole community of consumers.

Mr. DISRAELI conceived such repeal would involve our external relations in inextricable confusion, and could not consent to lay a destructive hand upon that great guarantee of our national greatness.

Sir R. PEEL ably supported the Government measure; and said, in the words of Adam Smith, who had been so much relied upon, by the opponents of any change, that "these laws were unfavourable to commerce and to the national prosperity."

Lord JOHN RUSSELL said that the able and conclusive speech of the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) relieved him from the necessity of replying at length to the objections which had been brought against the proposal of the Government. If Parliament wished to lead public opinion it must remove these harassing and vexatious restrictions.

The House then divided, and the numbers were:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| For the bill ... | ... ... ... | 294 |
| For the amendment ... | ... ... ... | 177 |
| Majority in favour of the bill ... | ... ... | —117 |

The House then went into Committee on the resolutions were agreed to and reported. The House adjourned at a quarter to three until Thursday next.

The Committee of Public Works have adopted the following resolutions relative to the purchase of railways by the Government:—1. That all railways shall be purchased by the Government, and become the property of the State. 1. That the purchase shall be made by giving the shareholders rentes on the State. 3. ITALY.

Advices from Florence announce an insurrection in Calabria, headed by Ferdinand Ruffo, with the Marquis Gagliardi at their head, had captured the forts of Pizzo, Monteleone, and Montelecone. A Provisional Government was established.

The same advices also state that accounts had been received at Florence from Naples, by a French steam-boat, which touched at Leghorn on the 30th ult., declaring that, on the day of her departure from Naples, 27 of the Liberal party had been executed.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

There was again a brilliant assemblage of rank and fashion on Saturday night, to witness the fourth representation of "Lucia," by Mdlle. Jenny Lind, and the curtain rose on an enthusiastic as on any former occasion.

Tuesday being devoted to the interment of the Princess Sophia there will be no performance.

On Thursday, for the extra night, Donizetti's popular comic opera, "L'Elisir d'Amore" was performed for the first time this season, with the attraction of Mdlle. Lind's first appearance in this country in the character of Adina. The house was crowded to excess in every part, and the opera went off with great éclat, there being no less than four encores in the second act. The part of Adina contains no display of violent emotion, it is that of a village coquette, and Mdlle. Lind's spirit and vivacity carried her through very successfully, although not so strong a display of archness as one might have anticipated from her "Figlia del Reggimento." She was called for and led on at the first act, and at the termination of the opera twice. Her singing of the large "Prendi, per me sei liberi," was exquisitely beautiful. It is the only touch of pathos displayed in Mdlle. Lind's first character, of course, comprehending vivacity, archness, as usual, the great point of attraction in every scene of the work, in Dulcamara. His inimitable by-play ensured two encores for his duos with Adina in the last act. He developed new points of humour in every scene, and kept the audience in roars with scraps of English and French ad libitum; his gaiety was incessant, and his mingled pomposity and fun created from first to last the most intense hilarity. The Belcore of Belletti was well sung in many portions. His voice seemed in the last act by his execution of some difficult florid divisions; but his Servant would be improved by more gallant bearing and swagger than he displayed. The Notaro of Gardoni was charmingly sung and nicely acted. His sympathetic organ in the delicious melody "Una furtiva," with the bassoon accompaniment, ensured the unanimous demand for its repetition.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The fame acquired by Mdme. Viardot in German, by her performance of Donna Anna in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," rendered her first appearance in that character in this country, on Saturday night, a matter of considerable interest, still further increased by the general persuasion that her predecessor, Grisi, had made the part her own by her powerful and pathetic voice, and vehement declamation. It was thus no ordinary ordeal for Mdme Viardot, but she acquitted a decided triumph. At the same time, this success will leave Grisi's glory unimpaired, for nothing can be more widely different than the two conceptions. The Donna Anna of Grisi is grand and impressive by its and starts, just as the dramatic situations become intense: it is only when the grief and anger of Donna Anna are overwhelmingly pressing, that the genius of Grisi is developed in its lofty attributes. The Donna Anna of Viardot, on the contrary, depicts the anguish of a devoted child and the indignation of an outraged woman, step by step: less massive and broad in effects, it is more highly coloured and finished in the artistic details. To Grisi the supremacy of her unrivalled organ in Viardot the superiority of her style of vocalisation, may be awarded. Both impersonations are first-rate specimens of lyric excellence, which will ensure an equal number of admirers.

Striking further comparisons, let the Donna Anna of Viardot be considered in individual embodiment. Donna Anna enters in the first scene, the "introduction alone," in which she holds the libertine fast, until her father's sword is vainly used to avenge the outrage. She returns with aid, but too late—and in the recitative "Ma qual mai," she recognizes her pursuit's lifeless form, and faints, recovering only to vent her grief and call upon Don Ottavio to take revenge. The acting of Viardot throughout this trying scene was wonderfully truthful and effective; the fainting almost seemed like reality, and the seeking to find some solution still in the dead body was painfully real. The next scene for Donna Anna is after the quartet, "Non ti fidar." Viardot's shudder, as Don Giovanni kissed her hand after she had identified him as the murderer of the Commendatore, and her outbreak of indignation in the recitative, describing the night of violence, and in the air "Or sai che l'indegno," were magnificently depicted, and elicited unanimous applause. In the trio adagio "Protegga il giusto cielo," her singing combined with that of Corbari and Mario, ensured the customary encore. In the finale of the first act, the acting and singing of Viardot, in the denunciation of Don Giovanni, were regards with which it is little left for Donna Anna in the second act; she shares in the sestetto "Sola, sola," and then is generally seen no more. In the Viardot restored to her prime to the final banquet scene of "Don Giovanni." It rose with a recitative largheto, "Troppo mi spiace," and terminates with a rondo larghetto, "Non mi dir." The tragic declamation of the former, and the powerful and striking vocalisation in the latter by Madame Viardot, created an unprecedented sensation, and, for the first time in operatic annals, this piece was the unanimous demand for its repetition. Her marvellous articulation of the florid and difficult divisions, in the upper portion of her register, ensured for her the rapturous plaudits of professors and connoisseurs; whilst her impassioned feeling and graceful action assured the sympathies of the audience. The general recollection of this great vocal achievement seemed to force itself on the house, after the close of the opera, although the ghost scene, with punishment of the libertine, impervious, and Madame Viardot was called before the curtain, although Tamburini had received his usual ovation.

The remainder of the cast exhibited its perfect ensemble, Madame Persiani being Zerlina, Corbari Elvira, Mario Don Ottavio, Tamburini Don Giovanni, Lablache Leporello, Tagliafico Il Commendatore, and Tamburini Don Giovanni. The were several encores; the finale to the first act produced immense excitement, and the choral and orchestral forces were manœuvred by Costa with astounding skill and precision.

Rossini's "Cenerentola" was given on Monday, being a subscription night, instead of Tuesday, all the theatres being closed on the latter day, in obedience to orders on the late evening. Alboni created the usual sensation in the finale, "Non più mesta."

On Thursday, for the extra night, Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" was performed for the third time this season. An apology was made for Grisi, on the ground of a severe cold, but she sang and acted magnificently. Alboni and Mario were in excellent voice. After the "Barcarole," Mario and Grisi and Signor Tamburini sang in character the scene of the Manager and his capricious prima donna, from Greece's opera of "La Prova d'un Opera Seria." It was received with shouts of laughter and thunders of applause; and both artistes were called for, after their imitations of each other's voice and style. The scene was quite full.

HAYMARKET.

For a comic drama from Paris to open of a successful author, and embracing the talents of Mr. Farren, Mr. and Mrs. Keeley, Mrs. Nisbett, Mrs. Hunt, Mrs. Glover, Mr. Wigan, and others, not to go throughout with roars of laughter and applause, is certainly strange. And yet Mr. Parry's new piece, entitled "Omens and Old Coincidences," produced on Monday last, and repeated on Saturday evening, did not achieve that success which was anticipated. Possibly this arose from an embarras des richesses—the author had so many finely good and quaint characters to manage at once, that all plot became lost in his anxiety to keep them all up to the mark; and although the incidents were of a very droll nature, there wanted a clear story to make them fall in well and naturally with one another. This, in a great measure, destroyed the effect of the second act, in which the chief dramatis personæ are gathered together at a pic nic on a Thames eyot. Otherwise the scene was remarkably well "worked," and displayed great humour and tact on the part of the author, in what is always a difficult and somewhat hazardous thing—to manage Four act passes in a St. John's Wood boarding-house—a good locality for bringing in varieties of character; and these are well drawn. Mr. Farren, as Old Token, a superstitious old bachelor; Mrs. Nisbett as Mrs. Fitzmarsmith, a military widow, and Mrs. Glover as Miss Prase, an "arch" old maid. Besides these, Mr. Wigan is a "last" man-about-town, speculating in railways and outrunning the constable, as Frederick Gayhurst; Mr. Tilbury is an old Corporal Grubb; and Mr. and Mrs. Keeley are two servants.

Now, all these are famous types, and grafted on to a piece would not have failed in being very effective. But as it was, though they were all done the fullest justice to by the artistes, the dilemmas into which they were drawn fell comparatively far from want of purpose in bringing them out, and hence the applause at the fall of the curtain, of which there was certainly a good deal, was tempered with other less cheering opinions. Our impression is, that with some curtailment and that closeness of action which can only be brought about by repetition, it will in a few nights go very well. It is announced for repetition every evening not devoted to the performances of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean.

The popular artists just named have done great service to the Haymarket since their reappearance last week in "The Wife's Secret."

THE OLYMPIC

As we anticipated, the above theatre has closed after a very melancholy and unprofitable career.

ST. JAMES'S

The lively troupe of the far-famed Palais Royal Theatre, in Paris, imported bodily by Mr. Mitchell, commenced their representations at this house on Friday evening, and to the apparently immense satisfaction of the audience. Ravel, Grassot, Alcide Tousez, and Levasseur are good names in one company. The two former appeared on Friday in "Une Fièvre Brûlante;" and Mdlle. Figeac, in "La Savoisiarde Impériale." They could not have been better appreciated in their own merry little theatre, ensuing rounds of laughter and applause by the vivacities. The exceeding cleverness, and withal finesse, of their acting is a very profitable lesson to the entire profession. It is to be regretted that comparatively few of our performers understand French, or they might derive both pleasure and advantage from an occasional visit to the French Plays. A is made a perfect science with their foreign brethren.

ing in general society, they acquire the manners of the facility of depicting them. The mere fact that among all our actors at this present time we have no recognised "Jeune premier," proves how little this matter is attended to amongst us.

The French company of the Théâtre Historique did not open on Wednesday.

DRURY LANE, as was announced. We believe the cause of this was a hitch of plays relative to certain portions of "Monte Christo."

When M. Dumas first submitted this drama to the Parisian censor, its representation was suspended in consequence of objections raised to the scenes in which Villefort, the Procureur du Roi, principally figured. These being altered, the piece was brought out

The state of theatrical affairs in Paris must be at a very low ebb just now, when we find it worth the while of two entire companies from the two most popular theatres, to come over here upon the mere chance of our patronage. The great drama of the day has, however, offered more real and powerful interest than any theatrical productions.

The houses in London have been equally badly attended. In one or two instances it is true that this has arisen from the perfect absence of advertising in the bills that people would care to go and see; but the universal complaint from the members of other professions, such as music, singing, &c., is, that there is very little money now lying about to be expended in mere amusements.

LYCEUM.

"Anything for a Change" is the name of a charming vaudeville, written by Mr. Shirley Brookes, and produced with very great success at the theatre, on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Snappington (Mr Charles Mathews) has a most serious propensity to want everything belonging to everybody else. He is engaged to the sister of Mr. Honeyball (Mr. Harley), whom he has never seen. Knowing his weakness, Mr. Honeyball prevails upon his wife (Mrs. Leigh Murray) to pass for the sister (Miss Fitzwilliam), and the sister is to pretend to be the wife, in turn. The plan succeeds. Believing the married lady to be his intended, he is exceedingly cool to her, but falls over head and ears in love with the supposed married lady; and the plot's never discovered until the parties have to sign certain documents.

It will be seen how very slight is the story of this lively piece; but there was a freshness in the writing and a drollery in the incidents, together with an easy, off-hand portraiture of the drawing-room manners of the day, apart from our confined stage representation, that rendered it exceedingly agreeable to the laughter and applause culminating to a good round at the end, without anything like a dissentient voice. It comes nearer to those very pleasant comedicettas of society with which the French stage abounds—the introduction of some scandal or pretty airs increasing the resemblance—than anything we have seen for some time. Indeed, the presence of the "registrar of marriages" in the last scene looked so like the "notary" of the foreign dramas, that we should have suspected a translation, had we not been advisedly informed that the piece was entirely original.

The morning room in which the action passes was beautifully fitted up, and the acting inimitable. Mr. Charles Mathews was better suited with a part than he has been for some time. His restless quaintnesses and fidgety intolerance of a tête-a-tête with his supposed intended, ending in his going to sleep whilst she was singing, were depicted in his very best manner. Mr. Harley was as quaint and funny as ever; more especially when, with a query attempt at laughter, he suspects Snappington has fallen in love, really, with his wife, after all. Miss Fitzwilliam played with all possible spirit, singing the incidental music charmingly, and accompanying herself with great skill on the piano; and Mrs. Leigh Murray ably seconded her. Nor must we omit to praise Miss Marshall, who was as prettily coquettish as a smart little servant could be expected to be—perhaps more so. All the performers were recalled at the end of the piece; and we confidently prognosticate that "Anything for a Change" will preclude the necessity of any for some time.

Miss Julia Bennett announces her benefit for the evening of the 20th instant, when she will appear in a favourite comedy, and other entertainments. So clever and popular an actress will, without doubt, command a good house.

MUSIC.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.—The eighth and last concert of the season was given on Wednesday night, at the Hanover Rooms, under the direction of the Duke of Wellington for the Earl of Westmoreland, now in Berlin. Sir H. R. Bishop conducted, Mr. H. Blagrove was the principal violin, and Mr. Lucas organist. The scheme opened with Handel's Coronation Anthem, "The King shall rejoice," Cherubini's "Agnes Dei" overture, a selection from "Israel in Egypt," H. Lawes's glee, "Smile now again," Festa's madrigal, "Down in a flowery vale," concerted piece, "Discord, dire sister," Stevens's glee, "Ye spotted snakes," "Avison's "Sound the loud timbral," Beethoven's chorus, "God is great in battle," with solos by Mdme. Caradori, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Rainsford, Mr. Lockey, and Mr. Phillips, who were included in the gleanings. The Duke of Cumbridge and Prince George, the Prince of Hesse, &c., were present. The establishment has now completed its 73rd season.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The third concert, on Saturday last, whilst it exhibited the talents of the pupils in a favourable light, afforded no novelty for criticism. There were pianoforte, violoncello and vocal performances, by Miss Marshall, Mr. Kellish, Mr. Horace Chipp, and Mr. B. Wells; and vocal pieces by Miss Browne, Taylor, Owen, Ward, Holroyd, Reeves, Messrs. St. Albyn, Phillips, &c. Miss Lanza conducted, and M. Sainton led the band.

MISS BASSANO'S MATINÉE MUSICALE.—This concert took place on Saturday, at the house of W. Tyrrel, Esq., Hinde-street, and was fashionably attended. Miss Bassano is a highly accomplished vocalist, and with the aid of Madame Lucas, Miss Alleyn, the Misses Berrell, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Bodda, and Mr. Howell, gave a very agreeable entertainment. Madame Goffrie, Mr. F. B. Jewson and Mr. Lindsay Sloper (pianoforte), and Platti (violoncello), Goffri, and Hermann (violin), being the solo instrumentalists.

THE BEETHOVEN QUARTET SOCIETY.—At the sixth meeting, held on Monday night, at 48, Great Marlborough-street, the first part, devoted to the memory of Beethoven, was composed his No. 3, in E flat major; No. 8, in E minor; and No. 4, in D major, op. 44. In the second part, Beethoven's No. 12, in E flat major, op. 127, was selected. The executants were Molique, Sainton, Hill, and Lucas.

THE MORNING (PENULTIMATE) PERFORMANCE AND THIRD CONCERT AT THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Wednesday morning there was the novelty of a morning operatic representation. It was intended to have given Rossini's "Nozze di Figaro;" but, owing to the indisposition of Grisi, "La Cenerentola" was substituted, which went off with spirit. At the third concert on Friday week, the "Stabat Mater" was performed, and the miscellaneous part comprising the entire strength of the company. The principal item in the scheme was the admirable singing of Viardot and Tamburini, in the comic duo "Ah guardate," which was encored.

Madame Boulanger Rungé, the singer of French and German romances, is at present in London. This lady, who enjoys a high Parisian reputation, sang at the French plays on the occasion of a visit paid by her also at Mdlle. Lind's concert on the last instant, with great success. Her style is cultivated, and she is also an accomplished musician.

SIGNOR BRIZZI'S MATINEE MUSICALE.—Brizzi is a pleasing tenor, and a professor of singing, who enjoys much popularity. His annual concert is one of the best of the season. It was held at the house of R. B. Williams, Esq., and the singers were the élite of the Royal Italian Opera company—Grisi, Alboni, Castellan, Corbari, Mario, Tamburini; besides Gardoni, R. Costa, and Ciabatta; with Benedict, Aiam, and Piatti, as conductors. Signor Emiliani and Mr. Williams played violin and piano solos.

MR. S. J. NOBLE'S EVENING CONCERT.—Mr. Noble's Concert, at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Monday evening, was high interesting, and exhibited his powers as a pianist in the best light. He was aided by Mr. W. H. Holmes, Mr. J. B. Chatterton, Mr. E. W. Thomas, and Miss Dolby, Miss Birch, Miss Romano, the Misses Williams, Mr. H. Phillips, and Mr. Reeves.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—Mr. Blagrove gave one of his Quartet and Solo Concerts on Monday evening at the Mortimer-street Rooms. The Berlin Band, directed by Herr Lanzhaus, and a performance on the organ by Herr Haupt at Crosby Hall, and Mr. Wilson had his entertainment at the Musical Hall. Haydn's "Creation," performed at Exeter Hall by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, conducted by Costa, was given in aid of the Sons of the Clergy Orphan Asylum. This morning (Saturday) M. Billet will give a pianoforte performance at Willis's Rooms. On Monday will be the seventh Philharmonic Concert, and Mr. Julian Adams's second Chamber Concert. Herr Lanza has made a concert at the Hanover Rooms, and the meeting of the Musical Union. On Wednesday the annual performance of "The Messiah" at the Hanover Rooms, in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians. Mdlle. Lind has consented to sing, of £10 to this excellent institution. On Thursday morning Mr. Sterndale Bennett will give his annual concert, at the Hanover-Rooms. On Friday morning, Mdlle. Sophie Loder, a talented pianist, will give a concert at Willis's Rooms, Covent Garden. In the evening Miss Steele and Mr. Brinsley Richards have their concert at the Hanover-Room. Mr. Surman takes a benefit at Exeter Hall, when the London Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Haydn's Seasons" and Miss Binfield Williams has a concert at the Princess' Rooms. The annual concert of Mr. Surman at Crosby Hall, was well attended, and he was encored in his new songs of "Baron Von Croe," and "High and Low," as also John Parry in his new "History of England." Mr. Willy, jun., and Mr. Louis Lee were the conductors. Mr. P. Chatterton, Mr. R. Green, and Mr. Richardson played solos on the harp, violin, and flute. The vocalists were Miss Dolby, Miss Cubitt, Miss E. Lyon, Miss M. O'Connor, Messrs. F. Smith, Genge, &c. Mr. Stocking's concert at the Princess' Rooms was supported by Miss H. B. Williams, Mr. J. Thomas, and Guido Regondi in solos for the piano, harp, and concertina; and by Miss F. Lablache, Mrs. G. Plummer, the Misses Alexander, Miss E. Badger, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. Gregg, and Mr. John Parry; Mr. Stocking being the conductor.

THE CHINESE JUNK.—This interesting and novel exhibition, as we predicted, has proved the great attraction to the whole of the fashionable visiters, in addition to the Queen, Prince Albert, the Queen Dowager, are the Princes of Wales, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Prince Paul of Wirtemburg, Prince Metternich, the Duke of Wellington, Lanster, Northumberland, the Duchess of Northumberland, the Dowager Duchess of Bedford, the Countesses of Wilton, Clanbrassil, and Blessington, Lady Lyndhurst, the Marquisses of Anglesea, Bourne, Donegal, and Breadalbane, the Earls of Auckland, Sheffield, Strathmore, Zetland, Wilton, Lords Hastings, Hill, Lyndhurst, Adolphus Fitzclarence, Pusset, Jermyn, Paget, C. Paget, and Bridport, the Bishops of Durham, Lichfield, Worcester, and Salisbury, Count D'Orsay, the Hon. C. Cavendish Seymour, Miss Burdett Coutts, Mdlle. Jenny Lind, &c

ASCOTEN of the leading Charts, J. W. Vernon, was on Thursday committed for trial, in default of bail, on a charge of using seditious language.

On Wednesday evening last a grand festival of operatives was held in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, to celebrate the giving of the Royal Assent to the Ten-hours' Bill, which event occurred on the 7th of June last year. There were upwards of 3000 persons present, belonging to Manchester and the adjoining manufacturing districts; and speeches and resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting alternated with the more substantial comforts of the table in occupying their attention to a late hour. Lord Ashley, Lord Ingestre, the Marquis of Blandford, Mr. J. Fielden, &c., were amongst those present and gentlemen present on the occasion.

THE LATE INSURRECTION IN NAPLES.

SCENE OF THE LATE CONFLICT.—THE KING'S PALACE.—THE TOLEDO.—ST. ELMO.

THESE Illustrations, from a pair of Sketches, by Correspondents, represent the principal locality of the late Revolution. To the right of the first scene is the Royal Palace, a large mass of buildings; the new portion having a front of nearly 400 feet in length, with three orders of columns, one above another Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian. Opposite is the Palace of the Prince of Salerno. In the distance is the great street of Toledo, where, as described by our Correspondent last week, the great conflict took place. And, high above, is the Hill of St. Elmo, or Ermo, crowned by the Castle of that name, which commands town.

The barricades in the Toledo, and the concentration of the troops round the Royal Palace, are specially mentioned by our Correspondent, who adds:—At 11 o'clock the Castle of St. Elmo, which commands the town, fired three signal guns, and then the firing of musketry broke the solemn silence, accompanied with the roar of artillery. The Swiss were attacking the barricade which crossed the street Toledo. The fire was returned; and suddenly every balcony was crowded by National Guards, who fired on the advancing troops. The conflict had commenced with savage earnestness on both sides. As we returned by way of the Royal Palace, we found the large open space crowded with troops, spectators of the scene.

In the second scene we have a touching episode of the outbreak—a party of Swiss troops in the act of carrying two of their wounded comrades for an airing in the streets of Naples. Some twenty or thirty of such litters were to be seen about the city at a time, with carriages containing other sufferers who were not so badly wounded.

Recent accounts from Naples describe the state of that city as deplorable; the inhabitants refused to have recourse, as formerly, to the small services of the lazzaroni, and preferred carrying home their own provisions, &c. The fruits of plunder were sold by the lazzaroni at very low prices; gold watches, for example, were disposed of for a ducat each. The Civic Guard, it seems, have not given up all their arms. Of the 14,000 that had been distributed, only 4000 had been returned. Messina, in Sicily, was entering into the views of the people. The position of the tyrant Ferdinand is by no means free from embarrassment, to add to which, a large body of the ex-deputies have assembled at Pizzo and decreed his dethronement

In the course of the week a rumour to the following effect was published in some of the daily journals:—"A private letter from Turin states that while they were singing Te Deum in the cathedral of that city for the recent victories of the Piedmontese over the Austrians, the Minister for Foreign Affairs announced that he had received a despatch from Naples announcing that the King had been assassinated."

REPUBLICAN ECONOMY. The Journal des Débats states, that "by the removal of M. Emile Thomas from the direction of the national workshops, a saving of from 25,000 to 30,000 francs (from £1000 to £1200 a day) will be effected. M. Emile Thomas retained for his service five chariots, four cabriolets, 14 dilburies, a calèche, and 38 horses!"

EXPORTATION OF ARMS.—DANISH WAR.—In consequence of communications made by the Danish Ambassador to the Foreign Secretary, the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury have ordered that if the collectors and comptrollers of customs at the various ports shall be satisfied that any arms or warlike stores are embarked from this country, for the purpose of being employed in hostilities against the Danish Government, that they shall prevent their being exported, and report the facts to the Board of Customs.

A DEPUTATION from the Steam-ship Owners' Association of London, comprising twenty-one companies, and representing upwards of 100,000 tons of steam shipping, had an interview with Lord John Russell, on Wednesday, at his official residence, in Downing-street.

ARREST AND COMMITTAL OF CHARTISTS.—Ernest Jones, Williams, Fussel, and Sharp, were arrested on Wednesday, and having been examined at Bow-street were ordered to find bail, and meanwhile lodged in Newgate. The full effect of this decisive measure appears to have been shown in the preservation of the public peace. On that (Wednesday) night Clerkenwell-green, which, for the previous fortnight, had been in a state of constant agitation, from the frequent meetings of the Chartists, assumed its usual appearance. During the evening there were but six policemen on duty, who had only to patrol the locality. A large body of the G division, however, were at the station in the Ragmuge-wells-road, in readiness, lest their services should have been required, and who attended there as early as seven o'clock in the evening. The usual places of rendezvous of the Chartist leaders at Farringdon Hall, the National Hall, the institution in the Blackfriars-road, &c., were entirely deserted. After the termination of the proceedings at Bow-street, at which there was a numerous attendance of the friends of the prisoners, these proceeded to their several lodges, evidently much disconcerted as to the course that should be adopted under the existing circumstances It is expected that, in consequence of the determined steps of the government, the demonstration intended for Whit-Monday will not be carried into effect.

ASCOT HEATH RACES.

Dum licet in rebus jucundis, vive beatus.—Horat. lib. 1 ast. vi.

So be it, O Pisonis! even to the spirit—a thousand removes beyond the letter. There is no need that, in any case, the serious interests of life—the necessity of our being—should give place to its pleasure: but when the free-will offerings of a bone Providence are presented to our convenient acceptance, shame be to the churl that turns away in apathy and unthankfulness—be the apostate of an unholy creed, who holds mortification the most grateful oblation to Him who, in his infinite goodness, hath deigned to endow the human family with every appliance "that maketh the heart glad."

The Royal Meeting is full of the classic relish—

Sergiosco sacros cantu celebrare nepotes et fugit urbes.

Some two thousand years ago the people of the pin were excellent of taste, and so they are (or ought to be) at this present writing. As Horace writ, and John Branham sang, it is their delight to "quit the gay throng for the shade." Is there a penny-a-liner known to flimsy that would not barter the Victoria for Virginia Water. What a vernal season has the present been? What a time and tide of loving-kindness and living glory.

O Spring! of hope and love, and truth and gladness,
Wind whisper-in dural helpless, hast, and fairest!
Whence comest thou, when, with dark Winter's sadness,
Th' years that fade in sunny smiles thou shrest?
Voice of Joy, thou art the child who wearest
Thy mother's dying smile—tender and sweet:
Thy mother Autumn, for whose grave thou bearest
Fresh flowers, and leaves like flowers, with gentle feet
Disturbing not the leaves that are her winding-sheet.

Beneath a heaven, blue and brilliant as poetry paints the sapphire; screened by a canopy of waving emeralds, to wile away the fresh, fragrant morning, in anticipation of a noon crowned with revelry and gallant enterprise; surely, contrasted with the dull common-places of conventionalism, hoc est

the only pity being that its multiple is not a sum at the disposition of our people' humour. . . . The man of vinegar philosophy objects against this postulate: he sits down to the feast of life as if it were constituted of courses of "cold porridge:" we cannot fraternise with Smallbrugus.

The accidents which still wait on all thus man proposes were adverse to the prosperity of Ascot in the present year. Passing these, all had been especially cared for, and the meeting was offered to public enjoyment with far more excellence than had ever previously distinguished it; that is, relating to the pomp and pageantry of the turf. Its morale is, unquestionably, not in the ascendant. No one can approve of the ostensible arrangements of the late Derby day: were good horses drawn without permitting their owners legitimate possibilities of gain, and depriving their backers altogether of hope, however forlorn? See the lampoons with which the clubs teem: are they complimentary to the virtue of Olympians in high places? The fact is, racing—in reference to the owners of stands—is simply a game of keen encounter of wit, and something more, in which the gentle and ingenuic mingle as in a melée of the barricades. This is very much to be regretted: but it is, like all other evils, a mischief that must wear itself out: it will exhaust itself among the clubs it has exhausted its materiel—the flats—a period which cannot be very remote. Nobody goes to a race-course now, however, with any business intention, save as a man might go to purchase wares in Field lane. He anticipates the style of dealing that awaits him and shapes his policy to his champion. Many have begun to eschew even the speculative mania, and frequent Ascot and Goodwood in the spirit which leads them to any mere al fresco rendezvous. With these let us count in the present instance: with such let us canter cavalierly—couching cigar in lieu of lance—through the breezy glades of Windsor forest: now intent on the bluest of lakes and streams, now luxuriating amid the greenest of glades and uplands. The absence of the Court had necessarily a malignant effect on the fortunes of the Royal races. The Queen, after her august family moved to Osborne on Wednesday—it may be added, par parenthèse, under almost celestial auspices. Never was there so transcendent a day, nor ever—within modern recollection—did the Solent float a fleet of more glorious profession. Spithead was a galaxy of gallants—three-deckers, in their full-dress, were actually universes of hunting.

But we must return to Ascot, or rather arrive there—a feat we must now be supposed to have accomplished. It was well, but, as we have premised, not brilliantly attended. All the details are admirable. There was a new master of the ceremonies, Lord Desborough, just appointed Master of the Buck-hounds—a sinecure, as the journals have recently been denouncing it! Diana help them! In the Stand enclosure this improvement (it has only been a year in progress) is moved considerably more to the west, so as to be within reach of the Jockey Club Stand, a new dining station, on Ascot Heath. The clerk of the course has permitted the grass to grow high enough, to hide a cowkney—to what all far from the surface of the soil, however smitten by the sun, would be obviated. In short all was excellent: lobster salads and Wenham ice inclusive—and now let us attend to the bell for saddling.

The Trial Stakes was the prologue of Thursday. A field of eight had. Wax Eagle won with odds against him: the horse that ought to have won the St. Leger last year—being a very bad third. A 50 sovs. sweepstakes for two-year-olds, six subscribers, brought one-half of them to the post, a colt belonging to Mr. Herbert, by Venison out of Odessa (that is the colt, not Mr. Herbert), winning by half a length. The Lord Exeter's Sister to Hydrangea beat Footstool, Rataplan, and Cymba for the Queen's Vase; and Wiasma talked of for the Oaks—walked over for a 50 sovs. Gradues Stakes, seven ran, and Cambuscan, the principal event of the day, the Ascot Stakes—handicap, of course—brought out twenty-three of the 216 entries. Vampyre, of the lucky Goodwood stud, the favourite and the winner. Succeeding this, Lord Chesterfield started for and Derby with Distaffina: and the First Year of the Ascot Triennial Foal Stakes Lord Eglinton won, with Ethiron. The Welcome Stakes, Springy Jack, with 5 to 1 on him, won in a considerable canter. And thus ended an uncommon dull day's sport: but the betting was a bad average, as the legs quoted it; surrending was the other way.

Wednesday—albeit the weather was the fairest of the fair—drew but a very indifferent attendance, and was marked by no incident of account. There was sport enough, however, as the subjoined epitome of it will show. A little 10 sovs. sweepstakes, for three-year-olds and upwards, four to the post; which Pic-nic, the favourite, won in a canter. The Fern-hill Stakes, five starters, all placed: the Moor won, beating for second Blaze, backed at all sorts of odds, from 7 to 4 to 5 to 1 against him. The Coronation Stakes to Lord Chesterfield carried off with Distaffina, beating three others with all ease; and the Windsor Stakes fell to the lot of Springy Jack, despite his 3lbs. extra, defeating Shylock, who ran third. The Royal Hunt Cup brought to the post a field of thirteen: the winner was Coryngham, with 12 to 1 against him; a fine race, with Robinson's fine riding for Sir Robert Pigott. The Windsor Town Plate (half-a-dozen runners) wound up the day, Wellingham winning in a canter.

Thursday, the once-brilliant Cup day—was that we should write it!—was only short of Derby-dories. The morning broke promisingly enough, but during the forenoon there were very serious rain falls—as well as real brass as could be got to the occasion—the attendance was 50 per cent. under the usual amount! Even the band, the last twenty years had monopolised as the royal stand was there, with its waiters in the livery of death. Its carriages, with a single file, were next to be seen—and the spirit of sport alone was the feature of the day. Thousand messengers to it! The racing evening will be at James's race stakes, run a match between Chanticleer and Backbiter, at 11 to 8 on the latter.

The Queen's Plate was another match, which was won by Beetstone, in a canter, beating Lord Exeter. At a quarter to three o'clock came the Emperor's Plate. After most tiresome, fair work of 50 sovs. each, there was a sweeping look, in expectation for the rush. How had it fell out for Heroes, and there was the cry of Buccaneer, Radiator, all set running, to the Sandy hill-post, where he gave it, and the crack was standing loud, with Hero in front, and Sancho half-a-dozen lengths behind the second. Then it was to the hill I cry, where Alfred Day pulled the Hero a little, and the result was, "Hero and Sancho coming," for their Exeter rushed the leader to the last, when successfully. In the run home the race came in towards the grand stand, apparently but a match with the race always in hand, and hardly waiting spur or cane. Backbiter was first between behind, but a long way from the racing pace. The race was for a quite fairly-run one—exactly the sort of work Ascot loves. A Sweepstakes of 50 sovs., for three-year-olds, second best, was with all ease, beating the old antagonists, Backbiter a long way from the racing pace. The race was for a quite fairly-run one—exactly the sort of work Ascot loves.

The sun now shone out again, and the important new Stakes, the first of the leading two-year-old races, was brought to the scene. On the thirty eight heads only seven came to the post, and favourites and the race. Garrick won by a length, at a trot. They talked the match to Lord [illegible] about 1am for the Derby. O Mr. Green, it never can be but it pays. A pretty full turn-out finally for the Stand Plate—a sorry Plate—a sorry business, the winner of the Queen's Plate. This animal also won both these races this year. The Stand Plate wound up the list. It brought out half-a-dozen, Lady Lurwood the winner—very cleverly. Friday is the "off day," and we forego its details.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY. Although the Derby settling is generally pronounced a good one, it was only an average one, whether the amount, the numbers, and of settlements, settlers, and the sums to be paid, or the number of bets to be lost, attention to business is the first thing to be done.

The Ascot Prize Plate of this year maintains the advance made of late in this class of work, both as regards the design and manufacture. The additional character of the three prizes is, indeed, worthy of high commendation. The conventional cause of "Cup" is no longer strictly applicable to these works; but, as the prizes are thus designated in the lists, pro forma, we retain them.

THE EMPEROR'S CUP.

This imperial prize is an extremely interesting historical composition, upon the face of a shield, five feet three inches in diameter, if silver. The outward edge or border is highly burnished, and has the usual legend, "Undorum Asciensium memor, quibus ipse interfuisset Regina Victoria hospes, mens. Jun., 1844; Solenne certamini equestris premium instituit Nicholaus totius Russiæ imperator," inscribed upon it.

Centre, and the several segments of the circle, bear representations of scenes in the life of Peter the Great.

In the centre of the composition, within a circle, surrounded with entwined laurel, is an allegory of the Czar Peter triumphant over Barbarism: the six figures [illegible] up and [illegible] ments, the figures in bas-relief, which are remarkably bold in outline, and exquisitely finished in the minuter parts.

In the first compartment we have the revolt of the Streltzers; and Peter the Great assuming the Crown, when only twelve years old.

2. Peter the Great working at ship-building in a dockyard in Holland.
3. Peter the Great directing Prince Menzikoff to build St. Petersburg.
4. The [illegible] of Peter to the [illegible] and [illegible] to Russia.
5. The battle of Pruth.
6. Peter crowning Catherine Empress.

In each of these compartments the event is cleverly told, and the figures are skilfully grouped.

The six compartments are flanked or separated by figures of Victory, radiating from the centre; and these being in bold relief, give a distinctive character to the entire composition.

The artist of this important work is Mr. Alfred Brown, Mr. Bally, R.A., contributing his valuable suggestions.

The shield is from the establishment of Messrs. Hunt and Roskill, of Bondstreet; and is, in every respect, a fine work of manufacture.

THE QUEEN'S CUP

Is a very characteristic group for a racing prize: it consists of a mounted Mexican hessing a wild horse, the countenance of the former is from an actual Mexican costume. The horses have been designed and modelled by Mr. Cotterill, whose success in the equine figure is universally acknowledged. The whole group is very spirited, the horses especially so. The workmanship, from the establishment of Messrs. Garrard, of the Haymarket, is very fine.

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP

Is a capacious shell, of silver, gilt inside; it is surmounted by a Triton, and supported by three sea-horses, the bases of which are supported by tortoises. The design is by Flaxman; and it has all the beauty of his classic mind. The workmanship is very elaborate. It is from the same establishment as the Emperor's Cup.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—On Tuesday a Court was held for the dispatch of business.—Alderman Wilson rose to inform [illegible] the Lord Mayor [illegible] the usual [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The resolution was negatived without a division, and the House went into Committee of Supply pro formâ.

The adjourned debate on the NAVIGATION LAWS was adjourned to Thursday. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Collectors of Cess (Ireland) Bill went through Committee

TOBAGO RELIEF AND IMMIGRATION, &c., BILL.—Earl GREY, in moving the Committal of this Bill, briefly stated the objects of it. In 1846 a loan was proposed to be taken in order to defray the expenses of importing free labourers into the West Indian colonies. Jamaica paid her own expenses, but Tobago and Trinidad passed ordinances to raise loans to defray those expenses; and on the faith that these loans would be raised, Lord Stanley, then Secretary for the Colonies, agreed to give directions that measures should be taken to introduce free labourers from India. No guarantee was given for the repayment of the loans, which were raised under the credit of the colonies. For the first three years there had been no difficulty in raising those loans, and the money was forthcoming at the proper time, but in the course of last year the commissioners found that the sum of the money market was such as to render it impossible for them to raise the sums which the colonies required. The bill now before the House was for the purpose of enabling the commissioners to raise the sum of £70,000 to meet the expenditure already incurred, and not to carry on any further measures of a similar nature. He had the opinion of his two immediate predecessors in the Colonial Office to fortify him in stating his conviction that the introduction of coolies into the colonies was far too expensive to answer the object in view, and that the only profitable source of free labour must be Africa. The noble Lord concluded by moving that their Lordships should go into Committee on the bill. After a short discussion their Lordships went into Committee on the bill, and the several clauses having been agreed to, the bill was ordered to be reported. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

COLONIAL EMIGRATION FROM THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

Lord ASHLEY moved that it was expedient that the means be annually provided for the voluntary emigration to some one of her Majesty's colonies, of a certain number of young persons of both sexes, who have been educated in the ragged schools hitherto called ragged schools, in and about the metropolis. In so doing the noble Lord brought under the attention of the House the condition of a large portion of the juvenile population of London, a portion of the community so formed as a distinct class of themselves, to the number of 30,000, in whom lurked the germs of the great bulk of the crime committed in the metropolis. He detailed, at great length, the pernicious influences to which children were exposed, depicted their habitations, and described their habits, expressing himself indebted for much of the information which he possessed upon the subject to the labours of the London City Missions. The number of these children in relatively destitute of employment was appalling, as was also the number who figured in the police-sheets. The noble Lord briefly described the system pursued by the ragged schools, and proposed that, as a reward for good conduct, the Government should take each year from these schools a thousand children of both sexes, and transplant them to Australia, where they could lead honest, sober, useful, and industrious lives. He stated Australia as the country to which they should be sent, because it was that in which labour was most in demand

Sir H. VERNEY seconded the motion.

Sir G. GREY observed that no one could have listened without emotion to the harrowing details submitted to the House by the noble Lord. He was sorry to say that he could not controvert any of the noble Lord's statements, in being indisputably true that, in this Christian country, thousands of children were growing up destitute of all Christian principle, and of all honourable feeling. The greatest praise was due to the noble Lord and his philanthropic coadjutors for the unwearying efforts which they had made for the reformation and comfort of these children. He agreed with all that had fallen from the noble Lord with regard to the beneficial results which had already flowed, and were likely still to flow, from the ragged schools. As to the proposition made by the noble Lord as an adjunct to that system, he could have no objection whatever to urge against its principle. They had already adopted the system of transplanting to a sphere of honest and profitable industry such children as had undergone the reformatory discipline of Parkhurst; and he saw no reason why they should not all in the transplanting of those who had undergone confinement before being admitted in their reputation by a penal conviction. On conversing on the subject with the Colonial Secretary, he agreed that the plan proposed might be matured so as to be of great advantage to the parties alluded to, to the mother country, and to the colony. He trusted that the noble Lord, seeing that the Government concurred with him in principle, would not now press his motion. He was not disinclined to appropriate a reasonable sum of money for effecting the noble Lord's object; but until a somewhat more specific plan was before the House, it would not be advisable to make any such appropriation. He could assure the noble Lord that he would receive every possible assistance from the Colonial Office and from the Emigration Board, in so maturing his plan as to render it as beneficial as the noble Lord expected it to be

Mr. HAWES, in which Colonel Conolly, Mr. Horsman, Mr. F. Scott, Mr. Shaw, Mr. V. Smith, and Sir F. Acland took part,

Mr. HAWES observed that a small portion of the £10,000 intended to be applied, this year, to the purposes of emigration from Ireland and the Channel Islands might be appropriated to the transplantation of some of the parties referred to by the noble Lord. He trusted, however, that the noble Lord would give the House and the Government time to consider and mature his plan, so as to render it as efficient as possible for the object in view.

The discussion was then continued by Lord Mahon, Sir E. N. Buxton, Mr. M. Milnes, Mr. Aldam, and Mr. Westhead; after which Lord ASHLEY briefly replied, and withdrew his motion.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS—IRELAND.—Captain ARCHDALL moved for a select committee to inquire into the allegations contained in petitions from certain parties, the poor-law guardians of the Lowtherston Union, in the counties of Fermanagh and Tyrone. He complained of their rude dismissal from the board, and that Mr. Twistleton had so conducted himself as to render it his duty to refuse his assent to the appointment of the poor-law.—Sir W. SOMERVILLE resisted self-evident, contending that the course adopted towards the guardians by the commissioners had by their own conduct in refusing to act in conformity with the provisions of the law.—After a discussion, in which several Irish members joined, the motion was withdrawn. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Great Northern Railway (Isle of Axholme) Bill having been read a third time, Lord GALWAY moved an amendment, making it compulsory on the company, to complete the main line between Gainsborough and Bawtry within the period allowed for the extension of the branches. On the House dividing for the amendment, it was negatived, by 128 against, 60; majority against the amendment, 38; when the bill passed.

PUBLIC GRAMMAR-SCHOOLS.—Sir G. GREY, in reply to Mr. Ewart, said that the formation of Grammar Schools, stated that, although the subject required early attention, he could not hold out the hope of bringing in any bill in reference thereto in the present session; and with regard to the progress made in the national scheme of education, that a statement would be made when the grant on that head was proposed.

MR. MITCHELL.—In answer to Sir W. VERNER, the right hon. Baronet also replied that a statement had reached him as to some mark of attention having been shown to the convict Mitchel on board H.M.S Shearwater, not by the commander of officers capable of such conduct, but by a private family, who had invited Mitchel to breakfast in his cabin. On the receipt of this information he had called the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the statement, and he had no doubt the noble Lord would order such steps to be taken for as he considered the circumstances of the case required.

GAME CERTIFICATES.—On the further consideration of the report on the Game Certificates Bill being brought forward, Mr. BARROW moved an amendment requiring that landowners on giving leave to others to kill game on their land should do [illegible]. After some discussion the amendment was agreed to.

Sir W. JOLLIFFE having moved an [illegible]

[illegible] was withdrawn.

SITES FOR PLACES OF WORSHIP—SCOTLAND.—The question of the committal of the Places of Worship Sites (Scotland) Bill gave rise to an animated discussion, at the termination of which Mr. B. COCHRANE having interposed an amendment, that the bill be committed that day six months, the House divided—for that amendment, 84; against it, 89: majority, 25, when the bill was committed pro formâ.—A question having been put as to when the Borough Elections bill would be proceeded with, Lord J. RUSSELL replied that he could not state the progress of the measure, but could not consent to giving up a day for that purpose until the question of the Navigation Laws had been disposed of, Colonel SIBTHORP intimating, amidst much laughter, that he should propose that the City of London should be included in the bill.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

ECCLESIASTICAL DISTRICTS (IRELAND).—Earl FORTESCUE laid a bill on the table for altering the ecclesiastical districts in Ireland.—The bill was read a first time.

SALE OF BEER BILL.—The Earl of HARROWBY moved the second reading of the Sale of Beer Bill.—The Earl of CARNARVON opposed it. He thought it would be most unjust to prohibit altogether the sale of beer or spirits on a Sunday, but he thought it advisable to extend the law prohibiting the sale of beer and spirits on Sunday before one o'clock on the day, in London and Liverpool, to the Kingdom generally.—The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

On the motion of Earl GREY, the Tobago Relief and Immigration into Britain was read a third time, and passed.

Grauna and Trinidad Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Lord BEAUMONT presented a petition from the Lunatic's Friend Society, praying for some alteration in the law respecting lunatic asylums; also a petition to the same effect from a public meeting held at Cockspur-street.

On the motion of the Earl of DEVON, the House went into Committee on the Great Yarmouth Freeman Disfranchisement Bill. The bill went through Committee. Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE NAVIGATION LAWS

The adjourned debate on the Navigation, Regulation of Ships and Seamen Bill was resumed.

Sir JOHN WALSH regretted that so important a subject had received so little elucidation. He was strongly opposed to the bill introduced by her Majesty's Government, because he was of opinion that it would tend greatly to diminish the efficacy of our own mercantile marine, and augment in a disproportionate manner the efficiency of the mercantile marine of rival nations, who might at some time or another become our foes.

Mr. MACGREGOR apprehended no danger whatever from the repeal of the Navigation Laws. He thought that our commerce had benefited by every relaxation of restrictive laws against the mercantile marine of other nations. So far from endangering the manning of our ships, he thought the change proposed by Ministers would be found to maintain our navy in a satisfactory way, but also to compete in commerce with every country in the world. The repeal of the Navigation Laws would, in his opinion, greatly increase the trade and maritime consequence and importance of England.

Mr. W. MILES spoke in opposition to, and Mr. MOODIE in favour of, the bill.

Sir G. GREY was of opinion that great alterations in the Navigation Laws were required, and he would, therefore, vote for going into committee on the bill before the House. Looking at all former experience, at evidence taken before a committee of that House, and in other ways during last year, he did not think we need dread the rivalry of the United States, the only nation whose maritime spirit we had any reason to be jealous of. The Navigation Laws had done us no good, but had been productive of incalculable harm; he was therefore, in favour of their repeal. He would, at the same time, impress upon the House the necessity of bettering the condition of the masters of our merchant-vessels.

Mr. CARDWELL followed on the same side.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER controverted the objections urged against some of the details of the Government project, and said that the measure was calculated to benefit the commercial marine of the country.

Sir C. BURRELL opposed the bill

On the motion of Mr. DISRAELI the debate was adjourned.

The remaining orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

On Sunday, the Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace. The Honourable and Rev. Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended the afternoon service, in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace. The Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, took airings; and the Princess Helena and the Princess Louisa were taken airings on Saturday

On Monday the Queen visited the Queen Dowager at Marlborough House. Lord John Russell had an audience of the Queen at Buckingham Palace. The Queen and Prince Albert inspected the Emperor of Russia's prize for Ascot, which was submitted by Messrs. Hunt and Roskell. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness also inspected Mr. Rundell's prize.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR OSBORNE.

On Wednesday morning, the Queen and Prince Albert left town at a quarter past ten o'clock for Osborne, Isle of Wight. Her Majesty and his Royal Highness, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, occupied a carriage and four; Prince Alfred and the Princess Helena were in the next carriage and four, accompanied by the Honourable Lady Thynne. The royal party arrived at Cherbourg, Portsmouth, at a quarter past one, and embarked in the Fairy, which immediately proceeded to Osborne. The usual salutes were fired.

The Duchess Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar visited the Duchess of Kent during the forenoon, at her residence, Clarence-house, St. James's. The Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Augusta Bruce, Baroness de Speth, and Sir G. Couper, left town at half-past one o'clock P.M. for Frogmore-house, Windsor

The Duke of Cambridge honoured the Duke of Wellington with his company in the evening, at Apsley-house, at the dinner given by his grace to the noble directors of the Concert of Ancient Music. His Royal Highness afterwards accompanied the Duke of Wellington to the performance of the concert at the Hanover-square Rooms.

Lady John Russell gave, on Wednesday evening, the first of a series of [illegible] at the official residence of Lord John Russell, in Downing-street

The Duke of Saxe-Weimar and suite entertained at Orlando, on Saturday morning, on board the General Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship Garrafee, for Rotterdam.

IRELAND.

An address of the Council of the Irish Confederation to the Irish people, read by W. Smith O'Brien as chairman, [illegible] passed at the close of last week. The document, after strongly condemning the character of the recent law proceedings against the unfortunate Mitchel, whose want of prudence and tact are, however, admitted

NEW REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The exportation of Mr. Mitchell has opened the way for an amalgamation of the Old and Young Ireland parties. Yesterday a preliminative was all settled last week, in a "conference" between the representatives of Conciliation Hall and the Confederation. It is understood that the Confederates have stipulated for "liberty of speech," and that no such thing as censorship shall be committed in the new association.

EXTINCTION OF THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The Association met as usual on Monday, in Conciliation Hall. Dr. Mc Knee presided. Mr. Gray moved that the Committee be summoned to-morrow to take into consideration the propriety of moving an indefinite adjournment of the association. That step might be rendered necessary, if a sufficient number did not attend to form a quorum contemplated. He believed that to-morrow night the Confederation would take similar steps: in short, that both bodies should practically cease to exist, and a new body, re-uniting all the names now unequally divided between the two, should be formed in their stead. He confessed he had strong feelings in reference to this old association; but he could not disguise the fact from himself that it had no longer the confidence of the country. Yes, the heart of the country had been expressed in the strongest possible way—through the repeal rent. One thing was quite clear—they could not go on as they were. Last week they had but £19, and this week the sum to be announced on Sir Robert's list was £10. Surely such subscriptions could not sustain the Repeal Association, the expenses of which were necessarily considerable. If the new body had not been agreed upon it would have become his painful duty to propose the indefinite adjournment of the association in consequence of the withdrawal of that support which the people had heretofore so cheerfully given. While he stated the much in reference to the Repeal Association, he could also say that there was unmistakeable evidence of their indisposition to support the Confederation. It was, therefore, clear that neither body possessed the full confidence of the country. What the country had called for—and for some time—was the union of Repealers. (Hear hear.) If this desirable object could be effected—and he doubted not it could be felt satisfied the Irish people would resume their energies in favour of nationality. Mr. O'Connell next adverted to the case of Mr John Mitchell. He was glad to hear that the fund in course of collection for the service of Mrs. Mitchell and her interesting young children was going on well. He felt the country was bound to sustain that family, and to encourage the absence of their natural protector. A fund had been collected—it was not a large one, certainly—for the purpose of erecting a monument over the remains of his father; perhaps there could not be a better application of that fund than to hand it over to the family of John Mitchel. (Cries of "No, no, no.") Mr. J. O'Connell) threw out the suggestion for consideration to the committee and the country. Of course he bowed to the expressed will of the people. Mr. Hyland repudiated the proposition just made, of handing over the money collected for the O'Connell monument to any other object. He could tell them that there never was such a fund moved or raised for the benefit of that family; and if John Mitchell was a "felon," the Government would learn there were millions of "felons" in Ireland. The Nation.

IRISH CONFEDERATION.—A meeting of the Confederation took place on Tuesday evening, and was most numerously attended. The excitement fully equalled in intensity any of the former gatherings in the Music Hall. The speaking was of the most "open and advised" character, and more than one of the orators is said to have fallen under the new Felony Act. The police, informed of the Club processions, at an early hour flocked up all the approaches to the place of meeting. When the Clubs arrived, admittance was refused, unless they broke up their semi-military organisation, and passed in single files. A parley took place, and after some time they were suffered to proceed in detached bands.

Mr. Meagher, while proceeding at the head of his Club (the Grattan) from the Club-room in Cumberland-street to the Music-hall, was stopped by the police, who refused to let the members of the Club walk two abreast, but offered to let them pass singly. An altercation took place, and some blows were given, when Mr. Meagher was arrested and taken to Sackville-street police-station, where he was charged with, Lord J. Russell says, the most serious offence in the power of his counsellors when honestly disposed to do justice to Ireland, by causing the Repeal of the Act of Union, and restoring to Ireland her ancient and inalienable right, a domestic legislature."

AUCTION OF MR. MITCHELL'S FURNITURE.—Mr. Mitchell's furniture took place at his late residence, Ontario-terrace, on Monday. There was a large concourse of persons, principally ladies, present, and there was great competition among the buyers. Most of the articles brought prices much beyond their intrinsic value. Amongst the articles sold was Mr. Mitchell's pike, made according to the pattern recommended in the United Irishman.

THE MULREADY EXHIBITION, AT THE SOCIETY OF ARTS.

CERTAINLY, British Art has never been more worthily represented than it now is by the exhibition of the pictures, drawings, and sketches of William Mulready, R.A., which was opened on Monday last at the Society of Arts, Adelphi

We were present at the private view on the previous Saturday, and heard universal congratulations on this, the first of the series of annual exhibitions of the works of a living painter, founded with the laudable aim of assisting the due position of British Art. Every one seemed proud to be able to claim Mulready on this occasion as his representative; and questions met you on all sides from artists and intelligent connoisseurs asking where was this old Venetian to be seen? Where the Dutchman that was more closely or more truly imitative of nature? and, above all, where was the old master of any school or any period, whose power of drawing had been equally demonstrated by facts such as those which are patent in a little room in this Exhibition? This was the tone of artistic appreciation; whilst the critic, who sought for higher qualities than those of mere executive facility, felt that the pictures around him rivalled Nature only in the delineation of humorous character and expression; whilst few, if any, had equalled him in a perception of that exquisite tenderness and purity of feeling which so many of the pictures, the later pictures especially, manifested. The impressions which were current among the crowd, vividly convey a notion of the effect of this Exhibition. Some one most learned in collections of drawings of the old masters proved that Mulready's Academy studies were certainly the finest drawings in the world. A connoisseur in European galleries avowed that no painter had ever dignified and elevated lowly subjects as Mulready had; "he was as great as a poet," he said, "with the exception of Wordsworth with his pen." A earnest man observed to us that this marshalling of the deeds of a long career (for the works extend over nearly half a century) was something quite solemn, and that there were few whose works would bear such a trial and reflect such glory on their author. And one of strong feeling, with genuine blushing emotion, said, "By Heavens, I can't say a word to it, for it makes a lump come in my throat!" With sober coolness we may corroborate all this, and express a hope that the public at large may be sensible of the like pleasurable emotions.

This Exhibition is a collection of the principal works of Mulready, but not of the whole. The three Vernon pictures are not here, nor is "The Toothache" by Drugget." The absence of the last is to be regretted; but the Vernon Mulreadys may now be seen at Mr. Vernon's house. Two of them, "The Ford," and "The Last In," are represented in the room by two of the cartoons of these pictures. There are sixty-six pictures and oil sketches in the Great Room, hung below Barry's large pictures; and here we may observe that the Barrys, though in a much larger scale, do not at all here detract from the importance of the Mulreadys, but rather tend to make clear that a grandeur and largeness of style does not depend upon the actual size adopted, and that other subjects—even domestic ones—may have as much grandeur as those especially called "historical." The pictures of the "Sonnet" and "Open your Mouth and Shut your Eyes," and the "Artist's Study," though measuring but a few square inches, give an impression of size which even the large pictures above almost fail to give. Besides the pictures, the [illegible] sketches and drawings of a great diversity of kind. The whole [illegible] proves what an earnest, indefatigable, and laborious life the artist must have passed; how keen has been his observation for every subject, which he seems to have aimed to represent, whether by the brush, the lead pencil, or [illegible] sort of scrupulous religious fidelity. We have heard it said that Mulready [illegible] an idle artist; and certainly it happens that in most exhibitions of the Royal Academy, Mulready has only one important picture, and that one not large in size, but it is not the quantity which proves industry so much as the quality; and in this Exhibition we have a quality of work silently accumulated, which we really believe, with our contemporary the Morning Post, could not as a whole be matched by any other artist, ancient or modern.

Another striking feature of this Exhibition is its amazing variety. It is so varied, that if the artist himself had not hung the pictures, it might be doubted whether all could have been his work. Mulready is the least mannered of painters. If you question this, look at the "Gipsies" (42), the "Toxseller" (8), the "Idle Boy Asleep," and the "Idle Boys." Had the Exhibition been unanimous, many doubts might have arisen as to the genuineness of all being the work of one mind and hand.

The earliest picture here is dated 1803; the last, 1847. The very earliest works are of an architectural character, in which the details are given with scrupulous fidelity. "St. Peter's Well in the Vestry of York Minster" is just like a bit of Prout, close to it, on one side, is a Hogarthian subject, "Interesting Baiting" (10), which might be taken for a fine Wouvermans; and, on the other side, "Boys Fishing" (14), suggests somewhat Gainsborough, or the best of the early Cuitmers. Then No. 64 ("Cricketers") might be attributed to Reynolds in his happiest period. But the most charming specimen of Mulready's landscape and building pictures is "Near the Mall, Kensington Gravel Pits" (57). It is a sort of "Cottage and Landscape" in miniature, as fine and tender, and yet as broad and natural is the general effect: never have brick- or elder-blossoms been so painted before. In the "Carpenter's Shop" (29), painted in 1808, in the "Cannon" (44), painted in 1837—certainly the best picture of the kind in the Exhibition—[illegible] excellence; and in the "interior of an English Cottage," painted the next year, we have interiors which rank with Ostades of the first quality: indeed, the manner reminds us of the same kind of finish. In the cottage is a family which, perhaps, only Mulready himself has attempted. The "Idle Boys," which suggests both Wilkie and Webster. "Leading a Bite"—the right hand figure of which is equal to Wilkie—and the "Last Lamb," less mannered, and even more recondite in art; but they never attained the popularity of the contemporary story pictures of Wilkie, because, as it seems to us, their feeling was somewhat too refined to be generally intelligible.

"The Convalescent"—what a different impression it makes to the Art Union's abortive engraving!—"The Origin of Painting" (48), "The Wolf's Head," and "The First Voyage" (which suggests to us Correggio), belong to a transition period of Mulready's art, leading to the later pictures. They are very original and interesting; but their character seems less prominently than in such pictures as "The Fern Lover" (41), the most tender and sombring picture of all the artist's works in our opinion), or "The Artist's Studio" (worthy to rank with the chief Venetians), or "The Lascars," a noble work, lofty in aim, beautiful in expression, perfect and quiet colour and in composition, and coloured with the inspiration of the best Spanish painters, added to an occasional hint from Giorgione. There are four little gems of about this period. "Brother and Sister" (49), "Open your Mouth and Shut your Eyes" (48), "The Sonnet" (51), and "The Toxseller" (8)—which should be examined together. In the first and last we have an expression in the features worthy of Correggio; whilst in the other two are held flights of colour, combined with an original breadth and grandeur of style, which show what a fresco painter Mulready would have made, had the spirit of his age wanted frescoes and not demanded pictures

The "Historian Controversy," and the "Wedding Gown," as brilliant as though they were jewellery itself; and the "Haymaking," as lightsome as day; are the latest works exhibited in this collection. We would not have the Toxseller, Boys, however, without pointing out the remarkable feeling of the artist for animal painting. "The Ass," "Puppies' Heads," the terrier in the boat of the "Boys Fishing," the spaniels in the "Wedding Gown" and "Haymaking," all show that Mulready might have been an Edwin Landseer had he been so minded.

It must not be thought that these are pictures only to delight the artist or the learned in the art. They are essentially popular pictures, to be read, understood, and enjoyed by everybody. Whilst the highest academic power is visible, the character, and expression, and perfect truth are patent to every eye and mind, whether artistically cultivated or not. But, great as our pleasure is with the pictures, our surprise is greater at the sketches and drawings. As for some of the latter, we believe they are positively unique for their excellences.

We conclude, for the present, by advising our readers to go to the most interesting and instructive Exhibition of the season.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

(FIFTH NOTICE.)

We resume our criticisms from page 360.

573. "A Stage-Coach Adventure in 1760." W. P. Frith, A.R.A. An interior of a stage-coach, with a highwayman at the window demanding the purses of the passengers. The different expressions of fear, and the several actions of the passengers in taking out their purses to give to the gentlemanly robber, are in Mr. Frith's best manner. The picture deserves to be placed on a larger scale, so that something more than the mere inside of the coach should be seen. The startled horses, the still more startled postillion, and the neighborhood of Bagshot-heath, would add to the picturesque variety of the composition.

594. "Departure of the Emigrants." F. Goodall. Full of good painting, and carefully considered, but without that combination of parts which tend to make one perfect whole. This is Mr. F. Goodall's only contribution in this year's Exhibition.

580. "The Battle for the Standard." R. Ansdell. A very large picture—its only fault, it is very spotted in composition, and wants unity and breadth in its colour. The picture represents the gallant capture (by Sergeant Ewart, of the Greys) of the Eagle belonging to the 45th Regiment of Napoleon's supposed Invincibles, at the battle of Waterloo. The picture is the representation of the point of the intrepid Sergeant, who parried the thrust, and cut him down. He was next assailed by a Polish lancer, who buried his lance at him; but he struck the weapon aside, and before he could recover, cleft the unfortunate Pole through the chin. He then was attacked by a foot-soldier, who, after firing, charged him with his bayonet. He, too, shared the same fate; and the Eagle seized, he proceeded in carrying it in safety to the rear. The same gallant artist is the Chapel of Chelsea Hospital.

587. "Interview between Charles II. and Nell Gwynn, as witnessed by Evelyn." E. M. Ward, A.R.A. Nell lived in Pall-mall, in a large house on the south side, with a garden reaching to St. James's Park. There was a raised terrace at the end of it, commanding a view of the Mall (wherein the game of Pall Mall was played), and of the canal in the park, where Charles II. was often to be seen feeding his ducks, and unattended as Kings and Queens too often are by their liveried attendants. On one occasion, when the King was walking through the park from his palace at Whitehall, to his palace at St. James's, he was accompanied by the excellent Evelyn. As they passed the garden-wall of Nell's house, it so happened that Nell was on the terrace. She was immediately espied by the Merry Monarch, who left his companion and stood on the green walk in the park, and there carried on what Evelyn calls a very familiar discourse with the light, but kind-hearted Nellie. The incident has been capitally depicted by Mr Ward. Nell is all beauty and vivacity, while the king looks longingly on her graces, as if he had forgotten the Countess of Castlemaine as much as his neglected and neglected Queen. There is a warmer tone about the picture than is common with Mr Ward.

595 "The Evening Gun: a calm on the shores of England." F Danby, A.R.A. A most poetic picture, calculated to have suggested to Collins another stanza for his exquisite "Ode to Evening."

620 "The Eve of the Deluge." J. Linnell. A very large picture, much in Martin's manner, and not by any means good in that way, but with parts about it full of poetry and finish.

515. "The Contest of Beauty for the Girdle of Florimel—Britomartis unveiling Amoret." F. R. Pickersgill, A.R.A. This is a clear composition (as our Engraving will show) by the younger Pickersgill, whose excellent oil picture of the Burial of Harold, in Waltham Abbey, was one of the leading attractions of the last Westminster Hall exhibition. The subject is taken from Spenser's "Faerie Queen," a poem too little read by painters, but replete with fine subjects, as indeed Hilton, Etty, Mr Kennedy, and now Mr Pickersgill, have shown. The story of the contest may be found in the fifth canto of the fourth book:—

"At last the most redoubted Britoness
Her lovely Amoret did open shew,
Whose face, all covered plainly, did expresse
The heavenly pourtrait of bright angels hew."

Spenser, as a poet, has been not inaptly compared to Rubens as a painter. There is the same rich abundance in both. Mr. Pickersgill's composition is very carefully studied, and some of his forms are extremely elegant.

630. "The Monk in the Colosseum, surrounded by Brothers of Mercy, preaching to Roman Citizens." W. Parrott. There is much to admire in this picture, and though indifferently seen (for it has been unfairly sent to the Octagon-room) it is easy to perceive that it is no common performance. Our Engraving will enable our readers to come very much to the same conclusion. The grand ruins of the Colosseum form a noble background to the composition.

Our concluding criticisms on the pictures as yet unnoticed we shall postpone till such time as our engravers will enable us to present the reader with the works already in their hands. The publication of Mr. Edwin Landseer's famous picture of "Alexander and Diogenes" has been withheld, for this purpose of enabling our engraver to do full justice to so admirable a picture.

"THE MONK IN THE COLOSSEUM, SURROUNDED BY BROTHERS OF MERCY, PREACHING TO ROMAN CITIZENS."—PAINTED BY W. PARROTT

MADEMOISELLE JENNY LIND.

We have many reasons for thinking a new and more finished portrait of Mdlle. Lind will be acceptable to the public. Since her first visit to England she has made immense progress in the estimation of the whole world. Abroad, there is scarcely a Sovereign who, previous to the recent revolutions, had not invited her to his capital and set her solid marks of his esteem. In her own country she is the idol of the King and of the nation. During last season at Stockholm, such was the eagerness to witness her performances, that the places at the theatre were put up to auction, and fetched prices which would be extraordinary even here, but in Stockholm were immense. With her share of the proceeds Mdlle. Lind has established an asylum for the support of decayed artists, and particularly of poor young girls who, as she was once, with a taste for the arts, find themselves without means of pursuing their study; hoping, no doubt, that amongst them may be found some, like herself also, endowed with genius enough to conquer the first position in art. One young Swedish maiden of such promise has already appeared—Mdlle. K——; and Jenny Lind has given her 9000 francs to study in Paris, under her former master, Emanuel Garcia.

We will say no more as to the general history of this great vocalist, who, in every capital she visited, has excited not only the enthusiasm of the highest dilettanti, but has won the affections of every class, and whose truly admirable private character, marked by the greatest beneficence has been fully equal to the public position she has attained as an artist. Hence has it arisen that when she left Berlin and Vienna, although it was in the middle of the night, the population had assembled to bid her adieu, and drew her carriage beyond the gates of the city. When she left Stockholm six weeks since, the quays were covered by her admiring countrymen; all the ships in the harbour were manned, and amidst the playing of the bands of music she was conducted to the steamer in which she embarked in the presence of the Queen of Sweden and her court.

We have represented Jenny Lind in the character of Lucia (in the last scene); for this part is, to use stage language, her most wonderful creation; and, prepared as the public were for something extraordinary, the sensation she has produced has far surpassed all anticipation. Previously Alice, in "Robert le Diable," was the only part in which she had triumphantly coped with an impersonation of deep sentiment suited to her age. But Alice is but an incidental part in the opera; in Lucia she is the heroine; and this ruling feminine portraiture is begun, continued, and ended with the highest finish. Before Mdlle. Lind, many admirable singers had performed Lucia, and had justly excited public approbation. But, whilst the allotted music and situations had been employed by them as the means of displaying vocal power in the abstract, and musical science, with execution such as a violin player might envy, the sentiment and great histrionic resources of the part had remained latent. So thoroughly convinced were the prime donne who previously impersonated Lucia that the part was merely a vehicle for vocal display, or so much did they fear to encounter the dramatic difficulties with which it was beset, that whole pages of the most expressive dialogue and music of the highest inspiration had habitually been suppressed. In the final scena—that of Lucia's madness—the whole vision of her imaginary bridal, the whole description of her internal throes, of her flickering thoughts and hallucinations, had been omitted. The scena was always reduced to the andante and cabaletta; and, generally, the music, instead of being sung in the original, was transposed to a lower key. Mdlle. Lind has restored this scena to the original key of F.

Such thrilling effect, so breathless a sensation does the vision, as dramatically depicted by Jenny Lind, produce upon the audience—so essential does it appear, even in a musical point of view, to vary the impression on the ear, and complete the intention of the composer, that its omission for a single night would now excite the deepest indignation on the part of the audience. Mdlle. Lind has demonstrated that, in this part, even on the Italian libretto has been reflected some of the deep original inspiration of the Wizard of the North; whilst Donizetti, a man of unquestionable genius, in music likewise himself a wizard, has evoked every resource he possessed, in himself as well as in his art, duly to interpret the exquisite beauty of the original conception. This has been rendered amply evident by Mdlle. Lind's performance—by union of the histrionic with the musical element, as a real lyrical actress in her interpretation of Lucia. Her vocal execution, with exquisite shades of intonation and modulation, full of brilliant and original passages of embellishment, is still held in subservience to the dramatic portraiture. In the first scene she appears full of joy and expectation at the meeting of her lover; but you already trace that melancholy presentment which overshadows the brightest hour of those predestined to misfortune. This is a condition essential in a poetical, and particularly in a dramatic point of view. Then follows the scene with her brother—her struggle betwixt incredulity and conviction when the forged letter of her lover is shown to her, which, having read, she demands again. The gleam of hope, the agony of parting with its last vestige, are portrayed with heart-searching truth. More forcibly still is depicted the effect of her lover's malediction in the bridal scene, and there by her sudden wildness of expression she foreshadows her ultimate madness and the crushing of mind and heart which produce her death in the last act—the climax of her performance. There the flickering thoughts, the successive impressions of hallucination are all rendered in turn with the most startling and impressive effect. As she falls, the spectators are left thrilling in breathless silence—a marked pause is required by them to recover from the impression, and then arises a tempest of applause, and of enthusiasm unprecedented.

STATUE OF THE LATE MARQUIS OF HASTINGS.

THE Statue of the late Marquis of Hastings, Governor-General of India, has been executed by Mr. Lough, and is now in the Sculpture-Room of the Royal Academy Exhibition. It is intended to be placed in a mausoleum which has been erected over the grave of the Marquis of Hastings, at Malta. The architect of the Mausoleum is Mr. James Ferguson, of Langham-place.

The above tribute to the memory of the illustrious Nobleman has been raised by subscription among his friends and admirers, who were connected with his government in India, or were resident in that country during the period of his Lordship's administration.

The Statue is in marble, large life size, and is a good specimen of monumental sculpture.

MONUMENT TO MAJOR-GENERAL SIR R. H. DICK.

THIS interesting memorial to one of the heroes of Sobraon, and "a gallant veteran of the Peninsular and Waterloo campaigns," has just been executed, in marble, by Mr. Lough, for a church in Perthshire. The composition is highly characteristic, the main features being a sculptured representation of the veteran soldier, who has just received the fatal shot, whilst personally animating, by his dauntless example, the soldiers of her Majesty's 80th Regiment, in their career of noble daring, "even in the cannon's mouth." In the upper portion of the monument is a group of war trophies; and within laurel are inscribed the localities of the soldier's successes. The inscription-table bears the following emphatic tribute:—

"Sacred to the Memory of Major-General SIR ROBERT HENRY DICK, K.C.B., K.C.H., who, after distinguished services in the Peninsula, in the command of a light battalion, at Waterloo, with the 42d Royal Highland Regiment, fell mortally wounded, whilst leading the 2d division of the army of the Sutlejes to the attack on the Sikh entrenched camp, at Sobraon, on the 10th of February, 1846. The officers who had the honour of serving under him in his last battle, and others, his friends in her Majesty's and the Honourable East India Company's Service, in Bengal, have caused this Monument to be placed in his Parish Church, in testimony of their respect and affection for a generous courteous, and considerate Commander, a gallant and devoted soldier."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

LORD BURGHERSH.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS FREDERICK JOHN LORD BURGHERSH, who died last week, was eldest son of the present Earl of Westmoreland, and grand nephew, through his mother, of the late Duke of Wellington. His Lordship had not quite completed his 29th year. By his decease, his next brother, the Hon. Fiennes Arcelin, an officer in the Rifle Brigade, becomes heir apparent of the family honours.

SIR THOMAS DICK LAUDER, BART.

ACCOUNTS from Scotland announce the death of this respected and accomplished Baronet, who had gained some reputation in the literary world. He was only son of the late Sir Andrew Lauder, 6th Baronet, of Fountain Hall, and represented the families of Lauder of Lauder Tower and Bass, and Dick of Braid. He was born in 1784, and married in 1808 Charlotte Anne, only child and heir of George Cumin, Esq., of Relugas, by whom he has left two sons and six daughters, the elder of the former being the present Sir John Lauder, Bart., of Fountain Hall.

THOMAS CARVICK, ESQ., OF WYKE, COUNTY YORK, AND MOAT MON NT, MIDDLESEX.

THE decease of Mr. Carvick occurred at Worthing, on the 20th May. He was born the 7th November, 1776, the eldest son of John Carvick, Esq., of Marlborough-hill, North, by Mary, youngest daughter of John Johnson, Esq., of Middlesex; and succeeded, in right of his wife, Marrianne Berkeman, only daughter of Thomas Mayer, Esq., of York, to the estate of Wyke. He was a Justice of the Peace for the counties of York, Hertford, and Middlesex, and Deputy-Lieutenant for the last. He has left one surviving son, Thomas-Mayer, an officer in the army, and three daughters, of whom the eldest, Georgiana-Marianne-Catherine, is wife of Richard Mayne, Esq., the Police Commissioner.

ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM HOTHAM, G.C.B.

THIS gallant officer died at Windsor, on the 31st ult. He was second son of General George Hotham, the wife, youngest daughter of Sir Warton Pennyman, Bart., and grandson of Sir Beaumont Hotham, Bart., whose third son, William, Lord Hotham, achieved a brilliant naval reputation. Emulating the example of his uncle, the subject of the present notice entered the sea service at the comparatively early age, also, at a long course of distinguished conduct, eventually attained its highest honours. At the siege of Bastia, and at the battle of Camperdown, he served with eminent gallantry, and received a medal for his participation in the latter engagement. He was on the Cape station for three years, and assisted at the destruction of La Prenesse, a French frigate.

Sir William married, first, Anne, daughter of Sir Edward Jeynes, Knight; and, secondly, in 1835, Jane Seymour, widow of Roger Pettiward, Esq.; by the former of whom, who died in 1837, he had a daughter, Anne, wife of Robert Harvey, Esq., of Langley Park, Bucks, and four sons. The eldest, Augustus, is an officer in the army, and the second, Edwin, is Vicar of South Owse, Yorkshire.

FRANCIS MARTIN, ESQ., CLARENCEUX KING-OF-ARMS.

THE office of Clarenceux King-of-Arms is second only to that of Garter. His province comprehends all England south of the Trent, and his duty consists in the regulation of arms and descents within his district. The name is derived from the Duke of Clarence, the third son of Edward III. Before the institution of the Garter King, Clarenceux was the principal officer of arms, and in the vacancy of the superior dignity, still exercises its authority. The venerable gentleman, whose death, a few days since, occasions these remarks, was son of Francis Martin, Esq., of the Bank of England. He entered the College of Arms as Bluemantle Pursuivant of Arms, 17th June, 1796, became Windsor Herald 24th April, 1819, was appointed Norroy King of Arms 9th Feb., 1830, and succeeded Sir Isaac Heard as Clarenceux 26th April, 1845. At the period of his death he had completed his 82nd year.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—The present week's arrival of English wheat for our market coastwise, has been considerably on the increase. By land carriage, however, the receipts have been trifling. The show of samples to-day was limited, yet the general run of fresh parcels was heavy, at barely Monday's reduced currencies, and a clearance was not effected. Foreign wheat—in consequence of which have been again kept extremely short of supply, but we have no alteration to notice in value. In barley next to nothing was doing, at late rates. The supply on offer was trifling in the extreme, but it was quite adequate to meet the wants of the dealers. Scarcely any parcels of grain, either of qualities were neglected. In price we have no change to notice. The oat trade was in a very sluggish state, at Monday's prices. Beans were 1s per quarter lower. Peas, being in good demand, were 1s per quarter dearer. Malt.—Best kinds of malt—the supply of which on offer is by no means large—is in moderate request, at full prices. At pubbe sale about 3000 packages have been disposed of, at late rates.

Sugar.—As most of the grocers are well in stock, and as large quantities have been submitted to public competition, the price of fine grocery lots is very much the same as in the quotations of last year.

Coffee.—Plantation Ceylon is steady, at late rates. In other kinds of coffee we have very few sales to report.

Rice.—For all descriptions the demand rules heavy, at 3d to 6d per cwt less money. The stocks in warehouse are very excessive, and a further decline in value is generally expected.

Provisions.—Although the supply of fine pork is very moderate, the demand is dull, and is steady, at, in some instances, an advance in the quotations of 1s per cwt. Fine marks may be quoted, at from 82s to 85s; and mixed, 75s to 80s; and inferior sorts, 70s per cwt. The supplies of foreign butter are moderate; while the trade is firm, at fully last week's prices. Irish, fine, 80s to 82s; fourths, 76s to 78s; Carlow and Clonmel, 84s to 86s; Limerick, Waterford, and Limerick, 80s to 82s; and Trales, 81s to 83s per cwt. On board a few sales of Waterford have taken place, at 86s to 88s per cwt. In English butter nothing worthy of notice is doing, at barely stationary prices. Fine Dorset, 96s to 98s; middling ditto, 90s to 95s; fine Devon, 88s to 92s per cwt., &c., &c., to 118s per cfirkin. Bacon moves off slowly, at a decline of from 1s to 2s per cwt. Smithfield (Friday). Notwithstanding that the supply of beasts here to-day was but moderate, the time of year considered, the beef trade was excessively dull, at barely, but at nothing quotable beneath. Monday's prices. The show of foreign stock was on the moderate, but from Scotland, only 210 beasts came fresh to hand. There was a further increase in the numbers of sheep. All breeds were heavy in sale at barely last week's quotations. Calves, 4s to 5s per 5lbs. The primest old Downs sold at from 4s 10d to 5s per 8lb. From the Isle of Wight 237 lambs came fresh to hand, and a fair inquiry prevails for them at full prices. The lamb trade was in a very inactive state, at barely the late decline in the currencies. An immense supply of calves was likewise on sale, and the demand for them was dull, at 4s to 5s per 5lbs. Pigs, dull, at late rates. Milch cows sold at from £15 to £18 each, including their sons.—calf

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The transfer books for the following annuities, due the 5th of July next, will be closed on the under-mentioned dates:—Consolidated Three per Cents, from Tuesday, the 13th inst., to Friday, the 14th of July; annuities for terms of years, ditto: Three per Cent Annuities, 1726, from Friday, the 16th inst., to Friday, the 14th of July; New Five per Cents, from Friday, the 16th inst., to Friday, the 14th of July.

The Directors of the Bank of England have signified their willingness to make advances upon approved securities until after the payment of the July dividends at the rate of Three per Cent. per annum. This will not have much effect upon the Money Market generally, as the bankers and leading brokers have for some time past discounted at the rate of from 3 to 3½ per cent., according to the character of the paper, although upon such an upon lesson a slight advance upon that rate has been usual. Loans granted by the Bank are for not less than two thousand pounds; but however large the demand, so great is the difficulty of employing capital, that the brokers can compete readily with the Bank to any extent likely, in the present state of trade, to be required. In such a position of affairs, the announcement can scarcely be only regarded as following the ordinary course of things, without reference to any immediate state of events.

Monday was a great day in the English Market. Consols opening at 83¾ to 84, and the first transactions during the day were at 84. The approaching settlement of the Account, added to some demands for Money Stocks, were an impetus to prices on Tuesday. Consols at one period of the day quoting 84⅝, but afterwards closing at 84¼ to ⅜. On Wednesday, the Market opened at an improvement of ¼ per cent., and maintained it during the day. Thursday being the day preceding the Consol settlement, the jobbers and brokers were principally occupied with the adjustment of their accounts. The transactions appear to have been generally in favour of a fall, but without attaining any great extent; hence the slight rise at the close of the month's transactions. The Bull party will, however, be the receivers, but more from accounts carried over last account than any operations during the present. The market, at the close of the week, was steady at the following prices: Bank Stock, 192½; Reduced, 83⅝; Three per Cent. Consols Annuities, 84¼; New Three per Cent. Annuities, 83⅝; Long Annuities, 8 11-16; South Sea Stock New Annuities, 82⅞; Consols for Account, 84⅜; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 38 pm., £500, 34 pm.; Small, 40 pm.

The Foreign Market has been very inactive during the week, and prices, consequently, stationary. Spanish affairs are not sufficiently settled to make any speculation safe, but the news from Cuba by the last mails speaks favourably of the Queen's cause, and increasing confidence in the Republic. At the close of the week the inaction of the market continued, the following list showing the prices of securities absolutely dealt in:—Brazilian Bonds, 67; Ditto, Small, 68; Danish Bonds, Three per Cent., 63; Mexican Account, 24; Ditto for Cash, 25; Russian Bonds, 86¾; Spanish Five per Cent., 1840, 12; Ditto, Account, 12⅛; Ditto Three per Cents., 22½; Venezuela Bonds, Two-and-a-Quarter per Cent., 15½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent, 52 Ditto, Four per Cent. Certificates, 93⅛; Long Annuities, 8 11-16; South Sea Stock New Annuities, 82⅞; Consols for Account, 84⅜; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 38 pm., £500, 34 pm.; Small, 40 pm.

ACCIDENT TO COMMANDER CHADS, OF THE "STYX" STEAM-SLOOP.—On Monday Commander Chads was actually superintending at Woolwich the clearing out the steamer's stores preparatory to her being paid off, and the men were lowering those stores into a pinnace warped alongside. Part of the gunwale of the vessel shut the paddle-box in made to fall down on hinges, and is secured inside by bolts. It appears that this part had been accidentally loosened, and when the commander and two seamen were in the act of leaning against it, it gave way, and they were precipitated into the pinnace alongside. The two men, and a third who was in the boat, sustained considerable injury, so much so as to cause their immediate removal to the Marine Hospital. Commander Chads was picked up in a very deplorable state, and carried instantly into the residence of Sir J. Gordon Bremer, where he now lies. The injuries he received are said to be very severe.

THE BONAPARTIST REACTION IN FRANCE.

The reaction in France—the reality of which is no longer matter of doubt—has taken, if we are to believe the organs of the French Government, the very unexpected shape of Bonapartism. It does not, however, seem very clear that this is the fact. Prince Louis Napoleon—as he is still called in that country which professes to have abolished all titles has undoubtedly been returned as a deputy for three several departments, as well as for Paris itself. It is equally true that the crowds at the polling-places shouted his name amid cries of "Vive l' Empereur!" and "Down with the Republic!" and in one of the rural districts the polling-papers were inscribed for "Louis Napoleon as Emperor"—a method of voting which would clearly invalidate his return, if his majority depended upon votes so worded. All this is disheartening enough to those who wish well to the French people, and who have sympathised with them during the antiquated tyranny of the Bourbons of the elder branch—during the shameless profligacy and unblushing corruption of the branch of Orleans—and during the difficult times that have succeeded the overthrow of Louis-Philippism. But if, in addition to these predilections for a great name—which was, after all, nothing but a curse to France and to Europe—a considerable portion of the French people should manifest that they are still so smitten with the abominable phantom of military glory, that they would try a Bonaparte as their ruler, merely because he is a Bonaparte, disheartenment would give way to a more positive feeling of shame and anger, that, with all their boast of superiority to the rest of Europe, they should show themselves so immeasurably and so mischievously behind it. To boast of being free, and yet to offer their necks to the yoke of a man merely because he is related to another man that was once a great conqueror and a scourge of France, as well as of the rest of Europe, would be a pitiable spectacle indeed for a nation to offer: and would show, at all events, that a portion of the French people might have a marvellous praise of liberty in their mouths, and yet in reality have the smallest possible conception of its meaning. Whatever the depth of the Bonapartist feeling may be, Paris was kept in a state of suspense for two days by fear of an insurrection, which had already commenced or was to commence immediately, in behalf of this merest shadow of a great man's memory. The rappel was beaten in all the streets; troops were poured into the capital from the surrounding country, the Garde Nationale and the Garde Mobile were up in arms; Paris presented the aspect of a city in a state of siege, and the immense masses of its population, moving to and fro from point to point, showed themselves ready, should occasion serve, to re-enact the scene of the 15th of May, and proclaim some thing or some body, it did not seem to matter what. In the midst of the confusion something was done: the uproar was not utterly fruitless. M. de Lamartine took advantage of the panic asserted that shots had been fired—that blood had been shed—and proposed in the Assembly that the laws of 1816 and 1832, forbidding the entry of the Bonaparte family into France, should be enforced against this particular pretender. The motion was received by the Assembly, which is believed as a body to be anything but favourable to the Revolution, amid deafening shouts of "Vive la République!"

It has since been made tolerably clear that there was in reality no Bonapartist insurrection at all; that the Executive Committee, feeling its own weakness, took advantage of the election of M. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte for Paris, and of a few stray cries by a portion of the capricious and insensate mob in his favour, to make this show of strength, and thus endeavour to re-establish its position in the Assembly—a position which its own dissensions, vacillations, and incompetency had been daily impairing since its first establishment. It has been proved that there was no occasion to beat the rappel; that the whole affair was a trick; and that only one shot was fired in the crowd, and that accidentally. It has also been alleged that Louis Napoleon and his best friends were utterly unconnected with and uncognizant of any such demonstration in his favour; and that it neither was nor is the wish of any member of that family to trade upon the name of their great relative, by making any attempt whatsoever, except as independent members of the Assembly, to exercise any power, influence, or control over the French people.

The Parisians themselves are not quite decided upon the latter point, as there is evidently a Bonapartist predilection among the people. But either this version of the affair is true or false. If true, it shows a deplorable state of weakness in the Government, and will prepare Europe for its speedy downfal from sheer incapacity. If it be proved that the Executive Government invented the demonstration, ordered the rappel to be beaten without cause, and thus drew the people together, and put thoughts of émeutes, insurrections, and revolutions into their heads, the veriest gamin of the streets will confess that they took a very clumsy and irrational mode of proceeding. If they were really afraid of the pretensions of Louis Napoleon, and took this means of nipping future insurrection by bringing it to a head at once, and crushing it in the bud, they defeated their own object. They have elevated Louis Napoleon into importance, and set people thinking about him who might otherwise have held him in contempt or indifference. They have, in fact, prepared the way for a real insurrection, by manœuvering to produce a sham one.

If, on the other hand, the government did not invest the affair, but merely exaggerated it; if there was a veritable and unmistakeable insurrection in favour of a Bonaparte; if the cries of

"Vive l'Empereur!" have been raised by a considerable portion of the people, and if the army, as is alleged, are smitten with this [illegible] hero worship, and are willing and anxious to elevate a new Emperor upon their muskets, with the hope of seeing future [illegible] marshals, and even kings manufactured out of their most [illegible] and successful leaders, the spectacle is still more deplorable. It would indeed show a reaction of the most disheartening kind if the people that overthrew despotism in February, in one of the vilest of its forms, should seek in June to establish despotism in the very vilest of all its forms—that of military power. It would prove that the French at present are utterly unfit for constitutional liberty -that they are slaves in heart, and require a tyrant to flatter them by shows while he ruled them with a rod of iron. At all events, we shall, we suppose, hear no more of Bonapartism for a time. But supposing such an insurrection to succeed at some future period, and to instal the hero of the ludicrous invasion of Boulogne upon the throne of the Tuileries, how long could he expect to hold it? Talent is not hereditary. The great Napoleon's throne was based upon his own genius. The remembrance of that genius might, by an unhappy possibility, be strong enough to put a sceptre into the hands of another member of his family; but it would require more genius and prudence than were shown by Napoleon himself, to preserve it. The present state of Europe would try the energies of a greater than Napoleon, if he attempted the game of conquest. In addition to genius and prudence, it would require good fortune to make head against the difficulties of such a position; and without speculating on the probability of the future, as regards the good fortune of Bonaparte II., should there be such an upstate, we may safely affirm that Louis Napoleon has not the ability, the prudence, the genius—in fact any mental or personal quality, except his name—to fit him for emperorship, kingship, consulship, or governorship of any kind whatever.

There are, no doubt, zealous Bonapartists in France—men who live upon the traditions of the past, and who have been educated in the pernicious school of war and conquest. There are also many zealous legitimists, who consider that France will never prosper under any form of Government except that of the elder branch of the Bourbons. There are also, it is to be presumed, many zealous adherents of the family of Louis Philippe people who received money, favours, and places from him, and who would hail the re-establishment of his system, and the pecuniary advantages that were showered in its train upon the venal and the unprincipled among the 240,000 electors by whom the suffrage was monopolised. But zealous as all these parties may be—they must yield the point of zeal to the Republicans. The latter [illegible] if not the most numerous, are immeasurably the most able. Their convictions have in their minds the sanctity of a [illegible]. They might end a Bonaparte for a time, if he were [illegible] the [illegible] they might put up with the Duc [illegible] Bordeaux for a time, or the Count de Paris or with the Prince [illegible] but they would not for a moment submit to [illegible] either of them but it would be for a time only. The old agitation would be renewed. The old Republican plots would be revived. The work of the last eighteen years would have to be done over again—and once more the Republic would be reconquered amid the barricades of the capital.

The overthrow of the Republic by any of these pretenders would be a calamity to France; but the success of an insurrection in favour of Louis Napoleon would not only be a calamity, it would be a disgrace. Its success, however, does not seem likely—even although the present Executive Government have raised the name of Bonaparte into unnecessary and somewhat dangerous importance, by showing their afraid of it. Perhaps, however, it is not too late to retrace the false step. M. Louis Napoleon has been allowed to take his seat in the Assembly. That is a point gained. He will be more harmless there than anywhere else.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(SIXTH NOTICE.)

THE sculpture in the Academy Exhibition is not by any means remarkable. Our [illegible] indeed, seem unwilling to work for the dark hole which necessity alone can drive them to. The room, it is true, is well attended; and, after the glare of colour with which the eye is beset from making even a cursory examination of the upper rooms, it is really a relief to turn to the cold-looking plaster, and still colder marble that surrounds you in the Sculpture-room. That our sculptors are unwilling to send their works for exhibition at the Academy, we have a striking illustration in Mr. Foley, whose lovely marble group of "Ino and Bacchus" is now on view at Dickinson's, in New Bond-street, where it receives all the assistance which a good light and well-disposed drapery can give to it. The Academy should build a better room from its own ample resources, and not wait for assistance from a deficient public revenue, and an unwilling Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In Sculpture-room at the Academy contains in all one hundred and fifty-eight works. In the higher line of art we have Mr. Gibson's exquisite marble statue of "Aurora stepping upon the Earth scattering dew," one of the very best of his works; Mr. W. C. Marshall's "Dancing Girl Reposing," executed in marble for the Art-Union of London; Mr. Wyatt's "Group in marble of the nymph Hamadryad and Cupid;" and Mr. John Thomas's miniature statue of "Miranda." In the portrait statue line we have Mr. Thrupp's Sir Fowell Buxton, for Westminster Abbey, and Mr. Lough's "Marquis of Hastings [illegible] born at Malta [illegible] and indifferent, although too strongly rushed one of [illegible] of art sustained in Sir Francis Chantrey. The busts are [illegible] in number, and here again we have to lament the loss of [illegible] numerous ones—a bust of the Queen, and not very [illegible] E. H. Baily sends two; Mr. MacDowall two; Mr Westmacott [illegible] Mr. Weekes one. The leading deficiency in one and [illegible] of marked character. There is much careful execution—[illegible] taste in the disposition of draperies; and in the marble, at times, some very careful carving, fully equal, in this way, to the best busts of Nollekens and Chantrey; but when we come to look for a bold and broad treatment, such as we find so unmistakeably prominent in the commonest antique; or when we look [illegible] the inner man expressed in the outer face, as in Nollekens' Dr. Johnson, and Chantrey's Sir Walter Scott, hardly a trace of this is anywhere to be found. The portrait statues are equally faulty in the same way. The figures are clumsy, the draperies loose and unmeaning, and the attitudes neither [illegible] nor impressing. In addition to all this, we have to give to Sir Fowell Buxton the mental greatness of Sir Isaac Newton, or to the Marquis of Hastings the manly [illegible] of John Malcolm, but it is only to see that Baxton would have fitted better in the hands of Rouliac, and Hastings would have carried, what Pope has called, "the nobleman look about him," had Chantrey survived to model his statue. It is curious to see how little our artists condescend to catch from these [illegible] Reynolds and Lawrence have given an endless variety of pos- [illegible] portraits—many, it is true, borrowed from elder masters—and others, again, perfectly original. Flaxman has thrown a classic air of refinement into the arrangement of a bas-relief; and Chantrey, a thoughtful repose and simple earnestness of manner into the composition of a statue. Yet all appears to have been done in vain; their examples have been to little purpose, and the historian will fail to trace a pedigree in the genius of art, like that which exists so unmistakeably in our poetry.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

The summer Exhibition of Old Masters at the British Institution was [illegible] the public on Monday last. The collection is more curious in the [illegible] ance in shewing the great qualities of the old art [illegible] great north room contains a few fine works, and a [illegible] ection of Italian and Flemish masters, by no means good. In [illegible] or three large landscapes by Richard Wilson, and two [illegible] Canalettos, it is hardly to be found in the entire collection. In the room the chief curiosity is a very early distemper diptych (or picture in two compartments) representing Richard II. praying to the Virgin and Child. His van-mark, a work of art belonged to Charles I. and was engraved by Hollar. A fine Van Eyck, the property of the poet Rogers (a Virgin and Child), and the portrait of a lady in profile, by an artist of the Florentine school, is marvellous in its [illegible] very for the quiet expression of inward dignity of soul. The Collection does [illegible]

CIVIC "STATE" VISIT TO THE CHINESE JUNK.—On Friday (last week) the [illegible] Guildhall, Richard Mayne, several of the aldermen, [illegible] barons. The Lord Mayor was attended by the City Marshal, [illegible] of office, and the sheriffs in their state carriages. The whole party were attired in court dresses. The Mandarin and Chinese artist, on being introduced to the above dignitaries, at first mistook the state footmen in their splendid gold lace liveries for the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, and performed the kow-tow or salaam accordingly. The matter was speedily explained to them. The civic party expressed themselves much pleased with their visit.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The nightly crowds upon the Boulevards which had grown to such a nuisance, blocking up all the open spaces of the neighbourhood with a senseless brawling throng of both sexes and all ages, have been at last put a stop to by an effective manœuvre of the authorities on Saturday night last. About eleven o'clock or that night troops in considerable bodies advanced in columns by all the streets which debouch upon the theatre of disorder. This manœuvre was managed so adroitly by the military that the crowd found itself unexpectedly shut up within a complete crowd of bayonets. It was in vain that individuals attempted to [illegible] they were completely blockaded, and upwards of 1000 persons were arrested, amongst whom were two representatives of the people. All were swept off to the Prefecture of Police, where they remained until Sunday morning, when most of them were discharged. It was remarked that the National Guards, instead of complaining of the extra service imposed on them by these assaults, have repaired with alacrity to their respective mairies, anxious by a vigorous onset to abate the nuisance.

The night of Sunday passed over without any disorder, and even without any attempt to form an attroupement. The rassis of Saturday night appeared to have intimidated the ill-disposed and to have entirely allayed curiosity. The Porte St. Denis and the Porte St. Martin were perfectly free from crowd or tumult.

New food for excitement by the Parisian mob has, however, been found in the name of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the former prisoner of Ham, who has been lately elected to the National Assembly for Paris, and whose mad attempt at Boulogne, in the capacity of Pretender to the throne of France, created mingled surprise and derision some few years ago. On Sunday the name of the Prince was to be heard in all the assemblies of holyday people of the lower class who spend the Sundays and fête days in the cabarets outside the barriers of Paris, a fact which was held to prove active agency on the part of his adherents, or of parties assuming to be so.

On Monday morning a new journal, Le Napoléonien, appeared. It is, as its title indicates, the advocate of the Prince, and in its first number displays ability.

On Monday morning crowds collected in the quarters leading to the National [illegible] in the faubourgs and the rappel were beaten, troops and National Guards were [illegible] out, and all the excitement and commotion of a Paris mob were brought into full development, and all because M. Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was expected to take his seat in the National Assembly. So early as twelve o'clock crowds began to form in the vicinity of the Palace of the Assembly. The fear of the law against attroupements prevented their remaining long on the same spot; but they did not abandon the object of the assembling, which was simply to see and to applaud the new hero of their caprice, for it was reported that he would be at hand to enter the Chamber the moment that his election was recognised. It was in vain that people began to be friends of the Prince told them that he would not be there that day; that his uncle Jerome, ex King of Westphalia, had a letter from him, dated Saturday, stating that he would not be in Paris before Tuesday—the people would remain off and on, to catch a glimpse of him.

During the day a placard appeared, bearing an address of General Piat, Colonel of the fourth Legion of National Guards of the faubourg (he who had taken possession of the Hôtel de Ville on the 24th February), in which he, as an avowed friend of Prince Louis Napoleon, disclaimed for him any ambitious project.

Other friends of the Prince, in the country, were not, however, equally discreet

During the late elections at Gonesse, the peasants, on proceeding to vote, carried their ballot in front of their hats, on which was inscribed, in large characters, "L. Napoléon! Vive l'Empereur! Sur la République!"

The Napoléonien asserts that the election of Prince Louis Napoleon has filled the Executive Government with dismay

The banquet of five sous per head at Vincennes did not take place on Monday, but the Government were prepared to meet it, had it not been postponed. Paris was filled with troops of the line, and all the villages round it were crowded with regiments of cavalry and infantry. Generals Changarnier and Fort of Vincennes with artillery and soldiers of the line. Thus, all cause for apprehension was removed on that score: added to which, was the reassuring fact that the members of the Government were understood to be better and more united than they had been.

The quest on of "want of confidence" in the Executive Committee of Government was raised in a meeting of 600 representatives, held on Friday night, in the Salle du Pas Perdus of the Chamber of Deputies, and again on Saturday, the quest on whether the present Executive Government should be maintained, was debated in the several bureaux, and especially on the first, occasion being taken from the report to be prepared upon the grant of one hundred thousand francs per month for the expenses of the establishment of the Executive Government at the Luxembourg, not including the salary of the members of the Executive Commission In all the bureaux representatives spoke in strong terms against the state of Governmental inertia produced by the existence of discordant principles in the Executive Commission. In the bureaux of the Assembly, the President of the Assembly informed the Executive Commission of the proceedings in the bureaux, and of the intention of a party in the Assembly to avail itself of the question of the proposed grant on Monday to ask a vote of confidence from the Assembly. In other words, to take the sense of the Assembly as to whether the present Executive Government should be maintained

The Executive Commission signified at once its acceptance of the question, and accordingly Monday was fixed for the debate.

It appears by the budget for the year 1848, presented to the National Assembly on Friday, that the expenses created by the decrees of the Provisional Government amounted to 163,570,161f. (£6,542,828), appropriated as follows:

| | Francs. |
|---|---|
| Budget of Foreign Affairs .. .. .. .. | 400,000 |

The effective of the standing army has been increased by 135,000 conscripts and 11,000 volunteers.

On Monday evening, about five o'clock, the Government ordered strong measures against the crowds assembled in the Place de la Revolution. Regiments of infantry and cavalry, and large bodies of National Guards (sedentaires and mobiles) immediately crossed the bridge in front of the Palace of the Assembly, and forming a junction with those strong on the Place, cleared it at the point of the bayonet of the immense assemblage that had occupied it.

This measure was so peremptorily and so rapidly executed, that the Place (the largest in Europe) was swept clear in five minutes. Complaints were made of unnecessary violence on the part of the armed force in carrying out this order of the Government, conveyed through the Minister of War, under whose system of exercise was performed; but, as matters had come to something like a crisis, no hesitation was allowed when the command "Withdraw" was issued

Having cleared the Place, a column of at least 3000 Garde Mobiles wheeled up to the Rue de Rivoli, and formed about twenty abreast. The order was given to march. The drums beat a charge, and the column moved at double-quick time along the Rue de Rivoli, and through the Rues Castiglione and Paix. Having cleared this quarter completely, it proceeded in the same order and at the same pace to the Hotel of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, and there halted. In the meanwhile, the dragoons advanced from the Place de la Revolution, by the Rue Royale, clearing the people before them, and who did not comply silently, for cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive Louis Napoléon!" were shouted by them vigorously. The Boulevard cleared, the dragoons halted in position. The whole of the Rue Royale was filled with National Guards. Access to the Place de la Revolution was refused to everybody. This continued for an hour or two: ultimately, the people retired, after vent ng their displeasure in sounding. Later in the evening, other assemblages that took place were dispersed without much trouble. The night passed over in tranquillity.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

MONDAY. This morning a number of persons thronged the quay and the Pont de la Concorde, to witness the arrival of Prince Louis Bonaparte; and detachments of National Guards and troops were kept constantly moving to keep the passage clear.

At one o'clock, M. Sénard, the President, took the chair, and shortly afterwards Jerome Bonaparte acceded the tribune. He said that he was the friend and relative of Citizen Louis Napoleon, and would not undertake to justify his [illegible] to which he had remained a total stranger. He should have opposed idle rumours, published in the journals, and infamous statements, which nobody had the courage to make at the tribune. The authors of those calumnies were well known. They were parties opposed to the Republic, who fortunately were but a fractional portion of the population. On the less generous portion of the population, and it was but natural that such a party, wishing to attack the Republic, should make use of a name possessed of some influence. M. Bonaparte declared, on his honour, that Louis Napoleon was a total stranger to those machinations. When he heard of the proclamation of the Republic, he came to Paris ostensibly, and his first care was to report himself to the Provisional Government. That latter complied with assurances, and in benevolence, that it would not oppose his stay in Paris in ordinary times, that, in the present difficult circumstances, it was advisable for him to withdraw from the capital for a few days. In consequence of this, on the approach of the elections he was offered different seats in the Assembly, which he [illegible] to accept, and his name was brought forward at the re-election without his knowledge or consent, and nobody has been more surprised than he at his election. There was a rumour M. Jerome Bonaparte could not treat too contemptuously, and that money had been distributed by foreign [illegible] adherents of the Bonapartes. This was an [illegible] calumny. It was the first time that family had been so insulted as to see its name [illegible] with foreign intrigues. Last night M. Bonaparte, on hearing of the reports in circulation, and of the intention of the Government to introduce a measure of exclusion against Louis Napoleon, had waited on the President of the Chamber, on the Minister of the Interior, and the Prefect of Police, by whom he had been informed that the Government contemplated no such intention. He astonishment had been accordingly great, when, on entering the hall, he had been told that the Cabinet intended to bring forward such a measure.

M. Flocon, Minister of Commerce and Agriculture, replied that in the present grave circumstances, the Government would know how to provide for the security and independence of the Republic

The incident has now dropped. M. Pelletier rose and laid on the table a project of law, demanding a credit to purchase engines for working the Paris and Caen Railroad.

M. Goudchaux, the Minister of Finance, then supplied some explanations relative to the state of the finances, which he declared prosperous; and also respecting several proposed financial schemes of the Government.

M. Crémieux then read the order for the day, for the consideration of the decree of the Government, demanding 100,000 francs per month, for the expenses of the Executive Government

M. Dupont, the reporter of the Committee to which the bill on the question had been referred, announced that the Committee, satisfied with the explanation given by the members of the Executive, had been unanimously of opinion to grant 25,000 francs per month for administrative expenses, and 75,000 for expenses of general security, of which an account should be rendered to a special committee appointed by the Assembly

M. Sevaste did not oppose the grant for the day, for the consideration of the decree of the Government, demanding 100,000 francs per month, for the expenses of the Executive Government

M. Dupont, the reporter of the Committee to which the bill on the question had been referred, announced that the Committee, satisfied with the explanation given by the members of the Executive, had been unanimously of opinion to grant 25,000 francs per month for administrative expenses, and 75,000 for expenses of general security, of which an account should be rendered to a special committee appointed by the Assembly

M. Sevaste did not oppose the grant for the day, for the consideration of the decree of the Government, demanding 100,000 francs per month, for the expenses of the Executive Government

M. Lamarque defended the Executive Committee, because its overthrow might compromise the position of the country. He was anxious to maintain it because it was composed of men worthy of the confidence placed in them, and that he saw no men to substitute in their place

M. Lausaze combated the grant, because the Executive Committee inspired him with no confidence

General Bedeau thought that the Government would find in the National Assembly all the support necessary for the development of Republican institutions. It would, he said, be erroneous to suppose that any Government could rule the country by relying upon one party

M. Lamartine admitted that it was full time to clear the misunderstanding which appeared to exist between the country and the Executive Committee. The latter were said to be divided in opinion, and were blamed for not retiring. They were men of honour, and by adopting that course they should not have made way for new colleagues, but given passage to anarchy. His friends and he had foreseen the danger of entering the Executive Committee after having belonged to the old Provisional Government, an arbitrary and dictatorial government, which from the nature of circumstances had been guilty of many irregularities. Parties could not forgive the men who had the glorious misfortune of presiding at the foundation of the Republic, and those men would long remain an object of hatred for the enemies and envious of the Republic. M Lamartine next vindicated himself and his colleagues against the charge of not proclaiming the Republic, and following a brief summary, and proceeded to recapitulate all the acts of the Government since the 24th of February last Intelligence was here brought up to the Chamber that the cavalry were charging the people on the Place de la Concorde.

The sitting, a moment after, was suspended for a short time, at the close of [illegible]

M. de Lamartine returned to the tribune in great haste and said: Blood has just been shed—shots have been fired here close by, and the cry is raised—"Vive l'Empereur Napoleon!" (Tremendous agitation.) A law ought to be forthwith voted to put a stop to this.

A Member: Let us vote it by acclamation. (Unanimous cries of "Yes, yes")

The greatest agitation arose here.

M. de Lamartine: I have it here drawn up on the instant The hon. gentleman then read it as follows:—

"The Executive Committee, looking at Article 4, of the law of June 12, 1816, considering that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte is comprised in the law of 1832, which banishes the family of Napoleon, that if that law has been [illegible] from by the vote of the National Assembly in favour of three members of that family who were admitted to take their seats in the midst of the people, such departure from the law is quite personal, and by no means applies to the said Louis Napoleon Bonaparte; that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte has twice come forward as a pretender, and that his presence at such compromises the Republic; that the Government cannot accept the responsibility of such acts, and that it would fail in the first of its duties, if it did not take measures to prevent the recurrence of them; declares that it will call on the decree of 1832 to be enacted against Louis Napoleon Bonaparte until such time as the National Assembly shall decide otherwise."

M. de Lamartine called on the Assembly to pass the measure by acclamation; and in the confusion that prevailed, it could not be ascertained whether it was carried in the chair did carried or not.

M. Pierre Bonaparte vindicated himself from any imputation as to his loyalty to the Republic; and also his cousin, Louis Napoleon, from any share in Bonaparte's intrigues

M. Napoleon Bonaparte said: M. Lamartine has eloquently told you that the horrible crime which he has denounced to us was committed to the cry of a name which has never been stained with blood; and it is under the feeling of execration against such an odious attempt that he has proposed to you a bill of proscription. (Agitation.) I should be sorry to say anything to excite you in any way against my cousin; but I must, in my proud appeal, declare inspired by a crime to which he whom it is intended to proscribe is a stranger.

The Minister of Commerce observed that the decree was prepared before [illegible] and M. Napoleon Bonaparte rose and said, "What a moment, then, have you chosen to present it! Think on what you demand: [illegible]

[illegible] Place [illegible] the Revolution, it will remain as a great epoch in history, but can never be revived. (Agitation.) I conclude by protesting against the connexion which M. de Lamartine appears to establish between this question and the name of my cousin."

The cries for a division on the question of confidence in the Government now became extremely violent

The general discussion was then declared to be closed, and the articles were brought forward

The first allows 25,000f. a month for their expenses, which was adopted.

The second allows 75,000f for secret expenses.

M. de Larcy demanded that this article be referred to the Committee appointed to examine the bill, demanding 300,000f. as secret service money. (Cries of "No, no!")

This proposition was rejected, and the article finally adopted.

The bill in its ensemble was then put to the vote, when the numbers were—In its favour, 569; against, 112; majority, 457.

The sitting was brought to a close at half-past seven

TUESDAY. In the vicinity of the National Assembly there was the same display of military force as on the preceding day; and several charges of cavalry were made, in order to disperse the populace. Sixteen guns were placed around the Assembly

An attempt to raise barricades at the Palais Royal was frustrated by the shop keepers.

M. Degousée, one of the Questors of the Chamber, proposed that the project of law relative to Louis Napoleon Bonaparte should be one of very older business. Innocent as Louis Napoleon might be of what was passing in his name, there was a state of things existing which could not be allowed to continue.

M. Jules Favre, as the reporter of the bill on the election of Louis Napoleon for the Charente-Inférieure, supported the return of Louis Napoleon, which he thought ought to be allowed.

M. Rouher, reporter of the bill on the same, to which was referred the election of Louis Napoleon for Paris, opposed his admission into the National Assembly. He contended that they could not admit among them a prétendant expectatif. What would be said if the Duke of Bordeaux had been named?

The reporter of the 6th bureau, to which the return of Louis Napoleon for Corsica had been referred, stated, in a few words, that his bureau had concluded by a majority in favour of the admission of Louis Napoleon

M. Vieillard, as a personal friend of Louis Napoleon, bore testimony to his moderation and patriotism, and asserted that he ought to be allowed to take his place in that Assembly.

M. Louis Blanc supported the admission of Louis Napoleon to the Assembly.

M. Ledru-Rollin spoke for the exclusion of Louis Napoleon from the Assembly and from France.

Ultimately, the question of the admission of M. Bonaparte was carried by a large majority, the proviso being added, "provided that he leave himself a French citizen

WEDNESDAY.—All was quiet around the hall of the Assembly. The business of the day was of no interest, the Assembly being occupied with a discussion on the municipalities existing between administrative and legislative functions.

SPAIN.

At Madrid, on the 7th inst., M. de Lesseps received from Paris the reply to the note, by which the Spanish Government had notified to the Executive Committee of the Republic that the Queen of Spain recognised the new Government of France. The French official despatch was couched in the most friendly terms for Her Majesty personally, and for the responsible councillors. The French Government expressed much satisfaction at seeing the Queen of Spain assume the initiative of the recognition of the Republic, and M. de Lesseps said no time in presenting that despatch to the Duke of Sotomayor. Their interview is said to have been highly satisfactory for the interests of the two countries

The Gazette contains a circular of the Minister of the Interior to the frontier authorities, prohibiting the admission into Spain of a French paper called Le Républicain de Versoux, which is published at Bayonne.

The dispersion of several small insurgent bands in Arragon, Valencia, and Catalonia, has been officially announced. Colonel Rosera, who was implicated in the revolt of the 7th ult., had been [illegible] at Madrid. It was reported that M. Isturitz had received the post of Minister Plenipotentiary in England.

On the 8th, a new change in the staff of the Presidency of General O'Donnell, was spoken of. The Queen was believed to be in an interesting state; and it was rumoured that the Duke of Sotomayor and M. Sartorius would shortly leave for Seville to be present at the confinement of the Infanta.

PORTUGAL

Advices to the 9th instant, from Lisbon, mention that the Duke of Palmella had resumed the Presidency of the House of Peers.

The Deputies were debating upon the Bank Note and Currency project, the provisions of which caused much discontent in Lisbon. It was feared that finanrial measures would not be properly looked into, as the Deputies and Peers were returning to the provinces, and might not enable the Cortes to legislate to the end July, as had been decreed.

The Spanish troops that revolted at Seville had been pardoned, with the exception of the officers.

Some arrests had taken place in Lisbon, but tranquillity was preserved throughout the country.

A vessel had arrived in the Tagus with dates to the 16th of April from Pernambuco, bringing the ligence of an insurrection there of some slaves on a large sugar estate, in which the slaves had on two occasions completely routed the Government troops sent against them.

ITALIAN STATES.

SARDINIA AND PIEDMONT. The address in answer to the speech from the throne was voted by the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies at Turin, on the 7th, by a majority of 101 against 15. After declaring that Italy has resumed her place among civilized nations, by the generous movement of Lombardy and the courage of Charles Albert, the address proceeds to express the gratitude of the country for the valour evinced by her sons, and the conviction that the full of Piedmont and the splendid victory of Goito have secured to the destinies of Italy her union and independence. Parma, Piacenza, Guastalla, Modena, and Reggio have declared their adhesion to Piedmont. The Chamber is confident that the Government will hasten the organization and arming of the National Guard, and expresses also its satisfaction at the liberal sympathies which had been evinced for the Italian cause by neighbouring nations; and, though convinced that Italy will act alone in her own cause, the Chamber thankfully receives the solemn declarations of the French Republic. The renewed diplomatic intercourse with Spain, the praiseworthy acts of the Ministry in difficult times, and the budget, form the subject of other paragraphs. With respect to legislation, the Chamber, admitting the many reforms already introduced, reminds the Government that much still remains to be done, particularly as to judicial institutions and the abolition of trial by jury. The equality of citizens in the eye of the law is considered a right without distinction of religion. The Government will undoubtedly second the general desire for reform in public instruction, and grant assistance to the poor in parochial districts. The address concludes by expressing the satisfaction of the Chamber that the day approaches when a Constituent Assembly, named by universal suffrage, will form a statute calculated to establish a strong and respected monarchy.

LOMBARDY AND VENICE. The votes in favour of the annexation of Lombardy to Piedmont had been summed up at Milan, and the solemn proclamation of the act of union had taken place on the 5th.

A decree of the Venetian Provisional Government, dated the 3d, had been published, convoking at Venice, for the 18th inst., an assembly of the Deputies of the province to deliberate on the three following questions:—1. Shall the political condition of Venice be regulated at present, or shall the deals on be postponed until the conclusion of the war? 2. In case the first course should be adopted, shall the Venetian territory form a province of John Piedmont? 3. Shall the members of the Provisional Government be replaced, or continue in office? Monsignor Marchetti, the envoy sent by the Pope to negotiate peace between King Charles Albert and the Austrians, arrived at Milan from Milan, from the Piedmontese camp, on the 8th, and left in the evening for Inspruck.

At Venice, on the 3rd inst., a crowd assembled before the house of President Manin, and demanded in a speech from that gentleman that the ghetto should not be abolished. The Prefect appeared on the balcony, and reminded the people that the best way to preserve the Republic was to avoid tumults and disorder. The crowd quietly dispersed.

The Venetian papers publish the decree of the Provisional Government respecting the election of the Deputies to the National Assembly. The representation is based on the population; the electoral districts are regulated by the parishes: in every parish where the population does not exceed 3000 souls one Deputy is to be returned; where the population fluctuates between 3000 and 4000, two are to be elected; and where the population varies from 4000 to 6000, three will be chosen; and so on in the same ratio.

The only restrictions on the exercise of the right, and the eligibility of individuals to act as deputies, appears to be age. The electors must be turned 21, and the elected 30 years of age

From the scant of war we learn that the casualties of the Piedmontese army, at the battle of Goito, were three officers and 35 rank and file killed; 11 officers and 217 rank and file wounded, and 31 missing. The Austrian garrison of Goito then reached 1 Cremona on the 3d, on its way to Verona. An inconsiderable military force remained in Milan and its vicinity, amounted to 18,500 men, with 30 pieces of artillery.

In the arrangement of the campaign, Treviso will be commanded by Colonel Bolliazzi, and Padua by Colonel Ferrari. Two strong brigades, under the orders of Durando and Ferrari, will march to the defence of either of these places. General Pepe will take the command of all the troops now on the Venetian territory.

The Austrians effected a precipitate retreat into Mantua on the 4th, and on the same day the Duke of Genoa marched towards Verona with a strong force, and the whole army. A report of artillery was heard on the 5th in the direction of Nogara, and it was supposed that the Prince had fallen in with a column of Austrians sent to relieve Peschiera. The garrison of Peschiera, on the 6th an Austrian force of about 12,000 men, consisting of Croats, Sanguinetto, and Croats.

All the accounts received from the theatre of war concur in complaining of the cruel retaliations committed by the Austrian troops during their retreat.

561,092 persons having voted in the various districts of Lombardy in favour of the incorporation of the province with the kingdom of Piedmont and Sardinia, and only 681 for an independent state, the union will after the week be declared.

Of incorporation was to be carried into effect forthwith, according to a proclamation of the Provisional Government of Milan, dated the 8th instant.

NAPLES. On the 29th ult. 800 Sicilian volunteers set out from Palermo for the Neapolitan coast, for the purpose of aiding the insurrectionary movement against Ferdinand. This chosen band first assembled in the cathedral to receive the benediction of the Archbishop, and were then conveyed by a boat to the [illegible], amid the enthusiastic cheers of an immense multitude. Many individuals were with difficulty prevented from joining them, though unprovided with arms. The King of Naples sent four Swiss regiments of 4500 men to prevent the landing of the Sicilians at Reggio. The journals have made their appearance again at Naples. The French journals, according to advices that have reached them from Naples and Leghorn, announce that the kingdom is in a state of insurrection, that the insurgents are literally pouring in from the provinces, and that the King is in the hands of the people. The news requires confirmation.

AUSTRIA.

The Governor of Bohemia, Count Leo Thun, has published a reply to the petition of the Austrian Ministry against the formation of a Provisional Government in Bohemia. Count Thun, after quoting the leading points of the Ministerial protest, says that he has sent a report of his proceedings to his Majesty the Emperor, and that he is not willing to retrace his steps or suspend his resolution until the Emperor's decision shall arrive. As to the responsibility with which the Austrian Ministry have thought proper to invest him, he protests that he readily takes it upon himself, and that he, and he alone, is responsible for all the measures of the Provisional Government for Bohemia.

The Gouverneur Provincial of Prague publishes a loyal address of the inhabitants of Trieste to his Majesty the Emperor of Austria, thanking his Majesty in the warmest terms for his "many beneficent acts," and assuring him that "the great and exalted sovereignty of the people has been proclaimed in Vienna, and that by the 9th, and the 19th of March, have deserved well of their country.

The coldness which had previously been exhibited towards the Chamber in Berlin was changed into cordial antipathy and dislike, from which the worst consequences were apprehended.

On the vote becoming known, the greatest agitation prevailed among the throng outside the doors of the Assembly. Some of the more noted among the members who voted in the minority were cheered by this crowd as they left the Assembly. M. Von Arnim, Minister of Foreign Affairs, was surrounded by the irritated mob, who were prevented from doing him personal violence by a detachment of students from the hall of the University.

For several days the mob continued to give expression to their anger in uproar, but no act of violence took place.

On the morning of the 10th, a crowd of persons assembled in front of the hotel of the Ambassador of the French Republic, to offer their congratulations. M. Arago declared that he received the compliment as addressed to France, and not to him

SWITZERLAND.

M. Quiesenbain has proposed to demand from the Grand Council of Lausanne the abrogation of the capitulation with Naples, and a place to the account of the nation on pay and services due by the King.

In most unlimited sovereignty of the people has been proclaimed in Fribourg. Several convents have been suppressed in Schwyz and Lucerne.

M. le Pasteur Rapp, one of the persecuted Evangelical ministers in the Canton de Vaud, arraigned before the ordinary tribunal of Vevey on the 29th ult., on a charge of holding a religious meeting in his own house, presided over by himself, has just been acquitted. The costs of the inquiry are to be paid by the State.

M. Rapp was formerly Minister of the French Protestant Church of London. This decision is important, as bearing on several cases of the same kind.

DENMARK AND SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

The renewal of active hostilities by the belligerent powers, and the dissipation of all hope, founded upon English intervention, of a peaceable settlement of this quarrel, render necessary a brief narrative of the state of matters up to the present point, previous to noticing the battle fought on the 5th inst.

The Danes have refused to make the slightest concession, or to recognise the right of the German Confederation to their possessions—a right which the King, in his first patent, promised to respect, and they have abused the proffered mediation of England, to gain time to enter into new alliances with Russia, Sweden, and Norway. Prussia acquiesced in the preliminaries to a treaty of peace at first proposed by the English Cabinet; but Denmark refused so decidedly to listen to them, that Lord Palmerston modified his proposal to meet the wishes of the Danes. It was now recommended that the Germans should evacuate Jutland and North Sealand, and give up the contribution demanded from the former province, and that Denmark should restore the German ships that had been captured. As basis of the future peace, it was suggested that the part of Schleswig in which Danish is spoken should be dissolved from the rest and incorporated into Denmark; that the part in which German is spoken should be united to Holstein and Germany; and that the Danish and German sections of the kingdom should continue annexed to the Danish Crown, as Norway is to the sweilish. This arrangement was agreed to by Prussia, on the urgent solicitation of the English Ministry, who promised their assistance to have it carried through; and General Von Wrangel, commander-in-chief of the German army, received orders to evacuate Jutland and North Schleswig without delay. But the expected acquiescence of Denmark did not ensue. The evacuation of Jutland was attributed by the Danish Court partly to the threats of Russia, partly to dread of attack from the naval power of Sweden. The Danes, therefore, resolved to act on the offensive, and occupy the districts from which the Germans had been withdrawn. It is said that the conduct of the Danish government has given great offence to the English ministers, and that an energetic note has been transmitted to Copenhagen, but without any effect. The conduct of the Danes has excited universal indignation in Germany. Fresh troops have already been despatched to the north, and, according to the latest accounts, the Assembly had sent agents to the two nearest German powers, to accelerate their movements.

The main force of the Danes has been stationed since the beginning of the war on Alsen. This island is part of Schleswig and the family estate of the Duke of Augustenburg is on it. The island is [illegible] to the main by a very narrow arm of the sea, which is deep enough [illegible] at the strait [illegible]. It was from this position that the troops advanced to attack the Schleswig-Holstein troops on the 9th of April, and further they retreated after the battle of Schleswig. Here they have ever since been busily augmenting the numbers of their troops, and throwing a bridge over the straits from opposite the town of Sonderburg, where it is narrowest, and constructing entrenchments on the mainland. From want of artillery, the Germans could only cannonade the bridge to check these operations. These entrenchments were thrown up on what are called the Düppeler heights—a tract of rising ground close upon the sea, and extremely defensible. Even without entrenchments, the position taken up by the Danes on the main was of great strength.

A few miles south of these heights is the town of Flensburg, which has borne the burden of the war for about two months, and which is also the chief station made by a Danish and a German garrison. Upon the 4th general Von Wrangel had concentrated the greater part of the German troops assembling—Prussians, Hanoverians, Mecklenburghers, Mecklenburgers, &c. Schleswig-Holsteiners amounting to about 20,000 men. The remainder of the army garrisoned the most important positions, or were employed in partisan demonstrations to the north. The 5th of June was the birthday of the King of Hanover, and early on the day was assured for a great review in honour of the occasion. This, however, was a mere pretext to deceive the Danes. But the necessary preparations for waggons, the removal of the sick and wounded in the Flensburg hospitals

NATIONAL WORKSHOP (TAILORS) IN THE PRISON OF CLICHY, AT PARIS.

NATIONAL WORKSHOP AT PARIS.

WHEN MM. Louis Blanc and Marie planned what was termed "the Organization of Labour," workshops for different trades were appointed in various parts of Paris. That represented in our Illustration is in the old debtors' prison of Clichy, or that portion of it in which the prisoners walk in wet weather. In each cell of the prison, for one occupant, are now located eight tailors. While they work, one man reads aloud the newspapers of the day; especial attention being paid to reports of the debates in the National Assembly. Upon one of the pillars is inscribed—"Cette qui ne travaille pas est un voleur" (He who does not work is a rogue). The plan of the Workshops for the other trades is not so well organised as that for the tailors; and a peculiar feature is the reading aloud of the newspapers.

RELIEF TO TOBAGO, GUIANA, AND TRINIDAD.—This act, which has been recently passed, gives power to the Treasury to authorise the advance of £5000 for the immediate relief of inhabitants of Tobago who have suffered by a severe hurricane. It also empowers the Treasury to borrow £220,000 on Exchequer Bills, which are to bear interest not exceeding 3½d. per centum per diem. Exchequer Bills to the amount of £50,000 may be advanced for the relief of Tobago; and to the amount of £170,000 to encourage the immigration of free labourers into Guiana and Trinidad. The said sum of £50,000 for Tobago to be advanced to persons authorised to receive same by act of legislature of the Island, "on the credit of the revenue or the public property thereof," the loan to bear £4 per cent. interest. The £170,000 for British Guiana and Trinidad to be lent "to the said commissioners for borrowing and raising moneys on the security of the revenues of British Guiana, and to the agents for borrowing or raising money on the security of the revenues of Trinidad, or either to such commissioners or agents, in such proportion as the Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury shall see fit." It also directs Exchequer Bills to be advanced upon security, and to be repaid with interest, as the Treasury may require. Treasury to deliver certificates of amount [illegible] to receive the same. Treasury may advance money from Consolidated Fund, instead of in Exchequer Bills. Bank of England to open and keep an account with the Treasury for the purposes of this act. Repayments under this act into the Bank to form part of Consolidated Fund. Accounts to be laid before Parliament.

THE VIVANDIERE AT PARIS.

THIS is a characteristic sketch of a bivouac of the National Guards in the streets of Paris, with a fair Vivandière, or sutler, that is, a female who follows the troops, and provides them with refreshment. The Vivandière and the young officer are foremost in the picture; but there are other characters—as the puny garde, who, after feeling the heat of service; another more at ease, with his tabletterie; and a "diner-out," seated on his drum, and, as far as can be seen, enjoying his meal. The cavalry officer, the guns, and the spectators in the balcony are good accessories, and the whole is a scene of actual life.

M. RASPAIL.

THE pursuit of literature, science, or art in France seldom prevents the votaries of such studies from attaining political eminence in that country, when they feel disposed to essay likewise the perilous path which politicians tread. The instances that could be cited in point are almost innumerable. Both M. Guizot and M. Thiers first distinguished themselves as littérateurs. M. Arago, who is so prominent a member of the present Government of the Republic, it is almost unnecessary to state, is one of the most celebrated [illegible] men of Europe. The gifted Lamartine unites in his person the [illegible] orator, historian, and statesman, and in each separately he [illegible] to establish the fame of any one man in that re[illegible]

[illegible] much previous to the Revolution he had not, like [illegible] man, attained an European fame, had, nevertheless, so far distinguished himself in matters of science as to be known in Paris as a most [illegible] and accomplished chemist, not merely in the ordinary sense in which that term is applied, but as a man of large scientific attainment in the important branch of chemistry. He, too, had the ambition to become a leading spirit of political movement in his country; but rejecting as dishonourable the only way open to power and place under the régime of Louis Philippe, he preferred to rank himself with the discontented and the conspiring enemies of the dynasty, and [illegible]

[illegible] longed-for hour at last arrived, and [illegible] the 24th of February 1848, as the commencement of [illegible]. At last a Republic was proclaimed, and the reign of what he understood as Liberty—that is, License—began. In common [illegible] wild political theorists as himself, [illegible] a course [illegible] the most impracticable and absurd. [illegible] He became a leading spirit in one of the most violent of the Revolutionary Clubs, which sprang into existence immediately after the 24th of February, and sought, almost [illegible] by [illegible] and [illegible], to coerce the Provisional Government [illegible] opinions and doctrines [illegible] private property, and the duties of a Government towards [illegible].

Finding himself and his associates [illegible] with so signal a failure [illegible] Mr. [illegible] sequence of sympathy for Poland, the masses [illegible] the National Assembly, of which they held possession [illegible] a short time until expelled by the National Guards at the point of the bayonet.

Week, on that eventful day, Barbes, Sobrier, and their companions proceeded to the Hôtel de Ville to nominate a Provisional Government, one of the chief [illegible] was allotted to Raspail. Shortly after the arrest of his companions, however, on the afternoon of the 15th, he was taken into custody, and, with the others, was confined in the Castle of Vincennes, near Paris, where he still remains, awaiting his trial.

GUERNSEY RACE PRIZE CUP.

THIS artistically designed silver Claret Jug has been presented by the Queen, as the Royal Prize, to be run for at the Guernsey Races, on the 20th instant. The height of the Cup is 17 inches; the form is fine; and the ornamentation of the Elizabethan characters in relief, is beautifully executed. It is from the establishment of Messrs. Wakinson and Dobson, of Piccadilly.

THE GUERNSEY RACE PRIZE CUP, GIVEN BY HER MAJESTY.

The Islanders feel greatly honoured by this special mark of Royal favour, for not only does the Queen defray the cost of the Prize, but her Majesty has, in this instance, chosen the Cup itself.

A GALA ON THE THAMES.

—Mighty Nature bounds as from her birth
The sun is in the heavens, and life on earth;
Flowers in the valley, splendour in the beam,
Health on the gale, and freshness in the stream. LARA

"Non cuivis" —or rather let us indite in the mother tongue—"It is not every man's fortune to go to Corinth:" so said Horace. It's only here and there that a traveller has witnessed the nuptials between the Doge of Venice and the Adriatic: there are those who have never even seen the Lord Mayor voyage to eat whitebait at Greenwich. For this reason, the narrative of a passage in aquatics may conveniently have mention, albeit under the average of Cleopatra's sail adown the Cydnus. "Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains;—so is Thames the sovereign of streams." When some one was once contending for the beauty of Naples, "Ay," said his antagonist, "but there's more people in London." Thus the Rhine is a river of superior natural claims, but there are more ships upon the Thames. Moreover, there are yachts—galleys of surpassing favour and fleetness, and withal as much superior to your gondolas, or any such weak inventions of fresh-water sailors, as calliopsh is to calves-head. The metropolitan fleet of clippers—bight the Royal Thames Yacht Club—celebrated their second match of the season on Tuesday last, their rendezvous being the fairy bay of Erith. "A prophet has no honour in his own country:" upon the same ground this lonely spot is little better known to the Cockney nation than California, a word anent it.

"Latin recess"—Pooh! There is a graceful curve of the noble river between Woolwich and Purfleet, and on its starboard hand, as ye descend, the most rural of villages that ever eye coveted after "the season" in May Fair. This is Erith: and on its lucent bay; by which hundreds of thousands pass weekly, in search of a pleasure anywhere, to Rat Gelgoths of the tourist Gravesend. Now as no traveller henceforth plead ignorance of the existence of this oasis in the great chace of everywhere, Erith is the prettiest of pretty suburbanites, with a most commendable hostel—called the Pier—and a pleasance, a public garden, fit to challenge Chatsworth in the matter of floriculture, and directed by a gentleman, by name Maclure, than whom a more civil or solicitous to give satisfaction shall not be found from the Land's End to John o' Groat's. Don't you envy those whom chance exiled last Tuesday to Erith? This little port is now the point from which the Royal Thames Yacht Club matches commence, the course being round the Nore light and back, instead of from Greenwich to Gravesend (that rural Cockney cruise) as of yore. On Tuesday last, as afore-said, the sailing was for the Stranger's Prize, £100 sterling, in a jaunty silk purse of purple and gold. It was open to all vessels of Royal Yacht Clubs—Landfrey that is to say, half-minute time per ton. The entry was a poor one, only numbering a solitary stranger—the Heroine—of the Royal Victoria Club: all the others were Thames boats. Half a dozen took up their stations abreast of Erith.

The steamer carrying the noble Commodore's flag, and a considerable company, arrived from the great city about noon: and the guns for making ready and starting having gone off the fleet did likewise. It was blowing fresh from W.S.W., with indications of squalls a promise punctually performed. It boots not to tell of the early changes and chances of the race—save that it must be observed, one more fall of interest cannot be imagined. The squadron stuck to its canvass as though there were no zephyrs to be wooed. The result of this, in returning, was that the Secret had her topmast blown out of her, and that the Ino carried away her bowsprit to say nothing of the "sheets" that were "stranded" here, there, and everywhere. These mischiefs took place during a squall, in which there was a struggle between the wind and the rain for the majority. However, as the afternoon wore on, the weather became finer, and the finish was, in professional language, "all that could be desired." From the first it was easy to foresee that, barring accidents, the new iron yacht, the Mosquito, must win; for her style of sailing, and her speed, were quite first-rate. She finished, after the allowance was deducted, several minutes a-head of the Heroine, and bids fair once more to bring metal into marine fashion. The match was good in all its parts; good as a passage of honourable rivalry between the craft of a great nautical island; good as regards the social intercourse of a great civilized society. These reunions have our cordial sympathy: they deserve, as they possess, a high position among English NATIONAL SPORTS.

RAISING OF THE "EARL GREY," COASTING VESSEL.

THIS vessel, of 180 tons burden, was lost on the 24th December last in the Whitaker Channel, off the Coast of Essex, in seven fathoms water; and being in the track of the vessels, with her broken masts just appearing at low water, this was a dangerous obstruction to the navigation. The ship has, however, been raised by the patented air-tight cases, under the superintendence of Capt. Offiaturtic, of the steam-ship Fly; and on the 4th of April last was towed into Burnham, Essex, a distance of upwards of 20 miles.

This new mode of raising sunken vessels is by flexible air-tight cases, and attached chains. The inside cases are made air-proof by several thicknesses of macintosh cloth, confined in an outer case of stout rope matting; these being affixed to the chains, they are sent down at once and secured round the vessel by a self acting stopper. The cases are collapsed when lowered, having air tubes leading above the water, and connected with one or more force air-pumps on board the steamer, or other ship aiding the operation: so that the cases, when inflated, raise the ship to the surface, without any injury to the wreck. With the ordinary cases, even at the depth of ninety feet, the actual operation of slinging and raising a wreck of any size would not occupy more than three days.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD, JUNE 10.—In a Convocation holden this morning, it was unanimously agreed to grant the following sums out of the University chest for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, viz.:—One hundred and fifty pounds per annum for five years, to the curate of Holy Trinity, Cuthbert, in Cumberland (the only vicarage being the impropriators of the tithe), to be applied towards the stipend of an assistant curate for that parish. One hundred pounds to the Lord Bishop of Fredericton, to be expended in the purchase of such books, printed at the University press, in aid of a library for the use of the clergy and students of that diocese. And one hundred pounds to be expended in the purchase of books printed at the University press, for the library of Christ College in Tasmania.

THE LIVING OF ST MARTIN'S-IN-THE FIELDS.—The inhabitants of St Martin's-in-the-Fields have within the last few days received from the Rev. Henry Robert Dukenfield the painful intelligence, that, in consequence of his continued ill health, he has come to the determination of resigning the vicarage of the parish, which he has held for many years. The rev. gentleman succeeded Dr. Richards, and during the years he held office has completely allayed the rancorous spirit which formerly pervaded the parish among different parties. So highly was the rev. gentleman esteemed by all parties, that his retirement is felt as a great calamity, and a public meeting has been called for the purpose of presenting the rev. gentleman with a suitable testimonial from the inhabitants generally. The Bishop of London has presented the Rev. Henry Mackenzie, M.A., vicar of Yarmouth, to the vicarage of the above parish, rendered vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Sir H. D. Dukenfield. The living is of the annual value of £1285, with a vicarage-house in St. Martin's-place.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

INDIA HOUSE.—On Wednesday, at a special general Court of Directors and Proprietors of the East India Company, convened by requisition, at the Company's Hall, in Leadenhall, street, for the purpose of taking the question of the British Indian Sugar Trade into consideration, Sir J. L. Lushington in the chair, the following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—That, adverting to the present depressed state of the sugar trade; to the evidence by which it has been proved in Committee of the House of Commons, that without a further term of preparation the sugar growers of British India are not in a fit position to compete with the slave owners of the Brazils and Cuba; to the duty incumbent on Great Britain to give a fair trial at least to free labour as opposed to the Brazilian system of slavery; and to the vast importance to the manufacturers of this country as well as to the Government and people of India that every encouragement should be given to the increased exportation of raw produce from that country, both as affording returns to the British merchant, and as facilitating the enormous remittances which are annually required from India on public and private accounts; a petition be presented to Parliament praying that they will, in consideration of these circumstances, adopt the recommendation of the Committee of the House of Commons aforesaid, by imposing a differential duty of 10s. per cwt. in favour of the produce of British possessions, for the period of six years." A petition to Parliament, founded upon the resolution was also adopted, and Mr. Masterman, M.P., was requested to present it. Mr Masterman expressed his readiness to support the prayer of the petition by every means in his power. The Court then adjourned.

SANATORY REFORM.—A public meeting was held on Tuesday night at the Literary and Scientific Institution, Leicester-square, "to petition Parliament for a sound and comprehensive sanatory bill, embracing the whole of the metropolis." The attendance was numerous. Mr. Mackinnon, M.P., who took the chair at eight o'clock, in opening the proceedings, remarked, that there were five requisites to a healthy habitation; viz. pure air, a sufficient supply of good water, a perfect drainage, the absence of animal or vegetable putrid matter lying within certain distances, and that there should be an unquestionable access-pool within any 200 yards of the dwelling. In 99 cases out of every 100, in the closely inhabited parts of this metropolis, these requisites were not to be found. Now, was it not disgraceful to human ity that a sanatory bill for London should be opposed by any human being? (Hear, hear.) Yet interested individuals, who apprehended that they would lose something by such a measure, opposed its extension to the City, which of all places in the world most imperiously demanded sanatory measures! When he had spoken to Lord J Russell and other members of the Government on the importance of ameliorating the sanitary condition of the population of London, they had answered that they should be happy to do so, but were not able to overcome the opposition of the City (hear, hear); not of the people of the City, but the "great dons" who had influence. (Hear, hear.) For instance, from Smithfield market—that still unexpected abomination—the City derived an enormous revenue (Hear, hear.) The Lord Mayor, who was a most intelligent person then present, that if proper sanatory regulations were adopted in the metropolis, including the metropolitan boroughs, the number of deaths would be diminished by as a day. (Hear.) The Legislature, therefore, was bound to be deaf to public opinion, respectfully but firmly and steadily expressed. (Hear.)

Dr Gavin remarked the meeting that in every year, in each the neglect of proper sanatory regulations, there occurred in England and Wales 60,000 deaths and 480,000 cases of sickness; and in London alone 13,850 deaths, and 360,000 cases of sickness. Numbers of children were born only to die from the same cause: in the country, the proportion of children born under the age of five years was 221 in 1000, in towns generally, 385 in 1000; in Bethnal-green, 479 in 1000 He described the filthy condition of houses in Crown-court, Fleet-street, and the offensive emanations generated by such spots; and he referred also to the report procured by the Statistical Society on the state of Church lane, St. Giles's. No wonder that people who lived in such places were anarchists; they ought not to be contented with their position. (Hear, hear.) Here must be easy access for Christian, or any delusion that promised an amendment of their condition. (Hear.)—A petition to the Legislature in conformity with the object of the meeting was then agreed to, and the meeting separated.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—On Wednesday, the twenty-third annual meeting of the supporters of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at the Crosby Hall, Bishopsgate-street, Sir John Bowring in the chair. The report showed that the balance in hand last year was £2.3 3s 8d, and that it was this year £242 2s. 8d. This, however, was subject to deductions, which made a balance of £3 10s 9d. against the Association. Which this was the financial state of the affairs, it was alleged that the association was in a flourishing condition, as the income, which was £631 7s. exceeded the average of the two years preceding years by more than £33, and the annual subscriptions, which were £5.0 13s 6d., exceeded the three preceding years by more than £19. The additional property consisted of a gift of £100, of £7.04 17s. in the Three per Cents Reduced, and of £.890 14s. 5d. in the Three per Cents Consols, and there was also a fund arising from the sale of books, of £466. The report further congratulated the friends of the Association on the progress of Unitarian principles in the provincial towns of England and Scotland, in Ireland and south of France, in Portugal, in Montreal and other parts of Canada, in the East Indies, among the Jews, and in Hungary. The report in reference to the exclusion of members of the Unitarian body from admission in the British and Foreign school Society, the opinion of the Attorney-General had been taken, which was to the effect that the exclusion was illegal, and a violation of the original institution. The reports were agreed to, officers were elected for the ensuing year, and the meeting separated, having passed a vote of thanks to the Alderman. In the evening the members and supporters of the association met to celebrate the occasion, at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street.

ROYAL GENERAL DISPENSARY.—The quarterly court of the supporters of this benevolent institution was held on Wednesday in the board-room of the establishment, Bartholomew-close, Mr. Herring in the chair. The returns presented by the medical officers stated that the number of patients received during the last three months was 6024, of which number 1768 had been cured, 471 relieved, and 98 had died, leaving under treatment 1747. After the reception of the returns the proceedings closed.

FEMALE ORPHAN ASYLUM, LAMBETH.—On Monday last an election of ten candidates took place in this institution, in which 59 children, orphans of British parents, are regularly educated for domestic servants. Many of the daughters of charitable and wealthy and poor persons were present at the polling of the respective protégés. The fact of there being only ten vacancies, and thirty-seven candidates, of which number eight were supernumerated cases, produced more than ordinary anxiety as to the result, a feeling which was increased, as the hour approached for closing the poll. The tenth elected orphan only exceeded by a few votes the ten next of the twenty-seven less successful competitors. One poor little unsuccessful and supernumerated orphan, whose twin and favourite sister is now in the asylum, was led away in extreme distress and heart-broken at her disappointment. This institution, established in 1758, by the late Sir John Fielding, is open for public inspection, and divine service is celebrated in the chapel on Sundays.

INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND, 34 AND 35 DUKE, PI, RED LION SQUARE, BLOOMSBURY.—On Tuesday a meeting of the committee took place, when the application was read at the board-room, in Red Lion square, Bloomsbury. The secretary stated that a bequest of £500 had just been made to the charity by the late Thomas Fuller Beard, Esq. It appeared from the report that there are blind-and-twenty young men learning the trades of shoemaking and tailoring, and seven females learning basket-making and other female occupations of a similar nature; and in each case the pupils were progressing most satisfactorily under the direction of the several officers of the institution. Two of the inmates having left months, been examined by the rector of the parish, and found to be sufficiently instructed in religious and general knowledge, were presented for confirmation, and were accordingly confirmed by the Bishop of London.

ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY.—The June flower show took place, on Wednesday, at the garden of the society, in Regent's park, under a most brilliant sky and we have been favoured with for several days past. The gardens were consequently full, and the various tents crowded during the day with amateurs. The prize flowers were unusually fine. It was said in the gardens that not less than 12,000 persons had, in the course of the day, passed the entrance gates. Three military bands kept up a succession of sweet sounds from different parts the gardens during the day.—In the earlier part of it the Duke of Cambridge paid the show a visit.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &c., FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 10.—The number of births registered during the above week in the metropolitan and suburban districts was 1,671, of which 712 were males, and 959 females. This number [illegible] above week numbered 941 (461 males and 480 females), being two less than the weekly average for the last five springs. The diseases from which the number of deaths the above week most exceeded the average were smallpox (39), average 17; scarlatina (77), average 24; diarrhœa (17), average 9; and typhus (67), average 39.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

From the proceedings in Conciliation Hall on Monday, it will be seen that the preliminaries have all been arranged for the junction of Old and Young Ireland, and the establishment of the new "Irish League." Let it, it is said, many dissentients, chiefly among the old parish priests; but the younger clergy are, almost to a man, in favour of a prompt fraternisation with the Confederates. It is, however, quite beyond the power of Mr. John O'Connell to make the Repeal Association, or to retard the junction with the Young Irelanders. His leadership is entirely at an end.

At two o'clock Mr. Gawley (barrister) took the chair, the body of the hall and the galleries being crowded. He said the question now proposed for the consideration of the people of Ireland was this.—Was it expedient, or was it possible that the division of Ireland into "young" and "old" should cease, and a common basis be adopted, whereon all Irishmen might combine together for the regeneration of their native land? His opinion unequivocally was that it was expedient; and though some difficulties might present themselves in the consideration of the project was feasible. But how were they to construct the new edifice? They must stick to the institution that Daniel O'Connell had bequeathed them (cheers); but following his precepts and example they must modify to suit the exigencies of the country. (Loud cheers.) Who had first started the idea of this union? The Rev. Dr. Miley. To whom did they confide the delicate task of framing the constitution of the new body? To Sir Colman O'Loghlen. He, after whom to state that the constitution so prepared had been accepted by Mr John O'Connell, and his acceptance of it was doubly valuable for this reason, that he would sacrifice his personal predilections upon the altar of his country. (Cheers.) They wished, however, before this constitution was finally adopted, that it should go forth to the country, to receive the sanction and adoption of the Catholic clergy and people of Ireland. (Cheers.) In the meeting might wish to know—when they were combined—what kind of instrument they would use to carry out their intentions. They intended to effect their intentions by the concentration of public opinion. (Cheers.) Another person might exclaim, "Will it not the right of every Irishman to carry arms." (Cheers.) If any honest father of a family seriously asked him the question, for the legitimate and honest purpose of ascertaining his rights, he would at once unequivocally answer—that to carry arms, and use them on a fitting occasion for his defence (Bravo), was a right undoubted and indefeasible, and must not be denied. He would remark, how ever, that all weapons were liable to abuse. He next begged to refer to another topic

A Voice: Say something more about the pikes. (Cheers)

The Chairman: It had often been said that England's danger was Ireland's opportunity, and the hour of England's danger was at hand (Cheers, and cries of "The Sikhs.") He was not one that would gloat over the ruin of England, but still, if driven to it, he would say with Lord Franken, "I would fling British connexion to the winds, and clasp to my heart the independence of my country (Cheers.) He next called attention to the declaration in circulation against repeal, and expressed his regret that amongst those who had signed it was the Rev. Mr Ingram, author of "The Memory of the Dead," beginning with the words, "Who dares to speak of '98?"

Mr. Ray read the following document:—

"PROPOSED TERMS FOR A RE-UNION OF REPEALERS. That it is expedient that a new Repeal organisation be formed, and that the two existing bodies, viz., the Repeal Association and the federalists, be therein united and merged. That the rules of the new organisation shall be as follow:—1. The name of the Association shall be "The Irish League, for the attainment of the legislative independence of Ireland." 2. The object of the Association shall be to obtain the restoration of the legislative independence of Ireland by the union of all Irishmen, and the concentration of public opinion in favour of that measure. 3. The number of members shall be unlimited, and every member and associate of the Repeal Association and Irish Confederation for the year 1848, and every other person who shall subscribe one shilling or upwards to the funds of the Irish League, shall be entitled to be enrolled as a member of the Irish League. The affairs of the Irish League shall be managed by a committee, who shall have power to appoint officers, sub-committees for special purposes, and make bye-laws for the government of the League, not inconsistent with the fundamental rules. 5. The committee shall consist of the members of the committee of the Repeal Association and of the council of the Irish Confederation, and of such other persons as shall be added to it by the aforegoing members of the committee. 6. No member shall be considered bound by any opinion expressed by any other member. 9. That the association shall not interfere in Irish parliamentary dependences of all English parties, and that any member of the Committee carrying, or soliciting signatures to any requisition not adopted to effect a repeal of the Union, shall thereupon be removed from the Committee. 10. That no topics of a sectarian character be introduced; but that is not in any way to be understood to prevent the discussion of any matter which may, in the manner or opinion of any member, affect the country, be considered a grievance against which public opinion should be directed."

Mr Ray also called attention to a circular which is to be transmitted, with the foregoing document, to the Catholic hierarchy and clergy, requesting they would favour the Association with their opinions thereon before Monday, the 26th inst. He then read several communications from Dublin and various parts of the country on the subject of the proposed union of Repealers. Some being in favour of the project, others against it; amongst the latter, Dr Cantwell, the Bishop of Meath.

Mr John O'Connell next addressed the meeting, and proceeded to refer to the new Association. If he had considered that the formation of such new body would be the best thing that could be done for the country, he would have proposed that twelve months since; but he did not. In his opinion, the best thing would be, that the Association, founded by one in whose counsels the people of Ireland had reason to confide, should be maintained, and their friends separated from them should come back to them. He was ready, however, to accept this new body, but he should declare, also, that he had his doubts and fears respecting it. If he saw anything objectionable in the new association, he would tell his sense of the danger of it to the people by leaving the association. (Cries of "Union, union.") He called upon them not to judge him wrongly. The evil he plan would be better than contrary. He would now to his decision. (Cheers.) He had one word more to say that he would say wherever he was, and as long as his voice should be heard. He would tell the people of Ireland that they were not driven to the extremities that some of them would imagine. (Cries of "Union.") He would tell them there was yet hope in peaceful legislation (Cries of "No, no," and "Yes.") He would give them the advice that he whom they once respected and confided in would give them were he spared to be there that day—he would advise them not to listen to the counsels of those who are telling them to arm, but to go on as they have done for peaceful conclusion. He told them that counsel only tended to distract men's minds, and gave advantage to the enemy. (Cries of "No, no.")

A Voice: Speak for them by arms. (Cheers)

Mr. J. O'Connell repeated, that, by calling upon the people to arm, the minds of the country were distracted from that agitation which they could push forward without the sacrifice of a life, and if there was, he should fear them, no resistance he should weep, perhaps, but the tears that were wrung from his soul should be for the sake of that people who would then be rushing into danger from which his father would have saved them if he lived, yet from which his son, through natura feebleness, was unable to rescue them, though he withstood that treacherous to the last. (Cheers.) In conclusion, he proposed that the document which he had read, the Declaration of the Irish Confederation, be adopted by the country to speak out their sentiments, that they might take final and decisive measures.

Mr E. V. O'Mahony, barrister, seconding the motion, addressed the meeting in a "moral-force" speech of some length; but the principles enunciated were received with the manifest satisfaction of the meeting.

The question of the adjournment of the Association was then put from the chair, and passed unanimously.

Mr. A. R. Stritch moved that the fundamental rules of the new association be transmitted to the people, in view of gathering its opinions on them.

The motion having been seconded, was agreed to.

Mr. O'Gorman announced the rent for the week to be £3 10s. 6d.

The Association then adjourned to that day fortnight.

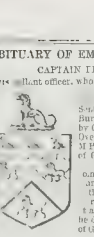
The Anti-Repeal declaration, to some weeks in progress of [illegible], has received many thousand names, including those of peers, gentry, merchants, &c. The Galway Vindicator, a Repeal paper, asserts that Lord Dunsandle, and Sir Thomas Burke, M.P., have refused to sign the document.

STATE PROSECUTIONS.—The preliminary steps taken by the Attorney-General against other members of the Irish Confederation have not been followed up. According to the new act making "advised speaking" felony, the informants must be made within six days after the commission of the offence. That being done, the prosecution can be deferred for an indefinite length of time.

THE CROPS.—The accounts from all parts of the country respecting the kinds of crops, but especially the potato, are most satisfactory. The potato culture is immense, and, ultimately, the whole system is abandoned. It is to be hoped that we will never revive.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

CAPTAIN FREDERICK WILLIAM BURGOYNE, R.N.



THE late Captain Burgoyne, who died at his residence, Plumstead, obtained his commission as lieutenant, 7th March 1797, was made Captain for 24th October, 1840, and became Post Captain 9th September, 1846. He was second son of the late Sir John Burgoyne, seventh Baronet, of Sutton Park, Bedfordshire, by Charlotte, his wife, daughter of General Johnstone, of Overton, and grandson of Sir Roger Burgoyne, Bart., M.P., by the Lady Frances Montagu, his wife, daughter of George Earl of Halifax. The said Sir Roger was cousin of the celebrated Sir Roger de Coverley, and combined the British army in America in 1777, and died subsequently to such reputation as a General. According to ancient records, the family of Burgoyne was settled in Cambridgeshire and Bedfordshire at a very early period. There is an old tradition that they be a Sutton and Pitton under a tyrannical grant from John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster:

"I, John of Gaunt,
Do give and I do grant
To John Burgoyne
And the heirs of his body,
Sutton and Pitton.
Until the world's out."

Captain Burgoyne, whose death we record, married Miss Walls, and had issue. His eldest daughter is the wife of Michael Maxwell, Esq., son of Sir John Maxwell, Bart.

JAMES NOWELL FFARINGTON, ESQ., OF WORDEN, COUNTY OF LANCASTER.

MR. FFARINGTON was the representative of one of the oldest families in England, and the possessor of an extensive estate in Lancashire, of which county he acted as a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant. He has died at an early age, and unmarried, having his sisters his co-heirs. The family from which he descended—the Fairhurstes, of Fairhurst, Fairington, Worden, and Shaw Hall—arose at the time of the Conquest. They resided at Fairington so recently as the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and continued subsequently at Worden. Of the old mansion there a portion still remains, and the ancient earthworks are remarkable for retaining, in fine preservation, the family arms carved on the ends of their projecting beams of oak. Sir Henry Anthony Fairington, Bart., of Blackhurst, represents a younger branch of the Worden family.

SIR JOHN DE VEULL

THIS gentleman, who held for many years the office of Bailiff, or Chief Magistrate, of Jersey, died on the 1st instant, aged forty-nine. The only son of the late John de Veulle, Esq., by his wife, the daughter of Nicholas Messervey, Seigneur of Beaumont Manor, he was admitted an advocate of the Royal Court of Jersey in 1819, elected Jurat in 1827, and appointed Chief Magistrate in 1841, when he received the honour of Knighthood. Sir John was married to Miss Tindal, a [illegible] niece of the late Chief Justice Tindal.

ROBERT BALDWIN, ESQ.

THIS gentleman was the son of Mr Baldwin, of Paternoster-row, and nephew of Mr Charles Baldwin, of the Standard newspaper. Mr. Robert Baldwin, having adopted the profession of the law, practised for some time as a special pleader, and was called to the bar the 9th November, 1840, by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple, where he attached himself to the Home Circuit. Mr Baldwin was latterly getting into business, and was much esteemed. His agreeable, instructive, and amiable manners rendered him a general favourite. The gentleman died almost suddenly, of an affection of the heart, in his 36th year.

ALTERATIONS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

FOR nearly twelve months the choir and a portion of the nave of Westminster Abbey have been shrouded from the gaze of the sightseer by an unsightly, rude hoarding; and though divine service has been performed in the Abbey, it has not been carried on in its orthodox place, nor with its accustomed magnificence of effect. The hoarding within the rough enclosure before mentioned, and, like the choir, destined to undergo a complete clean. Recently the hoarding has been removed, and, as our large illustration shows, a wondrous alteration has been effected in the appearance of the choir and transepts. The tasteless screen which formerly disfigured the glorious Abbey, and hid from the view of the transepts, has been removed, and the floor of the choir, which was formerly raised above the level of that in the nave, transepts, ambulatory, &c., has been lowered and brought to their level, and, consequently, great additional majesty is given to the appearance of the choir and to the ascent to the altar. The space between the great pillars supporting the tower being freed from the screen, an uninterrupted view is obtained from north to south, and the effect is peculiarly beautiful. The screen is removed on either hand of the choir, from the eastward towards to the organ screen, and on the choir are the seats for the Dean and Sub-Dean. On these stalls, &c., we shall presently speak. The organ, which rose from the centre of the screen, has been divided into three portions, the choir organ forming, as it were, a small screen at the west entrance to the choir, whilst the great organ and swell, separately, two other organs in arches at the sides of the choir; thus, there being no lofty object like the former organ, to intercept the view of the whole of the great west window is seen, forming a fine foreground to the magnificent perspective of the arched roof of the nave and choir, and the great height of the building, nearly 160 feet, is seen to a much greater advantage than heretofore.

During the progress of the works many and loud were the complaints respecting the intended alterations, some being looked on as innovations on old-established customs, and others objected to without knowing the effect which would be produced; but, most certainly the proportions and character of the building are wonderfully enhanced by the judicious improvements above noted, and, in addition to these, some of the dark stained glass has been put into the south transept windows, and softened the glare of light which formerly streamed through their unadorned [illegible].

The new arrangements for the convenience of the crowds of people usually attending divine service, consist of additional seats contained under the north and south transepts, and the rearrangement of the pews and seats in the choir, and by these plans 1060 more sittings have been obtained than it was possible to gain by the former miserable and contrived mode.

Having thus briefly indicated the various alterations made in the choir, we must detail them a little more fully, and will therefore commence by describing the NEW STALLS, made of oak, which first arrest the eye, as much by their character and effect as by their novelty with the hallowed precincts. As we before remarked, the stalls are ranged on either side of the choir, westwards from the great pillars which support the central tower, and there are twenty-three on either side; and at the sides of the western doorway into the choir are six more seats, exclusive of those for the Dean and Sub-Dean, which latter are of the same order as the stalls, and treated analogously even to the canopies.

The stalls are separated from each other by [illegible] terminations, demi-angels, whence spring [illegible] and buttresses support the richly wrought canopies above. Each canopy is [illegible] high-pitched gable, filled with tracery of varied design, gives character to each. The cables are decorated with crockets, and terminated by elaborate finials. The backs of the stalls are panelled, and on them the heading of the canopies there are arches filled with tracery, in rich Sconder pinnacles rise from the buttresses between the canopies. The [illegible] and finials are of [illegible] foliage.

"ALEXANDER AND DIOGENES."—PAINTED BY [illegible], R.A.—(FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.)

"ALEXANDER AND DIOGENES."

We have the gratification of presenting our readers with an Engraving of Mr Edwin Landseer's deservedly popular picture in the present Exhibition of the Royal Academy. It is a companion to the well-known picture by the same artist entitled "Laying Down the Law." The scene of the present picture, and many such could be easily suggested, is surrounded with antique magnificence. The story is as follows:—"One day Alexander visited Diogenes, and condescendingly asked what he could do for him. 'Stand a little on one side then,' said Diogenes, 'you prevent me from feeling the sun.' The courtiers with Alexander expressed their indignation that he so much honoured that old dog Diogenes. Alexander, perceiving their humour, turned to them, and said, 'If I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes.'" The eyes of Diogenes sparkle with vivacity and wit. The courtiers are admirable.

FAILURE OF THE CHARTIST DEMONSTRATIONS.

On Monday last, and previous days, we [illegible] to prevent meetings which were expected to be [illegible] parts of the Metropolis, [illegible] and [illegible] Monday [illegible] array, but the apprehended Chartist demonstrations did not take place. No symptom of disturbance showed itself in any part of the town, although it was Whit-Monday. The following localities are noticed as the points at which the demonstrations were to have been particularly made:

Bishop Bonner's Fields.—From an early hour the people of this neighbourhood [illegible] their accustomed avocations, [illegible] the supposed movement, by unanimously closing their respective houses of business. By an almost spontaneous common consent even the public-houses in the vicinity were closed, and upon some of them announcements were made in rude characters, inscribed in chalk, that the proprietors did not intend to open. In fact, the utmost consternation prevailed in the neighbourhood, and loud and deep were the execrations poured forth by the small shopkeepers and tradesmen in consequence of this futile and unwarrranted interference with their ordinary trade and traffic. Soon after ten o'clock a number of idle boys, some few adults, and, as usual, a sprinkling of women, ...rolled on the arena; but this concourse, never exceeding in number 300 to 400, retired on the appearance of a squadron of the Life Guards, who subsequently took up their temporary quarters in Go dsmer's Barn, in the Grove-road, ready to act, should any emergency calling for their reappearance arise. They were soon followed by a force of 50 mounted police, who acted not as mere carriers of the magistrates to the new church dotted to St. James-the-Less, which formed the object of attack on a former assemblage. This force consisted of the southern side of the ground, while other parts of the field were held by the whole of the disposable force of the 4th division of the me...

...850 men; of the N division, 400 men, under Superintendent J. Mackay; of the M division, 200, under Mr. Superintendent Lyons, and of the H Division 150 men, under Mr. Superintendent Medlicot. The whole civil force on duty were under the command of Captain Hay, the assistant police commissioner. The following police magistrates were present:—Mr Secker of the Southwark Police Court; Mr Arnold, of Worship street, and the Hon. G. C. Norton, of the Lambeth Police Court. Soon after eleven o'clock, about 400 of the mixed battalion of the Chelsea pensioners marched on the ground with their ... and in full marching order and they occupied as a temporary ... ...tinal recreation work was. All remained tranquil, and the ... ...ing allotted space for the idle stragglers, attracted by the spot ... more by the police and the military display than from any political feeling. Shortly before two o'clock some of the leaders in the Chartist movement came on to the ground and as many as he supposed, were astounded by the formidable display of physical force ready for their reception. A colloquy ensued between Dr. M'Donall and the Hon. Col. Jones, in which the Doctor M'Donal, addressed one of the magistrates of the K division, inquired if the meeting would be allowed to be held. The officer replied that it would not. Dr M'Donall then said he must see a magistrate or one of the principals of the force. On his way he met Mr. Superintendent Johnson, of the R division, and that gentleman assured him that every means would be taken to disperse the meeting—Dr M'Donall thanked him for the information, and said, "Then we must see about it." He then sent a message to Mr. Arnold, the police magistrate, and received the same positive answer. Dr M'Donall and his friends then departed with a mob of boys and others after them, and the assembled crowd, they had abandoned the idea of holding the demonstration. Three o'clock, the hour announced for the meeting, had already elapsed, and no appearance of the promised demonstration existed itself. Fortunately for the peace of London, no thunderstorm, with heavy rain, served to do more by a clearance of the arena than even the strong police and military force could have effected.

SYDENHAM GREEN.—The pre parations for the Whitsun fair went on as usual. When these were completed, there was an influx of holiday-makers, about as great as is usually seen on a wet Whit Monday; but there was nothing of the Chartists.

ISLINGTON GREEN was perfectly tranquil throughout the day.

CLERKENWELL-GREEN At the place extensive precautions were made by the authorities for the preservation of order. Early this day of assemblage, 1,000 mounted police force (upwards of 800 in number), and three troops of the Life Guards were stationed in the ... their services could be made available at a minute's notice. No meeting, however, was held, nor did any occurrence requiring the intervention of even a single policeman take place during the day. Shortly after eleven o'clock a troop of the Life Guards marched on the ground, where they remained for about an hour. As it was obvious that their presence was then unnecessary, and had the effect of collecting a group of starers, composed principally of women and children, they returned to their quarters, and did not make their appearance again during the day.

CUMBERLAND MARKET This place was appointed by the Chartists as one of the spots on which a demonstration in favour of the People's Charter was to have taken place, and the necessary precautions were accordingly adopted by the authorities At half-past two o'clock, the appointed hour for the meeting to be held, there were not half-a-dozen people on the spot, nor was attempt at assemblage or a meeting of any kind throughout the day.

HIGHGATE. It was reported in the afternoon that a large body of Chartists had taken up a commanding position in this parochial hamlet, and, consequently, that the local authorities had sent off an express for the aid of the military for their dislodgement. On inquiry, however, it was found that the only commotion was that of the elements, the thunder and lightning, which prevailed during, descending in torrents. It is perfectly true that there were armed men observable on the ground at intervals—these men, policemen, they accounted for the possession of these formidable weapons by stating that they were haymakers.

BLACKHEATH.—Up to three o'clock it was expected that a gathering of the Chartists would take place at Blackheath. In the earlier part of the day, however, no appearance of any political assemblage took place, nor before three did ... such a meeting appear upon the spacious sward. Sundry flies passed the Green Man Inn shortly before the hour of three, in the direction of Lewisham, but just about that time the rain began to fall, and if any demonstration was intended it is quite certain that up to nightfall no meeting took place. Others connected with the Military of Woolwich remained on the ground, but happily their services were not required. All the men in the Arsenal and at the dockyard were under arms, fully prepared to meet the exigency of any outbreak.

During the night a considerable portion of the forces mentioned above were retained in the several localities in which they were stationed, ready at a moment's warning to pounce upon the disturbers if they presented themselves.

CHARTISM IN THE PROVINCES.

YORKSHIRE On Monday the Chartists of Leeds, Bradford, and the adjacent towns and villages had fixed upon that day for their grand "peaceful fighting demonstration" in favour of "Liberty, equality, and fraternity," on Tottshawmoor, about eight miles from Leeds and four miles from Bradford. The placards announcing the meeting stated that the meeting would be addressed by Ernest Jones, Esq., of London, and others. The day was fine, and the attendance was proportionably large: but the numbers did not at any time exceed 15,000. Shortly after ten o'clock the people began to assemble on the ground, with music and tricolored and green flags, Mr. Lumpligh Wickham and Mr. John Rand, two of the magistrates, rode upon the ground, and Mr. Wickham announced that he had been requested by the committee of the meeting that ... would undertake not to leave the ground in procession with flags and ..., their proceedings would not be disturbed or interrupted; but that it would be the duty of the magistrates present to see that no violence was interrupted by these means. A person on the hustings promised that these conditions should be observed, upon which the magistrates expressed themselves satisfied, and left the ground. The promise given by the committee was so far observed that within a very few minutes all the flags in front of the hustings were furled and removed to the rear or elsewhere; but the four tricolor flags which floated from the four corners of the substantial platform that had been erected for the speakers were suffered to remain. Two or three persons were selected, duallies, to convey the information to the neighbouring towns. The oratorical part of the proceedings commenced by Mr. J. Harris, of Leeds, being called to the chair, and addressing the persons present. Other speakers followed, and all concurred in the admiration of the Charter, and their determination not to cease agitation until it became the law of the land.

MANCHESTER —All was quiet here throughout Monday, the Chartists having countermanded their open air-meeting by placard, and substituted an in-door meeting at the Hall of Science in its place The military, as well as police, however, was in position at the places assigned to them by six o'clock in the evening.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Chartists had an open-air meeting at Birmingham on Sat. day afternoon There were not, however, more than 600 present. A man named Nesbitt presided The assemblage was addressed by Mr. Kydd, from Glasgow, by G. Mantle, a "physical force man," and others. The speeches of these two persons were violent to the extreme. A Government reporter was present. The meeting dispersed quietly shortly after five o'clock. There was a large civil and military force close at hand, ready, if necessary, for action at a moment's notice.

BRISTOL. The threatened demonstration of the Chartists here on Whit-Monday did not take place. The men of "physical force" were "nowhere" during the day.

RECLAMATION OF WASTE LAND According to the best authorities there are no less than 14,760,000 acres of waste land in the United Kingdom, which statists have thus apportioned:—

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| In England | | 3,154,000 acres |
| In Wales | | ...,000 " |
| In Scotland | | 6,000,000 " |
| In Ireland | | 4,000,000 " |
| In the British Islands | | 166,000 " |
| Total | | 14,760,000 acres |

Assuming that one-fourth of this quantity might, when reclaimed, be brought into annual wheat culture, we have 3,690,000 acres so disposable, which, even in the present inefficient system of husbandry, would produce at thirty bushels per acre, 13,781,250 quarters of bread corn, a supply equal to the necessities of two-thirds of the entire population of Great Britain.—Fleming's Policy of a National System of Agricultural Statistics.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

Mdlle. Jenny Lind, since our last publication, has appeared in three characters—Adina, Lucia, and Amina, on Saturday, Tuesday, and Thursday, her attraction in this last having been greatly increased by the substitution of a new "cabaletta," being quite sufficient for the present, to render unnecessary an immediate début in a new part. Anna Bolena, and Norma in Rossini's "Gazza Ladra," are to be her next essays. In the two second-named characters Mdlle. Jenny Lind should accept the engagements offered to her at the Norwich and Worcester Festivals this year, amateurs may have the opportunity of hearing her sing in Handel's "Messiah" and in Haydn's "Creation," in both which she has gained such glory in Germany.

Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" will be the next opera for Madame Tadolini, who will have the advantage of Lablache's support in one of his inimitable comic assumptions.

One of those charming divertissements, which M Perrot alone appears capable of arranging, in which some effective allegorical subject is made the vehicle for the united display of the most celebrated terpsichorean artistes, was produced with immense success on Tuesday evening. It is called "Les Quatre Saisons," and is, in our thinking, the most effective of its class, looking upon the "Pas de Quatre," the "Pas des Déesses," and "Les Elémens" as the others, and this is no mean praise. Carlotta Grisi is the representative of Spring; Cerito the first assists Summer; Rosati, Autumn; and Marie Taglioni, Winter; and these fair seasons have each a beautiful train of attendants in symbolical costumes. The effects of the combination of colours produced by these corps-de-ballet constantly changing their positions about the stage, form the most charming tableaux than can be conceived. Of course each of the leading danseuses had a single pas; and when these are concluded they assemble in a general display, bounding, spinning, and all but flying about the stage, with most admirable grace and spirit.

The applause of the very crowded audience was most enthusiastic; and at the conclusion of the performance M. Perrot received a well earned compliment by being called on the stage, together with the four ladies, amidst an increased storm of approbation.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

One of the most brilliant houses of the season signalized the performance of Rosini's "Donna del Lago" on Saturday last. ... Mdlle. Vestris ... the opera of "Clemente Monteoel," as Romeo. A greater success than that of Madame Viardot is not on record; it was the triumph of mind over matter—was what the Germans ... ... ... provided by the composer.

Bellini has written an overture, but, even with Costa's hand, no effect could be produced The introduction—a chorus of Capulet partizans—the air of Tebaldo "E serbata," in twelve eight time, and its cabaletta, "L' ama," were of no interest. The aria d'entrata of Romeo, who comes as ambassador for the Montagues to propose a cessation of the feuds between Guelphs and Ghibellines, nobly declaimed by Viardot, had no musical merit; and only her fine energy in the cabaletta, "La tremenda ultrice spada," ensured her the honour of a recal. The opening romanza of Giulietta, with its harp accompaniment, nicely sung by Mdme Castellan, is an unmeaning air. The duo between Romeo and Giulietta, "Si fugarre," is in three movements—the unmeaning allegro, with an andante in the middle; in which a cadenza, composed by Viardot, was so exquisitely sung by the two artistes as to command an instantaneous encore, and their abandon in the last allegro overtun. The chorus, "Lieta notte," was remarkable for an elegant under-current of instrumentation, descriptive of the Capulet fete. The finale of this act, in which Romeo is discovered with Juliet, having been introduced through the friendly agency of Frate Lorenzo into the palace, is the best writing in the first act. The quintette, sung by Viardot, Castellan, Mei, Polonini, and Marini, contained some rich harmonies; and the working up of the mingled passions of the contending parties, and the despair of the lovers, was ingenious and spirited. Viardot came out with electrical force, and the call before the curtain was unanimous. The second act, after a scena, brilliantly executed by Mdme Castellan, in which Adelaide sows the sleeping potion administered by the Friar, terminated with a duo between Romeo and the fiery Tybalt It opens with a delicious clarionet obligato, so beautifully interpreted by Lazarus as to provoke a round of applause as the rival suitors to Juliet's hand are about to fight the organ's peal is heard, and through a latticed gallery a femme. procession is seen to pass. This had a beautiful effect—the death of Juliet is thus made known to Romeo. Viardot's acting was superb. Her rush from window to window to catch a glimpse of the corteige, and then sinking on the ground overwhelmed with despair, were noble conceptions.

The third act, by Vaccaj, has some strong points, and is altogether of a more elevated character than Bellini's version. The scene is the Tomb of the Capulets, affording Grieve an opportunity for scenic display, which, as usual, he has turned to the best account. After a weak chorus of mourners over the vault enclosing Juliet's remains, Romeo comes in with his attendants to open the tomb and then to expire on her grave. The acting and singing of Viardot throughout this scene can only find words characteristic of it was unique. Never did the accents of intense grief, of utter desolation, of deep unmitigated despair, receive a more eloquent interpreter The scena was followed by a duo, which, although not a work

LITERATURE.

HAROLD, THE LAST OF THE SAXON KINGS. By the Author of "Richelieu," "The Last of the Barons," &c. 3 vols. Bentley.

In a dedicatory epistle to his friend, the Right Hon. C. T. D'Eyncourt, M.P., the author of this work explains it to be the result of a long-cherished idea of founding an historical romance on "the Norman Conquest"—the Trojan War of an epoch beyond which our learning seldom induces or imagination to ascend. With the characters, events, and physiognomy of the period before the Conquest Sir E. L. Bulwer felt—as all real story-tellers do—that he could find the chosen of the best means of edification for the task lay the main consideration: whether to treat the subject merely as a romance, or to supply the reader with the requisite research as he proceeded, and thus fairly and truly carry him with the author, into the real records of the time. Sir Bulwer Lytton, fortified by Mr. D'Eyncourt's encouragement, has chosen the latter method; and, sealing himself in his fine old Gothic chamber, amid majestic folios, giants of the semi-world, he has produced a work of three lofty volumes, extending through some 1,100 pages. Still, the interest is a very attractive one; and we are pleased to learn that if this tale meet with the same indulgent favour as "The Last of the Barons," the author may venture further into the wide fields and "Harold" may be the first of a series of fictitious sets, or illustrating our earlier history, though its romance may be rendered no unprofitable accompaniment to the history itself.

The structure of the great contention of the period has been the author's great aim: "It allow more clearly the motives and policy of the agents in an event the most memorable in Europe; and to convey a definite, if general, notion of the human beings, on no brass scale, and whose hearts beat high in that realm of shadow which lies behind the Norman Conquest." Hence, the author has been led to the leading historical incidents in the grand romance of Harold, the fictitious part of the narrative coming chiefly in the shape of domestic life, "with its domain of incident and passion, which is the legitimate appanage of novelist or poet."

The superstitions of the age are made to assist the machinery of the tale; as it is by the introduction of the Danish Vala, in a mystical persona called Hilda, who, though not in history, shows "what large, if dim, remains of a second 'heathenesse' still kept their ground in the Saxon Christian Abbey" and contrasting the monkish superstitions by which they were ultimately replaced." The patriot Harold, and the fierce and plotting William, are, of course, the heroes of the story. Then we have Hilda, "the fairy queen of," Edith, betrothed to Harold, but eventually set aside for another; the patient Edward the Confessor; with hard Godwin, Tostig, and a host of others, who figure on the canvas of history.

The story opens on the 2nd of May, 1042, when many a mead lay fair and green beyond the village of Charing; and behind the Isle of Thorney (amidst the rushes and briars of which were then raised the foundations of the Hall and Abbey of Westminster), many a wood lay dark in the starlight, along the slopes rising above the dark Strand, with its numerous canals or dykes; and on either side of the great road into Kent. flutes and horns sounded far and near through the green places, and laughter and song, and the cracking of break ng boughs The first incident is at the house of Hilda, an old Roman villa converted into a Saxon home, where are seated

HILDA AND EDITH.

"The appellances of the chamber showed the rank and wealth of the owner. At that period the domestic luxury of the rich was infinitely greater than has been generally supposed. The industry of the women decorated the walls of the interiors with needlework and hangings: and as a Thegn forfeited his rank if he lost his lands, so the higher orders of an aristocracy rather of wealth than birth and, usually, a certain portion of superfluous riches, which served for a dowry to wards the luxuries of the East, and the nearer markets of Flanders and Saracenic Spain.

"In this room the walls were draped with silken hangings richly embroidered On a beauti were ranged horns tipped with silver, and a few vessels of pure gold. A small circular table in the centre was supported by symbolical monsters one half carved. At one side of the wall, on a long bench, a half-dozen bad hounds were employed in sp aining, remote from them, and near the w dow, a woman advanced in years, and of a mien and aspect singularly imposing. Upon a small tripod before her was a flame manuscript, over which she st ed attentively, with a silver graphium, or pen. At her feet reclined a girl scarcely about the age of sixteen, her long fair hair parted across her forehead, and flowing down her shoulders. Her dress was a linen cotehardie, with long sleeves, reaching to the throat, and, without one of the modern artificial restraints of a shape, the simple belt sufficed to show the slender proportions and delicate outline of the wearer. The colour of the dress was a pale but pure white, but its hems, borders, were richly embroidered. This girl's beauty was somewhat marvellous. In a land proverbial for fair women, it had already obtained for the name of "the fair" In that country were beautiful women without a struggle or a mystery, the two expressions seldom united. In one combinations, the soft and noble; indeed, in the whole aspect there was the evidence of some internal struggle; the mute appearance was not yet complete; the soul and heart were not yet united: and with the Christian maid dwelt in the home of Hilda the heathen prophetess. The girl's blue eyes, rendered dark by the shade of their long lashes, were fixed intently upon the stern and troubled countenance which was bent upon her own, but back with that abstract gaze which shows that the soul is absent from the sight So is Hilda, and so reclined her grandchild Edith."

Whilst Edith and Hilda are in conversation, there arrives Edward the Confessor and another, on a visit to the English Court. Thus was

WILLIAM, COUNT OF NORMANDY.

"Edith rose instinctively raised her eyes, and, once said upon the knight, they seemed attracted by a spell. The vest, of a crimson hue, was open in front, and beneath which, beside the snowy garb of the Confessor, was edged by a deep band of embroidered gold; leaving perfectly bare his full throat—firm and full as a column of marble—and even the muscles which the warm cloak of purple left developed in all its breadth a breast that seemed made to stay the march of an army; and on the left arm, curved to support the falcon, the vast muscles knotted, and swelled, through the close sleeve. In height he was really but little above the stature of many of those present; nevertheless, as did his port, his air, the nobility of his large proportions, fill the eye, that he seemed to tower immeasurably above the rest. His countenance was yet more remarkable than his form; still in the prime of youth, he seemed at the first glance younger, at the second older, than he was. At the first glance younger, for his face was perfectly shaven, without even the moustache which the Saxon courtier, in imitating the Norman, still cherished to surrender, and the smooth visage and bare throat suffered in themselves to give the air of youth to that dom nant and imperious presence. Its small scal-cap left uncovered all his forehead, shaded with short, crisp hair, uncurled, but black and glossy as the wings of a raven. It was on that forehead that nature had set its trace. It was knit into a frown over the eyebrows; lines deep as furrows crossed its broad, but not elevated expanse. That habit of command and the habit of stern command; those furrows spoke of deep thought and long meditation; one who betrayed but temper and circumstance; the other, more noble, spoke of the character and the life itself. The face was square, and the regard high-like, the mouth small, and even beautiful in outline, had a sinister expression in its exceeding firmness. And if a face was solid, as if bound in iron, showed constant, ruthless decision, held will, such a jaw as belongs to the tiger among beasts, and the conqueror amongst men, such as it is seen in the effigies of Cæsar, of Cortes, of Napoleon; the sentence was well calculated to command the admiration of women not less than the awe of men. But no admiration mingled with the terror that seized the girl as she gazed long and wistful into the knight's face, when he turned and spent on the pair and held her mute and frozen. Never was that face forgotten; often in after-life it haunted her in the noonday, it frowned upon her dreams."

In this volume, the first, we have a portrait of Harold; a graphic picture of Westminster, Church Williams's lack to gathering wood; a scene in the palace, a d. bas interview with William; of his marriage with Matilda, the Maid of Flanders, as La fame had told, a sketch of the Witanagemot; and a few incidents, which it is difficult to detail, and complete within the narrow space. There are, likewise, some picturesque views of ancient London, sketched as King Edward and Duke William rode from Southwark, by the old bridge, to the village of Charing and the Isle of Thorney.

The second volume opens with Harold at Dunwich, the capital of his earldom, but now was lowed up by the sea—a noble element in the Saxon Godwin's hand King Edward's keeping count at Windsore (Windsor), with Godwin and his sons; and no subject of England, since the race of Cerdic sat upon the throne, ever enter d this or any ard at Windsor with such train and such state. And, as if by a vision, there rose distinct in her memory, a stern brow, a form of power and terror—the frow and the form of him who but once again in her waking life the Prophetess had told her she should be bold. The vision passed away in the warm glow of those protecting arms; and looking up into Harold's face, she there beheld the mighty Unbeginning that shed itself at once into her own soul.

And when, at length, lords and bridegroom are one, O stars, may the one be with what you are, having have exhausted its worldly may no danger molest, and no malice disturb, but over the marriage bed shine on peace, O ye stars!"

"Up rose the moon. Many nightingales called its mate from the breathless boughs, and so still and dark it was, were betrothed by the grave of the son of Cerdic. And from the line of Cerdic had come, since Egbert, all the Saxon Kings who with sword and with scepter had reigned over Saxon England."

COTTAGES FOR AGRICULTURAL DISTRICTS.

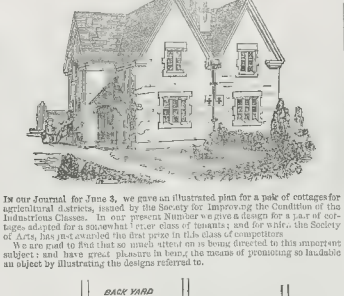
In our Journal for June 3, we gave an illustrated plan for a pair of cottages for agricultural districts, issued by the Society for Improving the Condition of the Industrious Classes. In our present Number we give a design for a pair of cottages, adapted for a somewhat richer class of tenants; and for which, the Society of Arts, has just awarded the first prize in this class of competitors.

We are glad to find that so much interest is being directed to this important subject: and have great pleasure in being the means of promoting so laudable an object by illustrating the designs referred to.



It will be seen, on reference to the accompanying plan, that this design provides upon the ground story an entrance-lobby, a living-room, a scullery fitted and with every requisite for cooking, a larder, and a coal-place under the stairs; and, in the upper story, there are three bed-rooms, two of which have fire-places. It is proposed that the ... portioned from off the stairs. The pigstye, dust-place, and other conveniences, are intended to be erected at a suitable distance from the house, this being considered preferable to their forming any part of the main structure.

The walls throughout are proposed to be built of brick, and the roof covered with plain Staffordshire tiles. The eaves and gable cornices are intended to be executed in rough-cast brick-work, the ... being covered with ... to form a neat and substantial finish to the roof. The window and ... openings are to be in stone; one compartment in each window to have a casement and frame of cast zinc, and the glass to be fixed in rebates, cut in the stonework and pointed with cement. The sashes are intended to be formed of 3-inch deal Yorkshire stone treads and risers, built into the walls as they are carried up. The fenders of the floors being exposed to view are to be planed and chamfered, and these, with the roof of the woodwork, are to be stained, and afterwards coated with, boiled oil, and varnish. It will be evident, that, according to this mode of construction, an unusual degree of durability would be effected, and which, as regards the exterior, it would not require the aid of paint to maintain. Considerable attention has been given to the mode of warming and ventilating, and the plan suggested is at once simple and economical; the arrangement which is proposed for the latter being available in a great measure for the former.

It will be seen on reference to the section, that the floor of the scullery is two steps lower than the floor of the living-room, which will allow of the circulation of hot water from the boiler of the scullery to a coil of pipes ... in the floor of the living-room; and this coil is pro osed to be fixed in a recess or chamber formed by the side of the fire place. Into this chamber fresh air is admitted by a flue built in the external wall, and entering from the chamber underneath the floor; the external aperture being about seven feet above the ground, as shown in the elevation: the orifice of the same to be covered with perforated cast copper.

A constant supply of fresh warm air would, by this means, be admitted into the living-room, through the register in front of the fire air chamber. As a means of egress for the foul air, a separate flue is provided, the aperture of which would be constantly underneath the ceiling, and would be supplied with one of Dr. Arnott's valves: thus a perfect ... that on will, not only be obtained, but a means of warmth provided, which, excepting in very severe weather, when the fire place can be used, would be quite sufficient for every purpose. Flues may be so arranged, that the principle of ventilation may be extended to the bedrooms: for this last remaining in the pipes at night would be sufficient; but, in all cases, a ventilator should be fixed in the ceiling of each bed-room, to allow of the foul air passing away through the roof. In the scullery a flue is also provided for the escape of the steam, &c.; these flues being carried up between the others, and terminating with gabled slate coverings, between the open interstices of the chimney-shaft.

LIVING ROOM.

As it is intended that all the cooking and work of the house should be done in the scullery, the ... place is, therefore, required to be fitted up with ... requisites for that purpose. Besides the ... boiler, which, with the ... flue ... and ... &c., there is a copper and a cooking range. The latter is intended to be fitted up with a large ... oven, and a grate with fall-down flap. Provision should be made in the side of the fire-place to shut off the water from the hot air chamber when required. The supply of water to the ... would, of course, depend upon the ... a soft-water ... should ... vided underneath the larder. Under any circumstances a ... sary, and this is intended to be so constructed ... rates conveniently filled, and at the ...

We have not space to illustrate or ... planed by drawings, naming what ... effective, needs no ... and scrupulous ... same, and that they will be duly ... &c.

The author of this design is Mr. T. C. Hine, of Nottingham. The second prize given by the Society of Arts in this competition was presented to Mr J. ... Mitchell, of London.

No less than 51 designs were submitted to the society in the above competition.

Both Cottages are alike in plan; thus, it has been only necessary to give one ground story and a chamber story. A perspective view of the pair of Cottages heads the article, and lastly, is the Living Room, the fittings of which are of a superior description.

THE REFORM MOVEMENT.

WESTMINSTER.—On Monday a meeting of the parishioners of St. Anne's Soho, was held in the vestry-room, to ascertain the sentiments of the inhabitants with regard to the resolution of Lord John Russell, that the people of this country do not require any further Parliamentary reform; and whether, in fact, their opinions were not in opposition to that declaration. But few members for Westminster were present. Mr Child, the senior churchwarden, occupied the chair. The following resolutions, on which a petition to Parliament was founded, were agreed to: That Lord John Russell's assertion that the people of England do not require any further reform in the House of Commons, is wholly opposed to truth, and evidence of his ignorance of the present state of the country. That it is the opinion of this meeting, in order to ensure the stability of the institutions of the country, and maintain public tranquillity, it is necessary: 1. That the elective franchise shall be extended as to include all householders: 2. That the votes shall be taken by ballot: 3. That the duration of Parliament shall not exceed three years: 4. That the apportionment of members to the population shall be made more equal.

During the week meetings have been held in various parts of the country for the purpose of petitioning the House of Commons in favour of Mr. Hume's motion for a revision of taxation and a reduction in the expenditure of public money; viz. at Hereford, Preston, Falmouth, Doncaster, Aylesbury, Truro, Brighton, Cambridge, Canterbury, Leeds, &c., &c.

The Bishop of London will consecrate the new burial-ground at Isleworth, on Wednesday, June 21.

Count Ezekoff and suite embarked, on Tuesday evening, on board the General Steam Navigation Company's mail steam-ship Caledonia for Hamburgh.

Numerous and very large excursion-trains from various parts of the country, particularly the Midland districts, have brought up vast numbers of persons to the metropolis during the Whitsun holidays

No. II. THE CROSSING-SWEEPER.

BY THOMAS MILLER

THE Crossing-Sweeper cannot fairly be classed amongst our bare-faced beggars, for he really does something for his livelihood, little although it ... and little he knows about his broom stump far more respectable in our eyes than that clumsy blind, a box of lucifers. Neither is he, generally speaking, a very persevering supplicant; indeed, there is often such a mixture of jest and earnest in the expression of his countenance, that you throw him "a copper" for the fun of the thing, believing fully that he never expected it. No doubt he has a way of making up his book; of taking so many against the field, that, a thousand pass him in a given number of minutes, he can make sure of winning, so far as the odds of 999 go to one. Beside these chances he has his regular patrons, gentlemen who, when they have no halfpence, recognise him by a nod, and say, "All right: I have not forgotten you this time;" which calls forth a low bow as the vapour from the pump. Then he has another appeal, which is irresistible, and that is, the instant he sees a benevolent-looking gentleman approaching, of commencing sweeping all the way before him, with short, quick, rapid strokes, always contriving to keep about a yard ahead; and, having finished, he makes his patron bend, as much as to say, "Can you resist that?" Should the gentleman put his hand in his pocket and only pull out his handkerchief, the Crossing-Sweeper is, of course, greatly disappointed. Then there are a class of well-dressed "Gents," to whom he never deigns to take off his hat. He knows them well—they pick out the cleanest spots, but never pay. Should any remark be made about them by the neighbouring waterman, he either sticks out his thumb, or, placing his hand aside his mouth, gives spiteful utterance to the word "Snobs!" He hates to see the road mended: a load of granite is a fee, for a few days, to his delicate ruin; he cannot sweep it, it is so loose; and no one will walk over it who can find another path. All he can do is to fit the stones together as soon as he can; and they require a great deal of cooking to make them lie lovingly together. A dry, fine day is sneaker nuisance: he is at his post if wanted—if it does not rain it is no fault of his. But he likes wet weather uncommonly, for he seems to have a claim upon us then. For our part, when we are short of halfpence, we often tramp baldly through the unswept mud at such a season; and, as old Pepys would have said, "this amuses him mightily."

After all, we fear a great many of the Crossing-Sweepers are sad impostors; we always suspect those who either wear old soldiers' jackets, or plant themselves on Sundays facing the entrances of chapels. The latter, if interrogated, have mostly got old mothers laid in with typhus fever, or wives who have not been out of bed for no end of days: the one prays upon the lovers of peace, the other sticks close to practical piety; for who, after a good sermon on charity, can keep their hands out of their pockets? Your church or chapel Crossing-Sweeper has endless short litany prayers cut and dried, which seem admirably to suit all his customers; then he is so kind to poor old women and little children, handing them across gratis, and sending them home with no end of blessings, wishing within himself all the while (when the neighbouring public-house is open) that the clergyman would have a little consideration and cut his sermon shorter; for your bearer of the broom is always a thirsty subject. Still they are among the least of a l necessary evils. They call a studious man suddenly to himself; and we know not how many times during the course of our lives we might have been run over had not the sweeper, during a pause, while we searched for the wandering halfpenny. They are life-preservers on a small scale, and touch you as gently as if they loved you, when they see danger near; especially if you are ... ing for the needful. Then there is something in that bending of the body, and raising of the eyes, and looking up, as it were, underneath you, which seems to say "Mistake me not, I am but a deity of dirt—a monarch who rules over mud—a sovereign of soles and upper-leathers; and although this is my daily walk and ancient neighbourhood, yet I levy no taxes when my subjects are unwilling to pay." They are also influential men in their way; for let them once carry a crossing absent (at an angle of forty-five), and woe be to the shopkeeper whose door they have shunned—respectable customers seldom walk wilfully into the mud. We know a fishmonger who was ruined through refusing to pay a Crossing-Sweeper. The broom-bearer carried his fine ashant, into an opposition shop, and, as he said, "swept him clean out." Cheap omnibusses and an improved sewerage will eventually make it bad for the Street-Sweepers. Southwood Smith will come upon them like the "sweet south" breathing, &c., and then London will lose another of its old picturesque characters, and the Crossing-Sweeper be numbered amongst the lamplighters, the gas extinguished "with excessive light." We shall then have to go on to look to our steps or rescue us from the jaws of Sunday News-boys; the purpose of London will have ... and the old prophecy be fulfilled, which foretold that the day would come when "A peak of dirt will be worth a King's ransom."

BERMUDA.—THE CONVICT ESTABLISHMENT.

THE conviction and consequent transportation of John Mitchell to the Islands of Bermuda has invested them with ... great. Many of our readers are, perhaps, not aware that for twenty-eight years these Islands have been a ... penal colony

The Bermudas are a ... cluster of upwards of ... Islands, in the North Atlantic Ocean, ... miles ... by ... from Cape ... Carolina, in North ... and ... from ... 746 miles N.E. of Jamaica, ... leagues ... and West India Islands. They were discovered, in 1522, by Juan Ber-under, as Strachey, and Sir George Summers, or Somers, was driven upon them in 1609, on his voyage to Virginia; hence they are named Bermudas, or Somers Islands, from each of those adventurers.

It is to these islands that Shakspeare has laid the scene of his play of "The Tempest," alluding to them particularly as

"The still vex'd Bermoothes."

Bishop Berkeley, in 1725, published a scheme for the conversion of the North American savages, by means of a Missionary College to be erected in the Bermudas.

The principal islands are Long Island (chief town Hamilton, the seat of Government), St. George's, and Ireland Island, the latter a mass of fortifications, principally erected by the labours of the convicts, under the supervision of the Royal Sappers and Miners. The breakwater and fortifications were commenced by the convicts in 1834, and at their completion it was understood that the convicts were to be withdrawn, it not being intended to make Bermuda a penal settlement.

Ireland Island contains a spacious dockyard and arsenal, with their usual appurtenances, and a large "camber," capable of containing the largest ships of the line. In this camber the convict hulks are moored, viz. the Dromedary, Thames, Coromandel, and Tweed.

Our Illustration shows the most strongly fortified part of Ireland Island, adjoining the Dockyard; the Breakwater in the foreground (extending about three hundred yards) being met by another at right angles in front of the Dockyard, and forming the camber.

The spacious erection on the eminence is the Casemate Barracks (occupied at present by the 42d Highlanders), near which is erected the Flag-staff, and Telegraph to St. George's and Hamilton.

The number of convicts confined at the Bermudas averages 1600, of whom all except those incapacitated by illness, or engaged on board their respective hulks, are employed on the Public Works.

Their employment principally consists of quarrying and cutting stone for the fortifications. For this labour each man is paid by the Board of Ordnance threepence per diem; one penny of which he is at liberty to expend in the purchase of the cheap luxuries of the colony, and the remaining two thirds of his earnings are reserved by the overseers, to be given to him on his liberation.

The convicts are well fed and clothed. Their food consists of alternate rations of 3lb. of fresh beef and salt pork, with 1lb. of best wheaten bread, daily; vegetables and pea soup, on alternate days; one pint of cocoa for breakfast, and the same quantity of tea for supper. Until lately they were allowed a quarter of a pint of rum each per diem, but a ration of tea has been substituted for the spirit. A few of the best behaved and qualified convicts are employed on board the hulks as clerks, cooks, servants, carpenters, shoemakers, &c.

The rules for the guidance and observance of the convicts were, until the year 1844, very lax; but owing to a mutinous outbreak on board the Thames, and the subsequent escape of twelve prisoners to the United States of America, the regulations are more stringent.

The punishments inflicted on the convicts for crimes committed on board the hulks, or on the public works, of course vary with the nature of the offence; stoppage of pay, solitary confinement, heavy ironing, and flogging, being the usual inflictions.

No overseer is permitted to inflict more than five dozen lashes at one time, without an order from the Governor of Bermuda (Captain C. Elliot, R.N.), who is ex officio the superintendent of convicts. The best medical attendance is afforded where necessary; and all cases of a serious nature are carried to the Royal Naval Hospital, where (in a separate ward) the convict patients enjoy the same treatment bestowed on the sailors and marines of her Majesty's fleet.

The climate of Bermuda is very healthy, but with the exception, that it is occasionally visited with yellow fever. The last visitation, in 1843, carried off a great number of soldiers, convicts, and civilians.

The dress of the convicts is suitable to the warmth of the climate, and consists of a frock and trousers of white duck, (with the name and number of the prisoner conspicuously marked thereon), straw hat, shoes, cotton shirt, flannel shirt, and drawers; the latter articles being necessary to absorb the excessive perspiration engendered by exposure to the rays of a tropical sun.

CHARACTERS ABOUT TOWN—THE CROSSING SWEEPER. DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

THE CONVICT DRESS AT BERMUDA.

Our Illustrations are from sketches by a gentleman formerly a resident in the Bermudas. They would appear to be almost a paradisiacal region. "Nothing," says Mr. Moore, "can be more romantic than the little bay of St. George's, the number of little islets, the singular clearness of the water, and the animated play of the graceful little boats gliding for ever between the islands, and seeming to sail from one cedar grove to another, form, altogether, the sweetest marriage of nature that can be imagined. In the short but beautiful twilight of the spring evenings, the white cottages scattered over the islands, and but partially seen through the trees that surround them, assume the appearance of little Grecian temples, and embellish the poor fisherman's sail with columns which the pencil of Claude might imitate."

Such is the country to which Mitchell is now on his passage. His younger brother sailed from Liverpool, on Saturday, in the Britannia, for New York. His purpose, it was conjectured, to proceed to Bermuda, on matters of a family nature, to his brother. The Great Western steam-ship plies regularly between New York and Bermuda, the voyage being about 70 hours.

MADEMOISELLE ALBONI.

OUR Artists present the Portrait of this captivating singer, in her popular part of Cenerentola. The biography of this distinguished artiste was published in our columns last season. Her repertoire last year comprised Arsace, in "Semiramide;" "L'Italiana in Algeri;" Rosina, in "Il Barbiere;" Beppo, in "La Gazza Ladra," Malcolm, in "La Donna del Lago;" Ormisd, in "Lucrezia Borgia," Sosostes, in "Anna Bolena;" Gonda, in "Maria di Rohan;" Don Carlos, in "Ernani;" Cherubino, in the "Nozze di Figaro," and Betly. To the above parts she has added this season Tancredi and Cenerentola, and she will shortly appear as the Page in Meyerbeer's masterpiece, the "Huguenots," that celebrated composer having expressly written a new cavatina for her in the second act. Fidalma, in Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto," will also soon be one of her novel delineations. In no character has Alboni shone to more advantage than in Cenerentola. The music is peculiarly adapted to develope the charm of her incomparable organ; the slow movement in the finale "Nacqui all'affano," and the florid and dazzling divisions in the "Non più mesta," always excite the utmost enthusiasm. Alboni's position in the operatic world is now recognised. She is not a singer of gesture, nor do her histrionic abilities exhibit power and variety. Her effects are produced by her rich, luscious tones her simple and unaffected method, the ease and charm of her vocalisation; but she is not an artiste to startle the multitude by those dramatic touches which electrify passion. Her resources of action, and agility in the concerted pieces, afford little relief of the excitement of the passing scene, but when once a simple melody is to be breathed forth, with quiet pathos, the ravishing at her lovely organ is unbounded, and Alboni's triumph is sure.

MADEMOISELLE ALBONI AS "CENERENTOLA."

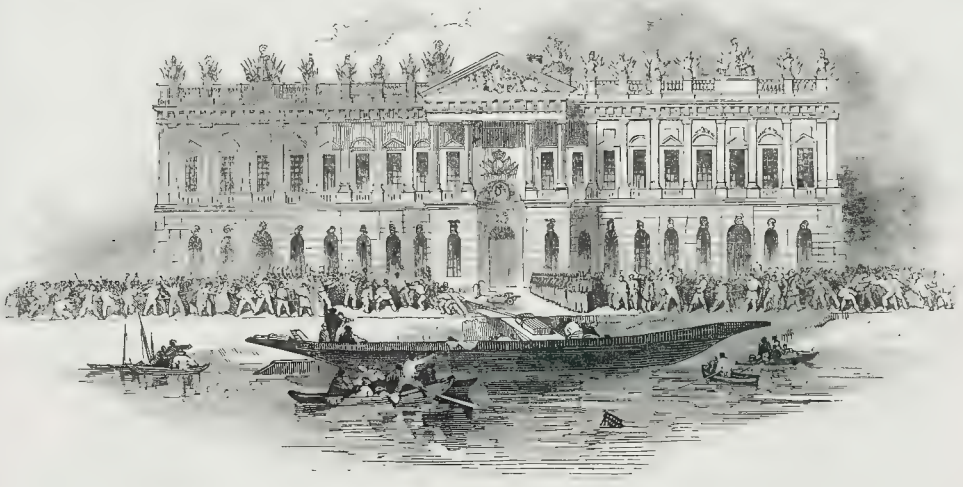
SEIZURE OF ARMS BY THE PEOPLE AT BERLIN.

THIS extraordinary scene occurred on the morning of the 31st ult., at Berlin, and is fully detailed by the active correspondent of the Times from his letter of the above date we learn that, "by an order from the Minister of War, five of the barges which carry heavy goods up and down the Spree were loaded during the previous night with arms, at the wharf opposite the Arsenal, a large building that fronts the Linden, and is divided from the Palace by the narrow river: cases of muskets, a few cannon, and balls and powder formed the cargoes. Two of the vessels had pushed off and proceeded down the river, when some students discovered the proceeding, and gave the alarm: the three boats were detained, and a body of men despatched to overtake and bring back the other two. The Arsenal, it should be stated, is one of the few public buildings the citizens have allowed the troops to take charge of. There was no Barrier Guard near it, or the apparent smuggling away of arms could not have been attempted. This morning the boats were unloaded by the people; and, though I have seen many ebullitions of popular anger in these months of revolution, I never witnessed a scene so thoroughly revolutionary. A sloping platform of planks was formed into the hold of the vessel, and each case was pulled up with ropes by the crowd, cheering exultingly as every box came to land, just as if they had been taken in battle from an enemy. Labourers, porters, ragged nondescripts, staid citizens, and spectacled students, were all mixed together, putting their hands to the work in complete fraternity. A force of the Civic Guard authorized the proceedings by their presence, taking charge of the weapons as they were delivered. An immense mass of people looked on with perfect approval; and, in the midst of them were the hearted orators again, declaiming, but now with real passion and earnestness, with curses and clenched fists. Rumours at such moments do the work of facts, and the general feeling that some plot against the people was intended in the secret sending away of arms was deepened by the report that General Aschoff, when questioned on the subject, had replied, 'They were only old, unserviceable muskets, not worth talking about.' A case was instantly opened to test the truth of this, and they were found to be new from the maker's hands, with the last improvements, percussion locks, and (it is said) hair triggers. The unloading continued for nearly three hours, under a burning sun, the crowd increasing every moment as the event became known through the city, and the anger of the populace swelling with every case of arms dragged into their sight. The arms were again lodged in the Arsenal.

"It is impossible to conceive such a scene occurring under the very palace windows of a King possessing even the shadow of authority; but so it was: the people of Paris are not more completely masters than the populace of Berlin at such moments."

In the Assembly, this deportation of arms has been explained, on behalf of the Minister of War, as merely one in the ordinary course of service, to which no political importance ought to be attached: the weapons were destined for troops in provincial garrisons. The people, it appears, suspected reactionary plots to be on foot; and of the purpose of this nocturnal export of weapons they gave two explanations: one, that it was part of a deliberate plan gradually to remove from within the city all arms and weapons of every kind, which in another outbreak might be seized or demanded by the citizens; the other, that they were destined for the provinces, where the revolution has never been accepted, to arm more regiments against Berlin, to be brought up as soon as the Government feels strong enough to attempt a coup de main. However this might be, this seizure of arms led to a demand for a more general arming of the people, which has been acceded to by the Ministry. During the day, the space round the Arsenal was one mass of people. The party who went in the morning in pursuit of the two barges full of arms (they were mostly students) were arrested at Charlottenburg by the troops, and put in prison; the boats were detained at Spandau by the Government. The receipt of this intelligence in Berlin considerably added to the excitement.

The Arsenal, we may add, is a splendid building, forming a square, each side of which is 286 feet in length. It contains, among other things, models of eighteen fortresses in France, in alto-relievo.



THE ARSENAL AT BERLIN.—SEIZURE OF ARMS BY THE PEOPLE.

MUSIC.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The seventh concert contained in its scheme Mozart's elegant symphony in G minor, and the sublime descriptive epic of Beethoven's "Pastorale." The minuet and trio in Mozart's work received their customary encore, and not a point was lost by Costa in the interpretation of the details of Beethoven's wonderful construction. The overtures were Weber's dreamy and chivalric "Oberon." Mendelssohn's "Calm sea and prosperous voyage," and Beethoven's glorious "Fidelio;" the first being rapturously encored. Mr. H. C. Cooper, a pupil of Spagnoletti, performed a violin concerto by Molique effectively, and with more refinement in his style would be a first rate executant. The vocal gleanings were unexceptionable, being of the classical school. Mdlle. Corbari began by singing the "Mi tradì," from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," in which she has acquired such fame at the Royal Italian Opera. Mdme. Viardot sang the "Lascia ch'io pianga," from Handel's "Armida," with Meyerbeer's picturesque accompaniments, in the most exquisite style. In the second part she sang the scena "Ombra adorata," from Zingarelli's version of "Romeo e Giulietta," with the most intense and impassioned feeling. In Mozart's duo "Ah guarda sorella," from the "Così fan tutti," Mdme. Viardot and Mdlle. Corbari terminated this admirable musical selection. The eighth and last concert will take place on the 26th instant, and will be honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert.

HERR KUHE'S CONCERT.—This pianist gave a matinée musicale on Tuesday, at the Hanover Rooms, and played several pieces with considerable success. Herr Mann executed a violin solo. Madame Sabatier sang the French chansons "Ma brunette" and "Bendetta" charmingly. The Misses Pyne, Miss Bassano, Herr Goldberg, and Mr. Sims Reeves were the other vocalists. John Parry was encored in his "Letter from Annie to Mathilde," and then gave his reading of "Jeannette and Jeannot."

THE MUSICAL UNION.—The programme of the sixth meeting on Tuesday comprised Onslow's quintet in A minor, No. 12; Beethoven's quintet in E flat, for piano, oboe, clarionet, bassoon, and horn; and Beethoven's quartet in C, No. 9, op. 59. The executants were Sainton, first violin; Deloffre, second violin; Hill, viola; Piatti, violoncello; Howell, double bass; Barret, oboe; Lazarus, clarionet, Baumann, bassoon Jarrett, horn; and Osborne, pianist.

M. BENOIT'S MATINÉE MUSICALE.—M. Alexandre Billet, of St. Petersburgh, gave a concert on Saturday morning at Willis's Rooms. He played Hummel's pianoforte septuor, with Barret (oboe), De Folly (flute), Jarrett (horn), Hill (viola), Rousselot (violoncello), and Rowland (contra basso); a fantasia on themes from Balfe's "Puritani;" and studies and a nocturne of his own writing. He is a skilful performer, and was much applauded. The vocalists were Miss Messent, Madame Sabatier, and Herr Brandt, with Mr. Lindsay Sloper as conductor.

ANCIENT MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The excellent society has concluded their brilliant series of concerts with Mendelssohn's A major symphony, and Beethoven's symphony in C, the "Fidelio," "Zauberflöte," and "Dame Blanche" overtures. The amateurs also sang in Wallace's National Hymn, conducted by the composer, and in Festa's madrigal "Down in a flowery vale," and in the finale to Weber's "Euryanthe," Miss Ransford taking the principal part. Mr. Lucas was the conductor. We can congratulate the committee and their indefatigable honorary secretary, Mr. Leslie, on the successful termination of their exertions.

MR. JULIAN ADAMS.—This pianist gave his second concert on Monday night, at Willis's Rooms, assisted by the Misses E. R. and V. Collins, Miss Cubitt, Miss E. Lyon, Madame D'Oheleki, Herr Mülder, and Gerhard Taylor, the harpist.

Chopin's concertante duo for piano and violoncello was brilliantly played by Mr Adams and Mr. Collins.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS. On Monday morning the public rehearsal of Handel's "Messiah" took place at the Hanover rooms, in aid of the funds of this institution. Madame Castellan, Misses S. Novello, A. Williams, Bassano, E. Lyon, and Dolby; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Lockey, Hamby, Benson, J. A. Novello, Machin, and Phillips, sustained the solos; and Sir H. R. Bishop conducted. On Wednesday evening the performances were given by the same artists, with Mr. Lucas as organist, and H. Blagrove principal violin. Madame Castellan's pronunciation of the English is excellent; she sang "Rejoice greatly," and "There were Shepherds:" Miss S. Novello had "How beautiful," "But thou didst not," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" Miss Dolby, "O thou that tellest;" Miss Bassano, "He shall feed his flock," and "He was despised," Lockey, "Comfort ye," Sims Reeves, "They rebuke," and "Thou shalt break them" Mr Phillips, Mr. Machin, and Mr. J. A. Novello, united the basses.

M. GORIA'S CONCERT.—The manner of this pianist on Wednesday, aided by the Beethoven band, was well attended. Miss M O'Connor sang some songs prettily.

MR. J. CHEAN'S CONCERT. On Wednesday night this concert was given at Willis's Rooms. He executed his own sonata in A flat, and fantasia on "Norma:" Chopin's most surprising essay was in a fantasia introducing two schemes of [illegible] each first played separately, then blended, and finally both [illegible] combined in the left hand, whilst the right was subduing a brilliant [illegible] Spohr played his "Lucrezia" fantasia, and Mr. F. MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE. The notices of the morning concert, on Friday, of Madame Dulcken, at the Royal Italian Opera; of Miss Steele and Berkley Richards's evening; of Mr. Sarmen's benefit at Exeter; and of Miss H. Williams's soirée, will be given in our next Number. This morning (Saturday) M. Goria, the pianist, has a performance. On Monday night is the annual concert of the facetious John Parry. On Monday night, at the Music Hall, and Tuesday morning at the Hanover Rooms, Mr Wilson will give an Scotch entertainment. On Wednesday Mr. Lucas's [illegible] evening the Singing Schools meet at Exeter Hall; Blagrove holds his third Quartet Meeting; and Mrs. Schwab will give her annual concert. On Friday will be the concert of Miss Helene Stoel.

MR. W. STERNDALE BENNETT'S CONCERT.—One of our most accomplished pianists and gifted composers, Sir. Wm. Bennett, gave his annual morning concert on Tuesday, at the Hanover rooms. As is usual on these occasions, Mr Bennett had engaged an excellent band, conducted by Mr. Lucas, Mr. Dando being first violin.—thus being enabled to execute the music from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mr. Bennett's "Parisina," overtures, and Weber's "Der Freyschutz," to the effect only. Mr Bennett performed [illegible] concerto, and his own "Capriccio" in E major. Beethoven's Septet, in E flat (the second only), was executed by Molique (violin), Hill (viola), Piatti (violoncello), Williams (clarionet), Baum, jun (bassoon), Platt (horn), and Howell (double bass). The vocalists were Madame Dorus Gras, Miss D'Arc, Miss Duval, and the Misses Hobday; Mr. Locker, and Mr. Lattier—thus forming a brilliant concert

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

On Tuesday, at a quarter to one o'clock, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Auckland, accompanied by Lord John Russell, Lord Campbell, Lord St Germans, Lord Palmerston, and Captain Berkeley and Milne, arrived at the Clarence-yard, Portsmouth, by express train from London, on a visit to Sir C. Napier. On the Admiralty flag being hoisted in their barge, the Victory saluted it with the usual complement. The distinguished party was received by Sir Charles Ogle, the Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Dundas, C.B., M.P., Rear-Admiral Prescott, C.B., &c. &c. At 2 o'clock, the whole party, augmented by the commissioners appointed to inquire into the principle to be observed in the use of iron in railway and similar structures, proceeded to witness the testing of some chain cables, and some experiments of a scientific character, by Captain James, R.E., F.R.S., and then made a tour of the dockyard, first glancing at the Merlin steam-packet, Lieutenant J. O. Bathurst, resting for the Mediterranean service in dock; thence inspecting the Ajax steam guardship, the Penbroke, in dock; the new basin; the mast and boat foundries, Mr Brimble's new dock and slips, the Royal Frederick, and the Princess Royal, on the slips, the wood walls and the hydraulic room, where Captain James exhibited to the Premier and his colleagues a highly interesting experiment of pressure upon iron girders; thence their lordships at the dinner, distinguished Chiefs had met the King's-stairs, and visited the Excellent, Captain Codrington, when that officer showed them his new gunnery practice. After inspecting sundry other objects of interest, the party adjourned to the Crown banquet. The entertainment was intended to have been given on board the St Vincent, at Spithead, but a gale had been blowing since daylight, and the sea was running so high as to deter the inhabitated in mattled life from attempting a dinner on ship board.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Notwithstanding the continued unsettled state of Continental affairs, and the proclamation of the Danish war, Consols have advanced this week nearly three quarters per cent. This rise is mainly attributable to the easy state of money, aided by the long-existing inclination on the part of capitalists to purchase just previously to the quarterly rush the hopes of securing the dividend as a profit in consequence Consols opened on Monday with much firmness, and continued to [illegible] check on Tuesday, from the unsatisfactory state of Paris newsand prices, Consols [illegible] as the last day's transfer, previously to the half-yearly closing of the [illegible] books, some activity prevailed. Wednesday prices were firm, and in all [illegible] tenancies, and no time being made for the Account, the announcement on Thursday by the Directors of the Bank of England, that the minimum rate interest would be reduced to 3½ per cent, although it excited some surprise, did not materially influence prices. Money, as was remarked last week, is so abundant already, that the only effect will be to make the Bank a competitor with the bankers and discounters, who for some time past have engrossed all the business. Consols, after the announcement, advanced to 83¾ ex div. for the [illegible]

The market closed with some firmness (although but little had been done previously), at the following prices:—Bank Stock, 184. Three per Cent Reduced Annuities, 83¾; New Three-and-a-quarter pc. Cent Annuities, 84⅝; Long Annuities, 8 9-16; India Bonds, £1000, 1p pm; Consols for Opening, 83¾ ex div., Exchequer Bills, £1000, 40 pm.; £500, 40 pm.; Small, 39 pm.

The Foreign Market has been heavy during the week, business being nearly confined to Spanish, Portuguese, and Mexican. Spanish Five per Cents declined on Wednesday to 19¼ on it becoming known that senor Isturitz had left London for Madrid. A slight improvement was, however, registered on Thursday. Peruvian gradually inclined after the arrival of the mails last week, but [illegible] Committee did not publish the news received from their agent until Wednesday [illegible] transpired that the Peruvian Government had not even condescended to reply to the letters of the agent, the stock fell to 20. BATTLE OF GOITO, BETWEEN THE AUSTRIANS AND PIEDMONT

THE WAR IN ITALY.

IN our Journal of last week we briefly recorded the decisive victory obtained by the Piedmontese, on the 30th ult., near Goito. The following additional particulars are from the proclamation issued by the Provisional Government of Lombardy:—

"The enemy, who until now by his movements had almost allowed us to expect an approaching retreat, made a powerful effort, attacking our troops upon the whole line; at the same time the Tuscans were assailed on the extreme right, and the Piedmontese in the plains of Pastrengo and Rivoli at the extreme left. If the memorable valour of the Tuscans was not sufficient against the crushing number of the Austrians, that of the Piedmontese from the other point succeeded in repulsing them with much advantage, the enemy having left on those plains 600 dead, amongst whom are many officers.

"Scarcely had the King Charles Albert heard that a great body of Austrians was directed from Verona towards Mantua, than he hastened in person along the line of his army, and reinforced its positions, principally that of Goito.

"It was there that the battle of the 30th was fought. The combat began about half-past three o'clock, and lasted till night-fall.

"The [illegible] were honourably wounded. Of the enemy's troops a great number were killed, and many made prisoners, amongst whom was Major Bontheim and several superior officers.

"On the same day, as was announced, the enemy shut in Peschiera hoisted the white flag, the garrison obtained from the generosity of the King Charles Albert honourable conditions, consigning meanwhile to our troops one of the gates of the fortress."

It is further stated that "scarcely did the King Charles Albert and the Duke of Savoy hear the cannon of Goito, than they moved with two divisions to that point; when arrived there, the action already proceeded bravely. The enemy attempted to force the passage of Goito with the view of taking all our positions; but the power of the Piedmontese artillery repulsed them from the centre. There was a moment that the Austrians, perceiving the right wing not sufficiently defended by artillery, exerted there their greatest effort, and that part began to cede to the prevailing force, when the Duke of Savoy advanced the 2d regiment of the Guards.

"The Austrians were then repulsed on that side also; and towards half-past seven of the evening they were in full flight.

"This day (in which the King Charles Albert and his sons were always in the midst of the fire, as the humblest of their soldiers) was not only glorious for us, but of the gravest moment in the war, since the bold plan of our enemy was discovered, which was to surround our army on all sides. It was seen that the Austrians, however strong, cannot in the open field sustain an encounter with the valour of the Italians."

On the 30th, at eleven o'clock at night, Peschiera capitulated; and several Italian officers, with artillerymen and riflemen, entered the fort by the gate of Verona.

At daybreak, on the 31st, the 13th Regiment and the corps of Parmesan troops entered the place. At mid-day, the Austrians, filing off before the barracks, went out by the gate of Brescia, having laid down their arms, which were consigned to the custody of the Piedmontese, in the presence of the Duke of Genoa, attended by a select staff and the 14th Regiment. The officers alone were allowed to retain possession of their swords.

There were found in the fortress considerable stores of ammunition, heaps of cannon-balls, bombs, &c. The houses in the interior presented a deplorable spectacle. The enemy had wished to hold out till the last moment, and had consumed almost all the provisions. Of the few cannoniers who remained, each was compelled to do double duty. Almost all the horses were consumed. There was no more salt, and saltpetre was substituted. The soldiers sacked the houses which the bombs of the enemy had set on fire; and the few remaining inhabitants (not more than 400), the greater part of whom had been obliged to labour at the works of defence, took refuge in the casemates.

The Times Correspondent states, as the result of a quarter of an hour's inspection of the fortress of Peschiera, that, for the purposes of war, though the little town has suffered severely, the fortress itself is quite uninjured. The parapets of the forts Mandello and Salvi are knocked to pieces; but care was taken during the siege not to fire round shot against the works of the place itself, and trust altogether for its reduction to shells, unless the extremity of battering in breach should become necessary. The town on the right of the Mincio has not been so much cut up as that part which is on the left bank fortunately for the troops and the few inhabitants, their barracks were [illegible], and all persons were allowed to take refuge in them. The outer coating of the roof is cut up into shreds, but the bomb-proofs were well made, and all found perfect security under them. After passing the Place d'Armes, the first houses you come to shared in the destruction intended for the barracks, but further on the houses are only occasionally injured.

Though the town is small, the works occupy a great extent; and as they are well constructed, and as waters from the Lake of Garda flow round in a deep ditch [illegible] feet wide, the Sardinians would have found it a tough matter to cut in. The fortress is to be put into an effective state without delay. Mandello and Salvi forts are to be repaired, and already the temporary batteries established for the siege are razed. A strong garrison is to be placed in the town, with at least twelve months' provisions, as it is now evident that Peschiera has been isolated from the want of food alone, and not from any impression made by the besiegers. The opportune surrender now has been a godsend to Charles Albert, not only from its being a good base for operations and for magazines, but for the extent of the force which he is enabled to draw from before it, to support his manœuvres in front of the enemy.

"The surrender of Peschiera and the victory, or rather the three victories, of the last week of May," says the Provisional Government proclamation, "seem to guarantee the result of the war of independence."

THE AUSTRIAN REVOLUTION.

The Austrian Revolution has hitherto excited less interest in this country than the Revolution of Paris in February last. The causes of the former are less understood. The same intercourse is not kept up between Germany and England as between England and France. The London journals do not so regularly and so fully report the doings of the Germans in their attempts to establish free institutions; and when their correspondents favour us with communications from the seat of disturbances, they are in general so confused, contradictory, and unconnected, that the ordinary reader strives in vain to gather from their contents any clear and precise notions of the feelings, motives, objects, and success of the contending parties. This is the case even with Prussia, where a revolution is evidently in progress, of which the results threaten to be as remarkable as those of 1789 in France. It is still more so with Austria, where there is a complication of mischief to be remedied, and where there exists a complication of conflicting interests, desires, aspirations, and nationalities, which makes the affairs of that country, at the present time, the most remarkable history in this age of great histories and of unparalleled events.

The Austrian Empire, as it existed before the French Revolution of February last, and as it exists nominally but not actually at the present moment, covers a surface of 45,000 square miles larger than France; of 138,000 larger than the United Kingdom; and of 141,000 larger than its rival kingdom of Prussia. It comprises people of various religions and languages; Roman Catholics, Greeks, Lutherans, Calvinists, in faith; Hungarians, Bohemians, Germans, and Italians, in nationality. Its Emperor represents, as far as any one in the nineteenth century can represent such remote antiquity, the ancient Roman Empire—driven from Rome to Constantinople, and from Constantinople to the Eastern Empire, the Oester Reich, whence the name of Austria. He is the head of the most illustrious House of Europe; the governor of a rich, splendid, and extensive empire; the ruler of countries and districts abounding with natural wealth, and with natural facilities for the indefinite extension of that wealth; and of various populations and races, each of which is capable from education and natural character of becoming among the most useful, the most industrious, and the most intelligent of European nations.

Such is the fair side of the picture. On the other hand, we find that this mighty Emperor is a child in intellect—or indeed lower than a child, for the child is teachable, which he is not. We find him a dwarf in person, amiable, but utterly helpless. Power has been exercised in his name and on his behalf, by men who have not acted with the most ordinary prudence. Instead of ruling by reason and justice, they have ruled by terror, coercion, and the sword; and have trusted to physical force alone for keeping in subjection the natural aspirations of these various populations. The Italian, smarting and indignant under this system, has from time to time striven to cast it off. When he had not the sword in his hand to resist the insupportable tyranny, he had hatred in his heart, which he inculcated to his children as a sacred duty. The German has been jealous of the Hungarian, the Hungarian distrustful of the German. The Slavonian has encouraged ideas of nationality utterly incompatible with the continued existence of the Austrian empire. Race has been opposed to race; nationality to nationality; language to language; each against all, and all against each. By a long course of financial mismanagement, this naturally rich country has become poor and embarrassed. As a state it has been several times bankrupt, and robbery, peculation, and spoliation seem to have been the presiding spirits of its Exchequer. Its whole economy, financial, political, and commercial, has been radically wrong for more than a century. Prince Metternich, who presided in the name of the Emperor over this heterogeneous empire—who lived by shifts and expediencies and by the strong arm of a military despotism repressive of anything approaching to freedom of opinion—knew the fearful rottenness of the system that he upheld. But, knowing it, he did not seek to remedy it. He was avowedly well content if he could contrive, by patching and shifting and scheming, to make the disjecta membra hold together during his own lifetime. At any given period within the last twenty years the materials of a violent revolution were ready to explode in Austria. The train was laid; the building to be overthrown was cracking of its own age and feebleness. It wanted but the match to fire the train—and there would have been a speedy end of the system which by slow degrees had brought this fine empire into a condition of such woful embarrassment and degradation. The match, however, was not applied in the German and Hungarian portions of the empire, and it missed fire on more than one occasion in Italy. At last the French Revolution broke out and was successful. Austria was in a blaze immediately. The rotten wood crackled—the boys of the University of Vienna, joined by shopkeepers and the middle-classes generally, drove the all-powerful Metternich into exile, and the ball of Revolution began to roll with fearful velocity. Italy took up arms, and Milan afforded to the world the spectacle of a disinterested, unconquerable, enthusiastic heroism pervading a whole people—noble as well as beggar—Duchess as well as sempstress—old man as well as school-boy—of which modern times have had but few examples, and never a greater. The result is that Lombardy, though not positively lost to Austria at this moment, may be considered as independent: and that, under no possible combination of circumstances, will German rule, in any shape whatever, be tolerated in any portion of the Italian peninsula.

The Viennese—almost as impulsive as the Parisians—consented to be guided by the Students of the University, and raised such a clamour for a Republic, that the Emperor, mistrustful of the appearance which crowded him wherever he went abroad, and thinking, probably, of the fate of Marie Antoinette, his kinswoman, and of Louis XVI., as parallel to his own if he remained, fled from his capital to Innspruck, and left the middle classes of his hereditary Empire of Germany to debate on the future form of the Government without the embarrassment of his presence amongst them. Bohemia manifested attachment to his person. Hungary expressed the same feeling, and his advisers deem the Emperor seriously debated whether the true policy to be pursued under circumstances so extraordinary would not be to take advantage of the fervent nationality of the Czech population, and establish a Bohemian or Hungarian empire upon a new basis, leaving the German portion of Austria to shift for itself—either by founding a Republic, or by incorporating with the Prussian and other Germans who encourage their day-dream of a united German Fatherland. Up to this time, the future existence of the Austrian empire remains undecided; but it seems highly improbable that any portion of Germany, proper, as so considered, will continue under the governance of the House of Hapsburgh. The latest news received informs us of the expulsion of the German troops and citizens from the capital of Bohemia, by the Czech or Bohemian party; and adds that Prince Windischgrætz, the Austrian or German Commander, had retired to the heights around, to bombard the ancient city of Prague, and batter it into submission, in the name of the Emperor. The Czech party are not at all unwilling to accept the present Emperor as their Sovereign, provided he do not add his German possessions to their kingdom. The Emperor himself, without advisers who are capable of directing him or acting for him, has fallen into a state of nervous excitement and debility, from which the worst results are anticipated, and is about to remove, or be removed, from Innspruck, no one knows whither. Such, at the present moment, is the state of the Metternichian deluge in Austria—a confusion to which that of France is order itself. Its subsidence, we are afraid, is not to be speedily looked for. Such outbursts as these, arising from causes so great and so diversified, require time to calm; and when the calm arrives, the observer who looks forth upon the region which was so troubled, may expect to find all the old landmarks removed, and a new country, as far as all outward appearances go, occupying the place of the old one.

SURRENDER OF PESCHIERA.

In our Journal of last week we detailed the surrender of this important fortress. In the 17th article of the capitulation is stated the route to be held by the Austrian troops, who, with their officers, were to pass through Desenzano, Brescia, Cremona, Piacenza, Parma, Modena, Bologna, and Ancona, where they were to be embarked for Croatia, and if possible for Segna.

We are now enabled by an artist-correspondent to annex a sketch of a part of the garrison, the escort of Sardinian infantry, entering, as prisoners of war, the Castle of Parma, one of the towns mentioned in the above route. They consist of a regiment of Croatian infantry, a few companies of artillerymen, and a small picquet of Hungarian hussars, in all about 1600 men. For many weeks previously to the surrender, the garrison had been subjected to the severest privations: compelled early in the siege to replace the deficiency of salt by saltpetre and gunpowder, the men had latterly been kept on a third of a ration of food; and their bread merely consisted of maize, ground and made into cakes, raw, with no yeast. During this remnant each artillerymen became obliged to undertake the direction of two guns, while the Croatian infantry worked them. Their appearance, on arriving here, betrayed sadly the hard usage to which they had been subjected; the Croatians especially, although finely built men, and above the middle height of stature, appearing to be unmercifully exhausted as scarcely to be capable of dragging themselves along. Every possible token of humanity and of sympathy was shown to them by the Italians generally and by the escort. They seldom marched more than fifteen miles in a day, and that during the cooler hours of the morning—from sunrise; while several days' halt were made, lengthening the journey much beyond its expected period. The men have been uniformly treated with more consideration than the articles enjoined, being provided in the barracks with good beds wherever these could be procured, and the officers have been quartered at the principal inns. Their sunburnt countenances, lean, wearied, and spiritless, told of the dreadful havoc that war had made among them. Numerous cars and waggons followed, bearing the wounded, the sick, and the exhausted, and at each of their resting-places some few, with the worst complaints, remained behind to linger, perhaps to die in a foreign hospital, even before their less unfortunate comrades can reach their native land. One who recoiled from such a fate, and overtasked his failing powers, fell a victim to the exertion: a few green leaves strewn over his face and body furnished the pomp of a poor soldier's lying-in-state, until the waggon slowly reached the nearest station.

The escort, consisting of a battalion, 1000 strong, of fine Piedmontese infantry (Grenadier Guards), contrasted with the prisoners as favourably as the national pride of the Italians could desire. A picked corps, usually employed on garrison and parade duty in the capital, they had been sent from Turin expressly to perform this office, which leads them directly through those provinces, south of the Po, that are now in course of annexation to King Charles Albert's dominions.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been variable; the sky has been for the most part covered by clouds, the wind has been variable, and the temperature has been about that of the average for the season. The following are some particulars of each day:—Thursday, the sky was for the most part overcast; several flashes of lightning were seen in the N.E. during the evening; the direction of the wind was E.N.E, and the average temperature of the air was 59°. Friday, the appearance of the sky was changeable: at times it was overcast, but mostly some portions of clear sky were visible; the direction of the wind was N.E. at the former part of the day, and S. at the latter: the average temperature was 60°. Saturday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, except for a short time in the morning when the sun broke out, and once some rain fell: the direction of the wind was S. principally: the average temperature was 62°. Sunday, the sky was overcast all day, with very slight exceptions; a shower of rain fell at 6h. P.M.: the direction of the wind, at the former part of the day, was W.S.W., and it was N. at the latter; the temperature of the air was 62½°. Monday, the sky was for the most part overcast: rain was falling heavily in the morning: the direction of the wind was N.: the average temperature of the air was 62°. Tuesday, the sky was overcast till 10h. P.M.: the air was in gentle motion from the N.N.E., and the average temperature was 59½°. Wednesday, the sky was much covered with cumulo-stratus, till the evening; a fine sunset: there were occasional light airs from the N.E.: the average temperature of the air was 62°; and that for the week ending this day was 62° nearly.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF HESSE.—The Grand Duke of Hesse, Lewis II, died at Darmstadt, on the 16th, of an apoplectic attack. He was in the 71st year of his age, and succeeded his father April 6, 1830. His death will produce no political effect, as he had on the 9th of March last appointed his son, Lewis, co-Regent, and had taken no part since in public affairs.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

The excitement which the affair of Louis Napoleon created last week in Paris has, in a great degree, passed away, dissipated by the following letter which the Prince addressed to the president of the National Assembly, and which that functionary read to the Assembly on Friday evening last:

"Monsieur le President,—I felt pride in having been elected representative of the people in Paris and in three other departments. It was in my opinion an ample reparation for my years' exile and six years' captivity; but the injurious suspicions to which my election has given rise, the disturbance of which it was the pretext, and the hostility of the executive power, impose upon me the duty of refusing an honour which I am supposed to have obtained by intrigue. I desire order, and the maintenance of a wise, great, and liberal Republic; and since I involuntarily cause disorder, I deposit, not without regret, my resignation in your hands. Calumnies, I trust, will now be restored, and enable me to return to France as the humblest of citizens, but also as one the most devoted to the repose and prosperity of his country.

(Signed) "CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE."

The accounts from the departments are very unsatisfactory. A collision between the peasantry and National Guards of Gueret, in the department of La Creuse, took place on the 14th inst., on account of the additional 45 per cent. direct tax, in which twelve were killed and several wounded. At Nismes several people have been killed and wounded. Perpignan is under martial law; and there have been disturbances at Toulouse and in other districts, although of less gravity.

On the night of the 15th, but Guizot, notwithstanding that the excitement of the people continued, and that the tocsin was rung, tranquillity was preserved through the exertions of the clergy, who mixed amongst the groups and exhorted them to peace, and the mayors having solemnly promised that the odious tax should be withdrawn, order was in a great degree restored.

A telegraphic despatch received by the Executive Government on Sunday announced that the disturbances at Nismes had been suppressed by a large military force, after a sanguinary collision between the contending parties, in which several lives were sacrificed. It is added that those disturbances were totally unconnected with politics. Religious animosity, which exists high between the Catholics and Protestants of Nismes, was the sole cause of the bloodshed.

In Paris matters are in a very unsatisfactory state, owing to the continued depression of all commercial and mercantile business in consequence of the uncertain aspect which the political horizon presents.

It is mentioned in proof of the injury sustained by the trade of Paris, that more than twenty manufacturing jewellers have determined to close their warehouses and to retire to the country until matters shall improve. More than three-fourths of these manufacturers have not disposed of the smallest article of their trade since the 24th of February last.

The Minister of War, accompanied by the General commanding the Department of the Seine, and by General Damesme, who commands the National Garde Mobile, reviewed several regiments of cavalry, consisting of Cuirassiers, Dragoons, and Lancers, and some battalions of the Garde Mobile, in the Champs de Mars, on Sunday. The appearance of the troops was fine, and the manner in which the evolutions were performed elicited the approbation of the Minister of War.

The new Republican Guard was reviewed on Sunday by M. Trouvé Chauvel, the Prefect of Police. The Guard is composed partly of old soldiers and partly of operatives who fought at the barricades of February last. After having passed through the ranks of the Guard, the Prefect of Police addressed the men in a concise speech, in which he explained to them that the country expected that they never would acknowledge but one flag—that of the Republic. His speech was received with loud and unanimous cheers of "Vive la République!"

The monster banquet, at 25 centimes the head (2½d.), which was to have been given at Vincennes, is announced to take place on the 14th of July—the anniversary of the capture of the Bastile. The tables are to be laid outside the fortifications extending from the Canal d'Ourcq to Reuilly. Invitations are to be addressed to the operatives and National Guards of the departments.

On Monday the draft of the Constitution agreed to by the Committee of the National Assembly appointed to draw it up, was read in the Chamber by M. Marrast, the reporter of the Committee. The following are its most important provisions:—

CONSTITUTION OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

RIGHTS OF MAN

In the presence of God, and in the name of the French people, the National Assembly proclaims and decrees the following:

Art. 1. The duties of man in society are summed up in respect for the constitution, in obedience to the laws, in the defence of the country, in the accomplishment of his family duties, and in the practice of that fraternal maxim, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye to them likewise."

2. The constitution guarantees to all citizens—Liberty, Equality, Security, Instruction, Labour, Property, Assistance.

3. Liberty consists in the right of going and coming; of meeting peacefully and without arms; of association; of petitioning; of exercising one's religion; of manifesting his thoughts and opinions by the press or otherwise, without any restriction other than the rights and liberties of other nations, and the public security.

4. Equality consists in the existence of every title and privilege of birth, class, or caste, and the admissibility of every one to all public employments, without any other motive of ground for preference than his virtues and his capacity. The equitable participation of all citizens in the charges and advantages of society.

5. Security results from the inviolability of the person, the family, the domicile, and the rights and goods of each and every member of society.

6. The right of instruction is that which every man has to receive gratuitously from the State, the education proper for the development of the physical, moral, and intellectual faculties of each of them.

7. The right of labour is that which every man has to live by his work. Society must, by the productive and general means of which it disposes, and which will be organised shortly, furnish labour to every able-bodied man who cannot procure it.

8. Property consists in the right of enjoying and disposing of one's goods and revenues, of the fruits of one's labour, of the produce of his industry.

9. The right of assistance is that which belongs to children abandoned, to the infirm, to the old, to receive from the State the means of existence.

123. The ministers of public worship acknowledged by the law have alone a right to receive a salary from the State.

124. The liberty of public instruction is exercised under the guarantee of the laws, and under the superintendence of the State. This superintendence shall extend to all establishments of education, without any exception

125. The domicile of each citizen is an inviolable asylum. It is not allowed to any one to enter there except according to forms and in the cases determined by the law

126. No man shall be deprived of his national judges

127. All property, of whatever nature, is inviolable.

128. All taxes are established for common utility. Each is to contribute according to his fortune.

130. No tax can be levied except in virtue of a law.

131. The direct taxes can be fixed for one year only.

132. The essential guarantees of the right to labour are—liberty of labour, voluntary association, equality in the relations between the employer and the workman; gratuitous instruction, education suitable to each man; equitable participation in the profits of capital; the establishment of great works of public utility, and the State destined to employ the men in case of failure of work.

133. The Constitution guarantees the public debt

134. The Legislative Assembly shall establish, the statutes shall be revised, and placed in accordance with democratic and republican principles.

135. The territory of Algeria and of the colonies, is declared French territory, and shall be governed by particular laws suited to each.

By the 13th chapter, which has reference to the attributes of the executive power, there is, besides the President, who is to be elected by universal suffrage, a Vice-President, who is to be nominated by the Assembly, and who is to be the head of the Republic by the National Assembly, and who, by right of office, will be President of the Council of State. The President is to be elected for four years. The President will nominate all the ministers and all the political agents. He can dispose of the military force, but cannot command them in person. Some of the members of the committee proposed that general officers should be excluded from the office of President, but that proposition was overruled. The Assembly is to be re-elected every three years.

The financial difficulties of the Government are accumulating more and more every day. The impracticable scheme of the Government to furnish employment and wages to the working classes is beginning to present itself in the full breadth of its folly to all parties, even the owners themselves; but the mischievous consequences, the demoralized condition of the working men, their discontent, the dissatisfaction of the tax-payers, the ruin of trade, and consequent loss of employment to the operatives themselves, remain in all their hideousness; and the Parisian mob have at last awoke to the conviction that for the last few months they have been burning the candle at both ends; but, unfortunately they do not appear to gather wisdom from their experience, and the blame of the present unhappy aspect of affairs is shifted, à la manière Française, to the shoulders of the Government. The Executive Commission are accused of being despotic, because they would establish order—of being unjust, because they would diminish expenses which it is impossible to keep up—of being inert and impotent because they do not attack every party except that which precisely taunts them with weakness.

Driven to their wits end to devise additional sources of revenue, the Government have issued a decree containing a supplementary tariff of tolls to be levied on articles of consumption entering Paris.

Some of the articles subject to toll:—Diamonds and every other description of gems, set or unset, 10 per cent. (ten pounds) per two pounds weight: olive oil, fruit preserved in oil, with or without liquid, and perfumed oil of every description, 40f (33s.) the hundred quarts; other vegetable oils, 30f. (25s.) the hundred quarts, acidulated oils, 20f. (16s 8d.) per hundred quarts; varnish mixed in oil, white lead, and all other oily substances, 10f. (8s. 4d.) per ditto; spirits of turpentine, 8f. (7s. 6d.); raw or refined sugar, 1c per two pounds weight; oranges and lemons, 2c. per ditto; almonds and dried fruits (such as figs and grapes), fruit pies, preserved lemons, and all other descriptions of dried fruit and olives, 5c. per ditto; chesnuts, &c. per ditto; sea coal, coke, and turf, 30c (2½) per bushel; white wax (refined or pressed) and spermaceti, 50c (4s.) the 2lb weight; yellow wax, or other substances replacing wax, 20c. per ditto; hydraulic lime, 5f. 40c. (5s.) the bushel; quick lime, 1f. 20c. (1s.) the bushel; bricks and tiles of every description, and pottery, 30c. (2d.) per 200 pounds weight; sand and clay, 60c. (6d.) the cart; coals of every description, in the two-pound weight; copper, 5c. (4d.) per ditto; zinc, 1c. per ditto, ice for refreshment, 5c. (4d.) per ditto.

The Provisions of the humbler classes, who for several months in the autumn and winter generally breakfast on bread and grapes, will find by this decree that their new Republican liberty is more oppressive than their supposed Monarchical slavery. Comfortable quarters in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel de Ville, on Tuesday evening, discussed—and, for the greater part, approved—the pretensions of Prince Louis Napoleon. They were dispersed by the troops. It was believed that the Prince would be elected Colonel of the 3rd Legion of the National Guards of the banlieu. A placard announced that Prince Napoleon Buonaparte, son of the ex-King of Westphalia, was a candidate for the command of the 2d Legion of the National Guard of Paris.

The Government were not inattentive to the dangers with which they seem menaced, both from the Paris ouvriers, and the spirit of reaction manifested in many of the provinces.

The newly-formed Republican Guard, consisting of four squadrons of cavalry and 2200 infantry, was reviewed on Tuesday by five members of the Executive Commission, and by the Lieutenant-General Cavaignac. Five thousand of these are immediately to be despatched to the Sologne, to be divided amongst the three departments of the Loiret, the Loir et Cher, and the Cher. A canal is to be cut through an extent of thirty miles, and 100,000 acres of now unproductive land are to be drained and cultivated. 1200 are to be sent to the department of the Maine and Loire, to be employed at the Tours and Nantes Railroad. The improvement of the navigation of the Marne will employ forthwith 3000 workmen. The construction of five bridges, noted by the National Assembly, will employ many hands, and the continuation of the Rue de Rivoli to the Rue Saint Antoine, originally planned by Napoleon, and now to be commenced forthwith, will offer a great resource to the labourers, particularly during the winter. In the meantime many of the inmates of the national workshops who are not common labourers have quitted the capital, and have returned to the departments, having received an allowance to assist them on their journey.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

MONDAY.—The chief feature of interest in the day's proceedings was the communication, by M. Marrast, to the Chamber, of the draft of the constitution agreed to by the committee on that subject—an abstract of which is given above.

TUESDAY.—M. Clement Thomas resigned into the hands of the National Assembly the command of the National Guards of Paris. The resignation was accepted, and the Assembly, on the motion of its President, declared that General Clement Thomas had deserved well of his country.

The President read a letter from M. Thiers, who, having been returned in four departments, chose the department of the Lower Seine.

General Cavaignac presented a project of decree, providing that, after the 1st of October, 1848, the admission into the military school of St. Cyr and the Polytechnic School shall be gratuitous.

The project of decree relative to the National Workhouses being the next order of the day, M. Victor Hugo was called to the tribune. He admitted that those establishments had been at first a necessity, but were now full time, he said, to remedy an evil of which, the least inconvenience was to squander uselessly the resources of the country. What, he asked, had they produced in the course of four months? Nothing. They had only degraded into the vigorous children of labour, deprived them of all taste for labour, and demoralised them to such a degree that they no longer blushed to beg in the streets. The Monarchy had its faults; the Republic had its weaknesses. But Socialism, however, that the enemies of the country would not succeed in converting the Parisian labourers, formerly so virtuous, into lazzaroni and lanzknechts, or prætorians of émeute, at the disposition of a dictatorship. As to the Luxembourg, it simply menaced the financial and commercial situation of France, and appealing to the Socialists he summoned them in the name of humanity to cease to preach their anarchical doctrines. At the moment Paris struggled in a paroxysm which was regarded by its neighbours as an agony, London, he said, rejoiced, and its industry and commerce took breath. Those who called the people to revolt were most culpable, for they created distrust, and obliged capital to fly. When they agitated Paris they assorted the power, grandeur, wealth, prosperity, and preponderance of England. The misery of the rich constituted at no time the wealth of the poor. The Socialists should consider that civil war was a servile war; and he again entreated them to suspend their declamations against family and property, in the name of society.

After considerable discussion the Assembly voted the additional credit of 3,000,000f., which was demanded.

Wednesday.—The project of a decree, relative to the grant of 100,000 francs for the relief of the political sufferers under the Government of Louis Philippe, was, after a short discussion, adopted.

The remainder of the sitting was passed in the discussion of a bill relative to the duties on wine, cider, beer, &c.

BELGIUM.

Belgium has again passed through an important trial. The electoral reform had doubled the number of electors, and the question naturally arose, whether the elections would favour the retrograde, the radical, or the liberal party. The answer, however, is clear and indubitable. The new electors had all assembled under the banners of the constitutional party, and candidates as true representatives of the minds and desires of the people. Brussels took precedent in setting this good example.

The candidates of the Association Libérale had from 4600 to 5500 votes, whereas the candidates of the Alliance numbered scarcely from 300 to 800 votes

The retrograde did not even appear on the scene of action. The result of the scrutiny was everywhere announced amidst great acclamation. Some placards were carried about with the words "No Republic." At Antwerp the victory of the Libérale was not less decisive—the whole members re-elected with 2500 to 2700 votes; while a Professor of the University of Lyons, who was a native of Antwerp, was unsuccessful, notwithstanding the immense exertion of the retrograde party. At Ath, Dumortier, the leader of the party, had the upper hand, as well as at Charleroi and Courtrai, and even in the city of Ghent, the place where, above all others, great apprehensions were entertained from the machinations of the Radical party, the Libérale candidates gained from 700 to 800 votes, while the Liberal Constitutionalists were returned with 2500 to 2800 votes.

SPAIN.

Accounts from Madrid to the 16th instant have been received. The Secretary of the Spanish Legation at Berne, M. Cayo Quinones de Leon, had brought to Madrid the official account of the re-establishment of diplomatic relations between Spain and the Austrian empire.

The Madrid journals of the 13th publish the debate in the House of Commons on the differences between the British and Spanish Governments, but it is most unfaithfully given.

The sum net of revenue collected for the month of May was estimated at 90,000,000 reals, of which 40,000,000 have been paid to the Bank of San Fernando.

The Queen gave a dinner on the 12th to the Prussian Envoy, which was attended by the Ministers. The dinner was short, and passed tolerably well.

The authorities continued to adopt every night extraordinary precautions, in anticipation of another outbreak. Count Miraflores had returned to Madrid.

The Court had gone into mourning for nine days, in consequence of the death of the Princess Sophia of England. Rumours were again current of a serious dissent between General Narvaez and the Minister of Finance. A Carlist band, commanded by El Organista, had been dispersed, in Arragon, with the loss of its chief, six killed, and ten prisoners.

The faction of Don Vicente Herrero had been surprised and defeated in the town of Balaguer by a company of the Walloon guards, and totally routed. Herrero was left dead on the field of battle, near the entrance of the town, with six of his comrades. Nine were taken prisoners.

The Court had gone into mourning for the death of M. Beltran de Lis, Minister of Finance, and another, appointing M. Orlando in his place, had been published on the 16th.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY.—From the seat of war advices announce the surrender of Visenza, under General Aspara, on the 11th, by capitulation, to the Austrians.—The Italian troops marched out with the honours of war, &c., retaining their arms. General Durando, in the capitulation, undertook to re-cross the Po, and not to serve neither he nor the Romans under him—for the space of three months against the Austrians. The lives and property of the inhabitants of Vicenza were respected. The head-quarters of Charles Albert were advanced to Villafranca, and it was expected that the Adige would be crossed above and below Verona on the evening of the 13th. The intended attack, however, on Verona did not take place, though 50,000 men were brought within three miles of the city, in consequence of its being ascertained that Radetzky, after the capitulation of Vicenza, had reinforced with 15,000 men, and it was not considered prudent to attack a fortified place with so large a garrison in an irregular manner.

The head-quarters of Charles Albert had come back to Vallegio on the 14th. The army had returned to its former position, and much uncertainty prevailed as to its future operations. The Austrians in the Venetian territory have been strongly reinforced. The Austrians have entered Padua in triumph

On the 10th, the Neapolitan General, Pepe, proceeding towards the seat of war, left Ferrara for Rovigo with 2700 troops, including 700 Neapolitan soldiers. In addition to these, 600 lancers, already arrived at the bridge of Lago-Scuro, were to leave on the 12th. The dragoons, commanded by Colonel Contrufino, who were to have crossed the Po on the morning of the 11th, formed their horses' heads and rode homewards.

The blockade of the port of Trieste, by the combined Italian fleet, has been officially announced by the Italian Admirals to the Consuls of the different nations residing in that city. The communication is signed Albini, Sardinian, de Cosa, Neapolitan, Buzo, Venetian.

A rumour has reached us through the medium of the Paris papers that after a long and obstinately contended battle between the Austrians and the Piedmontese the Duke of Savoy was made prisoner, and the combined Italian army routed, with considerable loss. The rumour was credited in Paris, and it was added that the French would proceed to the assistance of King Charles Albert, on condition that Savoy be ceded to France.

In the Chamber of Deputies of Turin, on the 15th, a bill was presented for authorising an extraordinary levy of 6000 men, to replace the 12,000 who have engaged not to combat for three months, in consequence of the treaty of Vienna.

ROME.—Accounts received from Rome, to the 13th instant, are of considerable importance. The declaration of principles announced to the Roman Chambers on the first day of their sitting, appears to have solved the difficult problem of the separation of the spiritual from the temporal power. The deputy Bonaparte having asked whether the declaration read to the Assembly was merely the expression of the Ministry, or whether it was the constant desire of his Holiness in wishing to recognise the sacred and imprescriptible rights of the people, Signor Mamiani, the Minister of the Interior, replied as follows:—"The programme is the intercession of the entire Ministry, of whom all the members have participated in its composition. I consequently proclaim loudly that the declaration is the unanimous expression of the Ministry, ratified and approved entirely by his Holiness." A number of deputies had chosen Professor Sereni for the Vice-President. General Ferrari was to have had it in the evening of that day on a special mission to the Government of King Charles Albert.

NAPLES.—The Committee of Public Safety installed at Cosenza, n this kingdom, on the 3rd inst, had decreed the general armament of the province, and applied to the Commissary of the executive power at Messina for a supply of arms and artillery. Fifteen hundred Sicilians had accordingly landed at Reggio, and defeated the Royal troops. Almost all the provinces of the kingdom refuse to make fresh elections, protesting in favour of the legality of those already made, and the illegality of the decree by which they have been annulled. All the gendarmes and a battalion of chasseurs have been disarmed in this province, and 12,000 men have marched into Calabria. Teramo has revolted. Charles Albert has sent a cabinet courier to demand payment for the expenses of the Neapolitan troops in Lombardy, and another contingent of soldiers; in case of refusal, the Sardinian ambassador will, it is said, take down the arms of Savoy, and depart; and Charles Albert, at the termination of the Austrian war, will demand satisfaction at the gates of Naples. The city of Naples was quiet on the departure of our latest advices, viz. on the 8th instant.

PRUSSIA.

The disturbances of the previous week were renewed at the close of the Whitsun holidays. On Wednesday, the 14th inst., crowds of people thronged the streets during the day; but they were kept back from the immediate vicinity of the hall of the Constituent Assembly. Rent on violence, however, they attacked the iron gates lately erected in front of the palace, and having forced them off their hinges, carried them away. Late in the evening, the attempts of the Burgher Guard to disperse the crowds in the streets unhappily occasioned bloodshed. A number of workmen went late in the afternoon to the Minister of War, with a demand for employment or money, and on their refusal to disperse the guard charged them with the bayonet, and five men were wounded.

The intelligence of this attack spread quickly throughout the city, and masses gathered with inconceivable rapidity in the vicinity of the arsenal and the palace. Led by some speakers, who loudly urged them on, the former moved in a body towards the arsenal, and were closing round it when the Civic Guard fired upon them, killing one man and wounding four, two of whom subsequently died. The mob instantly fled, crying "To arms!" and "Barricades!"

The Civic Guard, alarmed at what they had done, abandoned the arsenal, and about eleven o'clock at night the mob stormed the building and took possession of all the muskets they found in it, which amounted, however, only to 700, together with some sabres, rifles, cuirasses, &c. The collection of ancient arms, which was arranged historically, was also plundered; some old banners were torn to pieces, and several fine models demolished.

Several of the offenders were apprehended next day, when tranquility was restored in the city.

Several of the Ministry have resigned, viz. Baron Von Canitz (the Minister of War), Baron Arnheim (Foreign Affairs), and Graf Schwerin (Public Worship) Baron Von Canitz has been replaced by the Ministry of War by General Von Schreckenstein; the other posts have not yet been filled up.

The vote of the Chamber which empowered a commission to draw up an entirely new draft of a constitution, while the sections are considering that proposed by the government, considered by the public as a virtual setting aside of the royal proposition, has been stated as the cause of these resignations; the late events have also much shaken the Ministry.

The Bremen papers state that official information has been received at Posen of a camp of 100,000 Russian troops now assembled in the neighbourhood of Kalisch. Everybody fears a German war, and General Pfuhl is preparing to leave in all haste for Berlin. Martial law has been discontinued in the Grand Duchy.

AUSTRIA.

The Emperor has addressed a letter to the Ban of Croatia, who had taken it upon himself to convoke a Diet on his own responsibility. The Ban is told that this act is illegal, and is ordered at once to dissolve his Diet.

The Austrian papers publish an address of the Emperor to the inhabitants of Lower Austria. After adverting to the reception he met with in Tyrol, he says, that the loyalty and love of that province, too, have been tested on this occasion. The gratitude of the people for the free institutions granted to them has fully convinced him of their high value, and he promises steadfastly to adhere to them. But to develop these institutions, and to put them into general practice, it is necessary, he says, that a Constituent Assembly should meet at Vienna, where he intends to open the proceedings. The address is dated Innspruck, 6th of June, and countersigned by the Ministers Wessenberg and Doblhoff. It is generally believed that the Emperor would leave Innspruck on the 18th or 20th inst., and that he would arrive at Vienna on the 25th, to be present at the opening of the Diet.

GERMAN STATES.

FRANKFORT.—On the 14th inst., in the German Parliament, a bill was proposed by the Naval Committee to call upon the Diet (being the only central board as yet constitutionally existing for Germany) was authorised to raise in the most manner, by contribution among the different Governments, the sum of 6,000,000 Prussian dollars (900,000*l.*) to defray the expenses of the formation of a German fleet. The Assembly, without entering into the estimates which had been placed before them, embracing a few frigates, corvettes, schooners, steamers, and 200 gun-boats for river service, almost unanimously voted the money. A very interesting discussion, with this sole addition, that the application of the sum should be left to the discretion of the Provisional Executive, to be created within a short time.

BOHEMIA

In Prague, the capital city, an insurrection broke out on the 12th inst., in consequence of the military having refused to the students the right of having to give cannon and ammunition to the students. The Czechish population of Prague sided with the latter. While Divine service was being performed in the house of Jesuit barracks, the students erected the crowds of people who had assembled in that place, and the mob marched upon the hotel of the Prince. All the troops were under arms, and opposed the passage of the people, who at once raised barricades in front of the hotel. The artillery was put in action, and succeeded in forcing the people back. At night-fall crowds of peasants arrived in the town to assist the insurgents. The Princess Windischgrätz was killed by a shot fired by a woman from the window of a neighbouring house. Many lives had been lost. A general and a colonel were amongst the slain.

The Princess Von Windischgrätz was the daughter of the late Princess Schwartzenberg, who perished by fire in Paris during the reign of the Emperor Napoleon. On the 13th all the principal streets and squares were occupied by the troops. The head-quarters of the insurgents were in the Carolinenthal. On the afternoon of that day they demanded a parley. Prince Windischgrätz would listen to nothing till the remaining barricades were removed. This was refused, and fighting recommenced, but of a skirmishing nature. The Czechisch troops fought heavily against the insurgents, and ultimately the latter retreated from the city with the garrison, and having occupied the heights commanding it, he bombarded the city for several hours. Prague is described as a heap of ruins. In several streets not a house escaped the cannon-balls. Several acts of atrocity have been committed. A National Guard who killed two students was crucified, and his house pillaged.

HUNGARY

We learn from Pesth (14th inst.) that the whole of the Italian regiment which revolted had made its submission, and been sent away to Cosmocne. It was found necessary to protect itself by a double line of National Guards against the rage of the great body of the people.

A serious insurrection has taken place in Servia. The insurgents entered the Hungarian territory, and burned some villages. A battalion of the garrison of Peterwaradin had marched against them. It is added that the Greek Archbishop of Carlowitz has urged the Wallachians to revolt against the Hungarians.

RUSSIA.

From the empire of despotism the intelligence received is of the destructive march, not of revolution, but of pestilence. The last accounts from Moscow state that the cholera morbus is making frightful progress. Of 463 persons attacked, from the 23rd to the 29th of May, no less than 305 died. The number of new cases on the 29th May alone amounted to 83, and the number of deaths to 49. The cholera has also broken out with great intensity at Jaroslaw, Robinski, and Kaluga, and so appears to be gradually advancing westward.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

No news of any importance has reached us this week from the Duchies. On the 10th instant the advanced posts of the Prussian troops were within half-an-hour's march of the town of Apenrade, and every precaution had been taken to prevent a surprise from the Danes. The streets had been unpaved, powerful barricades had been thrown up, and several of the approaches to the town also blocked up.

The island of Alsen is almost entirely abandoned by the Danes, who appear to have embarked for the main land to the north.

SWITZERLAND.

Letters from Berne, of the 15th inst., mention the receipt of despatches from the Government of the Grisons, of the 13th, announcing that an engagement had taken place on that day, between the Austrian and Lombard troops, in which there were several killed and wounded on both sides. The Government of the Grisons, fearing an invasion of the valley of Munster by the Austrians, had adopted precautionary measures, and announced that the disbanding of the troops, ordered by the Diet, be adjourned. The Directory had approved the conduct of the Grisons, and directed that those troops should remain under the command of Colonel Gerwer until further orders.

GREECE.

Accounts from Athens to the 9th inst. mention that the regular Greek army is about to be increased on the proposal of the Minister of War.

The Chamber was slowly continuing its examination of the budget of 1848. The insurrection of the provinces having been suppressed, the volunteer corps have been disarmed.

The Greek Ministry has refused to deliver up to the Turkish Government an Ottoman subject named Nadir, guilty of the attempted assassination of M. Musurus. It is feared that this refusal will lead to reprisals on the part of the Sublime Porte.

On the 2d Sir Stratford Canning arrived at the Piræus from Constantinople, and immediately landed with all his family. The next day he had the honour of dining with the King, after having been admitted to a private audience.

EGYPT.

According to intelligence to the 9th inst. from Alexandria, Mehemet Ali continued in the same state of mind, bordering on imbecility.

Ibrahim Pasha was daily introducing new measures of economy in the administration of affairs, and his officers, from fear of his displeasure, exhibited the greatest activity in the execution of the orders, as several had found themselves suddenly displaced without any form or ceremony.

The fellahs, or country people, whose oppression under Mehemet Ali's rule excited compassion, are now in a worse state under Ibrahim, owing to the number of men he is constantly requiring for the increase in the army, the works at the barrage of the Nile, and the fortifications of the towns of Rosetta and Damietta

The greatest misery exists throughout the Delta. Most of the able-bodied of the inhabitants have been forcibly carried away, and in the villages scarcely any are now to be seen but the aged and the maimed. As many of the fellahs were concealing themselves in order to avoid the Government agents, or were crossing over to Syria, a system of passports had been introduced, without which no man is allowed to pass from one village to another, and by this means none can escape

Ibrahim Pasha seemed to have the intention of gradually abolishing the manufacture of cotton cloths in Egypt, and had recently discharged from his service the chief superintendent of his cotton-mills. This is generally considered a very wise step on his part, as manufactured goods can now be imported from England at a cheaper rate than they can be made in this country; but Mehemet Ali was fascinated by the flattering theory of being independent of every other country, and submitted to a yearly heavy loss. There are at present about twenty-five cotton factories in Cairo and the Delta, and fifteen in the upper country, with spinning-jennies, carding machines, looms, and machinery of every description.

Trade was dull at Alexandria, and business transactions are scarce.

UNITED STATES.

Advices have been received this week. The proceedings of Congress since the departure of the last steamer do not seem important. The slavery question had been discussed to a slight extent in relation to the Oregon territory but without any special result. The Retaliatory Postal Bill, regulating the rates of postage on letters sent from and brought into the ports of the United States by steam-packets and other vessels, had passed the Senate, with very unimportant amendments, which would be concurred in by the House. The bill originated in the House, and was passed by a large majority then

The prospects of General Taylor in regard to the Presidential Whig Convention appear to ascend apparent. The breach between his supporters and those of Clay to have widened.

There had been a large meeting of the "friends of Ireland" held in New York, addresses being passed of a sympathising tendency to the discontented of the sister country

The political accounts which had reached the States from Mexico announced that the Mexican Chamber of Deputies on the evening of the 17th of May, had confirmed, by a vote of 51 to 35, the treaty of peace with the United States. No official accounts had been received to guarantee these satisfactory tidings, but little doubt appeared to be entertained of its accuracy. The intelligence diffused general joy.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

Alarm had been excited in Belize, the capital of the Mosquito territory, by the continued arrivals of large numbers of refugees from Bacalar, in Yucatan, caused by the horrible atrocities of the Indians, who had completely gained the mastery of the whole population. On the 18th of April the town of Bacalar was closely invaded, and set on fire in three different places by the Indians, who kept up an incessant fire, which was returned by the inhabitants for three whole days. The town was subsequently evacuated and surrendered to the Indians by the Spanish inhabitants.

The Indians had appeared in considerable force opposite the town of Belize; and their appearance being threatening, Colonel Fancourt, her Majesty's Superintendent of the settlement, called a special meeting of the inhabitants; and the result was that £5000 currency was immediately voted and placed at the disposal of Colonel Fancourt, who further called into service the Vigilante for troops. The Governor of Jamaica accordingly ordered the brig Confiance to be prepared with all speed, and she was to start in a few days for Belize with troops, ammunition, and provisions, to be followed by other supplies in other vessels as soon as they could be prepared. The next packet will, in all probability, bring us intelligence of a collision between the Indians of Yucatan and the British forces.

MEXICO.

The treaty between the Mexicans and Americans arranged by Mr. Trist, it was generally expected at the departure of the mail on the 16th ult., would be signed immediately; and it was also believed that Paredes, with the war party, would rise and carry on the struggle with greater obstinacy than ever. The Mexican authorities had issued some arbitrary edicts, very unpopular to the Americans, who so lately were masters of the country. Mercantile matters were a little reviving at Vera Cruz.

WEST INDIES.

From Jamaica we learn that his Excellency the Governor had prorogued the House of Assembly to Tuesday, the 20th June. Several shocks of earthquakes had been felt in various parts of the island, but no great damage had been done. A fire had occurred at Leogan estate, in the parish of St. James, and two cane pieces were destroyed.

The Hon. W. C. Macdougall had been appointed Commissary and Judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty.

In Jamaica, and throughout the West India Islands generally, the weather was fine, and it was anticipated that full average crops would be secured.

In the financial state and prospects of the West India colonies, no improvement is to be noticed. The islands of Curacoa, St. Thomas, and Porto Rico were crowded with emigrants

The state of the republican island of St. Domingo is getting rapidly worse, and it is a prey to the most sanguinary factions. Windisgrätz and the arrivals from its various ports, including many refugees, had taken place at Jamaica. The constitution was virtually abolished, and the President had assumed absolute power. Business was completely suspended, and a base depreciated metallic currency had been put in circulation.

From the French West India colonies we learn that the freedom of the negroes was proclaimed at Basse Terre, Guadaloupe, on the 27th ult., and at St. Pierre, Martinique, on the 23d. The former island was perfectly tranquil, but much apprehension was expressed lest the negro population, dazzled by their recently acquired freedom, should refuse to descend down to the continued industry necessary to secure the crops. At St. Pierre, in the latter island, an insurrectionary movement of the blacks and coloured people took place on the day of their emancipation, in the course of which an obnoxious planter's houses were attacked, and set on fire, and thirty-two persons, men, women, and children, when attempting to escape, were forced back into the flames, and perished. Society appeared on the verge of total disorganisation in Martinique.

INDIA.

Advices, in anticipation of the Bombay mail of the 12th ult., have been received this week. The intelligence is interesting. Details of the murder of the two British officers at Moultan, the capital of the Western district of the dominions of Lahore, are given.

Moultan, which was taken by Runjeet Singh in 1818, after a severe struggle, has long been remarkable as an emporium of merchandise, and is now the third city of the kingdom.

The Governor of Moultan had for some time been considered to be disaffected towards the Sikh rule. He was desired to settle his accounts and to pay up the arrears; but, having paid a visit to Lahore, he contrived by intrigues to baffle the order. A successor was named to take his place,—and, on the occasion on a former occasion, two young officers—viz. Mr. Vans Agnew, of the Bengal Civil Service, and Lieutenant Anderson, of the Bombay Fusiliers—accompanied the newly-appointed governor, Khan Singh, to Moultan. They left Lahore on the 5th of April, and reached their destination on the 18th of that month. They were well received by the old governor, Dewan Moolraj, who showed them the fort. A quarrel, however, was picked with some of their followers, and both of the Englishmen were wounded. Seeing themselves about to be massacred by treachery, they retreated with Khan Singh and their escort to a small fort outside the walled town of Moultan, where for 24 hours they considered themselves protected, but the troops from Moultan hastened to attack the fort. Lieutenant Anderson being severely wounded, was unable to rise from his bed; Mr. Vans Agnew shook hands with him and bade him an eternal adieu. He then prepared to defend himself, but his pistols had been tampered with; and as the crowd of soldiers, with which his escort had "fraternised," entered the room, he drew his sword and cut down the first assailant, but he was instantly shot, and his body, like that of his companion, Lieutenant Anderson, and that of their apothecary, Mr. Wilkinson, hacked to pieces, and treated with every indignity. The new governor, Khan Singh, was wounded, and made prisoner by the troops of Moultan.

This insurrection, it was thought, would produce dangerous consequences, for the Dewan Moolraj will be joined by all the disaffected and turbulent men of the late Sikh army, who were dismissed at the time of the conquest. The season was adverse to campaigning, for the heats in that part of the Punjab are intolerable in the months of May, June, July, August, and September. Orders were instantly issued at Lahore to send a corps of the army down to Moultan (a distance of 200 miles); but they were countermanded when the fresh of the two officers was received. It was said, on the day of the departure of the mail, that a force of four regiments would be dispatched from Bombay to Kurrachee; but it was feared that they would not be able to reach that place in consequence of the south-west monsoon, which was then approaching. The Indus was, however, in a fit state for being navigated by the steamers and flat-bottomed boats, which could come within one mile and a half of Moultan by going up the Chenanb (Acesines).

In other parts of India peace prevails. Oude is, however, disturbed, and may require to be managed by the British authorities. In the Nizam's territory there are hopes entertained of an amelioration, as the Sovereign and Resident are at last on terms, and are willing to introduce good measures.

Mr. Clerk, the ex-Governor of Bombay, took his departure from that place on the 6th of May, sincerely regretted. Lord Falkland, who was sworn into office on the 1st, had recovered from his indisposition, and was to hold a levee on the 13th of May.

The management of the Indian navy engrossed much attention at Bombay, especially subsequent to the suicide of Mr. Purser Harrison, who attributed all his misfortunes to his superiors. He had been dismissed for neglect of duty as Deputy Superintendent of the stores.

The affairs of the Union Bank continued to be discussed at Calcutta, but with little prospect of a satisfactory termination.

CHINA.

News to the 26th of April have reached us from Hong-Kong. In Canton general quiet prevailed; an unprovoked attack by some Chinese on two foreigners, as they were proceeding in a Hong boat to visit the warehouses of their principals, met with summary redress on the representation of Her Majesty's Consul, and the Chinese were taken and punished by seizure in the "cangue," &c. Trade continued inactive, but there appeared no want of money At Shanghai the demands made by the Consul, for the delivery of the ringleaders in the attack on the Consul's residence, had been complied with, and the parties were identified and punished; the Toutai of Shanghai had been dismissed for his supineness in the business; and a Mandarin, Samqua, formerly a merchant at Canton, had been appointed to succeed him. This affair has thus been satisfactorily brought to a termination, to which, no doubt, the despatch of her Majesty's ship Espeigle, to Nankin, with her Majesty's Vice-Consul, largely contributed. Some slight demonstration was made by some Mizes at the officers and Mandarins were passing through the streets; but the parties were immediately apprehended and punished by exposure in the "cangue."

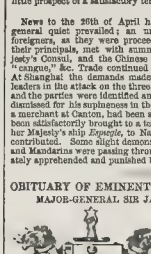
MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JAMES FULLERTON DUNDAS, BART.



SIR JAMES FULLERTON DUNDAS, of Richmond, in Surrey, and Llanelly, in Carmarthenshire, descended from an ancient Scottish family, that of Dundas, of Manour, in the county of Clackmannan. His father, Sir David Dundas was one of the medical attendants of George III., and was created a Baronet in 1815. Sir David Dundas was third son of Ralph Dundas, of Manour, and grandson of Ralph Dundas, of Manour, by Helen, his wife, sister of Bishop Burnett. The Manour family was a scion of the great northern house of Dundas of that ilk. Sir David married Isabella, daughter of William Robertson, Esq., of Richmond, by whom he had three sons and a daughter. The eldest of these (William) was his successor; and he was succeeded by the second brother (Sir James Fullerton), the subject of this notice, who inherited the title the 13th November, 1840. Sir James was for many years an officer in the East India Company's Service, and was a Major-General of the Bengal Army.

Sir James, who never married, died at his seat, near Richmond, on the 16th instant, in the sixty-third year of his age. He is succeeded in his titles and estates by his nephew, now Sir John Burnett Dundas, a Captain R.N., who married, the 30th December, 1828, Caroline, third daughter of the Rev. John Jefferys, rector of Barnet, in Surrey.

THOMAS STEELE, ESQ.

POOR TOM STEELE! Well may he applied to him the words of Shakspeare's Mark Antony upon Brutus:—

This was the noblest Roman of them all:
All the conspirators, save only he,
Did that they did in envy of great Cæsar;
He only, in a general honest thought
And common good to all, made one of them.
His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

"Honest Tom Steele" was born at Derrymore, in the county of Clare, in 1788, and received his education at the University of Cambridge, where he obtained distinction for his scientific acquirements. His family went to Ireland from Somersetshire in the time of Charles II., and bore, originally, the surname of Champion. The death of an uncle placed him in possession of his hereditary property just at the time when the Spaniards rose in insurrection against the tyranny of Ferdinand VII.; and one of Steele's first acts was to fit out and fill with arms a vessel which he brought to Cadiz. He accepted a commission from the Cortes, and distinguished himself in several engagements against the French, who had come to the aid of the Spanish Monarch. The struggle, however, proved vain, and Steele returned to Ireland, to devote himself heart and soul to O'Connell, then engaged in the mighty efforts to obtain Catholic Emancipation. In all the plans of his great leader, Mr. Steele was an enthusiastic coadjutor, and at the celebrated Clare Election of 1828 he seconded the nomination of Mr. O'Connell. Subsequently, his character for Head Pacificator, he rendered most essential service to the community in tranquillising the disturbed districts of North Tipperary. Mr. Steele was included with O'Connell in the famous indictment, and shared in the fortunes of the writ of error. Despite of lost wealth and broken down fortunes, he persevered in agitation with honest ardour, and wild though powerful eloquence, until the death of O'Connell, when his spirits totally gave way in his grief for his kind. He became an undone man. A contemporary paper, the Standard, thus eloquently describes his ultimate fate:—

"With a broken spirit and a broken heart, and a broken fortune, he died almost friendless at an inn in London—a pauper, alas! but not a beggar. He was a follower of O'Connell in everything but that. When, in consequence of a late deplorable attempt, his destitution was made known, many who differed from his opinions hastened to his relief; and in a few days contributions were poured in which would soon have swelled into a fortune. There could have been no doubt about it. But Steele was not of Ireland's 'mendicant patriots.' His gratitude shed tears at the offer which his noble nature would not permit him to accept. The country which he loved, and that from which he sought to separate, strangely contrasted in their conduct towards him. Ireland gave him wreath, England death. Ireland gave him a grave. How bitter must have been the reflections of that death-bed! Poor fellow! what must have been his feelings when he found Lord Brougham, whom he had so often denounced, hastening to his aid, and Colonel Perceval, chief among the Orangemen, watching by his death-bed! Fare thee well, noble, honest, victimized Tom Steele! A braver spirit, a gentler heart, never left earth—but ye humbly hope for that home where the weary find rest."

Mr. Steele died at Peele's Coffee-house, in Fleet-street, from the host of which hotel he received every care and attention during his last illness.

LADY ELIZABETH MONCREIFFE.

HER Ladyship died on the 17th instant, in Chapel-street, Grosvenor-place, in consequence of severe burns accidentally received a fortnight before. She was the eldest daughter of George Ramsay, eighth Earl of Dalhousie, and widow of Sir Thomas Moncreiffe, Bart., of Moncreiffe. Her marriage took place 13th April, 1786, and its issue was one son, the late Sir David Moncreiffe, Bart.; and one daughter, Georgina, Countess of Bradford.

Lady Elizabeth Moncreiffe was, at the period of her decease, in her seventy-ninth year.

NEW MUSEUM OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—On Wednesday the extensive premises originally occupied as a theatre by Ben Jonson, and known as the Playhouse, in Portugal-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, and latterly used as show-rooms, by Alderman Copeland and Co., the extensive china manufacturers, were taken possession of by the Royal College of Surgeons, who are about to erect a museum on its site for the reception of the celebrated Hunterian collection, presented by Government to the College.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, &c. FOR THE WEEK ENDING JUNE 17.—The number of births registered by the Registrar-General for the metropolitan and suburban districts, during the week ending June 17, was 1956, of which 925 were males, and 643 females. This number is less than that of the preceding week by 103. The deaths of the week numbered 1009, of which 542 were males, and 467 females. This number exceeds the weekly average for the last five springs by 6, and the deaths of the preceding week by 68. The excess of deaths over the average is chiefly under the following heads:—Small-pox, 44 (average 17); scarlatina, 76 (average 24); diarrhœa, 31 (average 9); and typhus 60 (average 30).

LAMBETH PALACE.—ADDITIONS BY THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

THE GARDEN FRONT.

In the Memoir of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Howley in our Journal for Feb. 19, we incidentally referred to the many and costly restorations and additions executed at Lambeth Palace, at the expense to his Grace of nearly £30,000. We are now enabled, by the kindness of Edward Blore, Esq., the architect, to present our readers with the annexed Illustrations of the principal portions of the additional buildings. With the general history of the Palace the public is already familiar; so that our descriptive observations apply to the new portions of the edifice.

Our Views show the Garden Front; Principal, or Grand Staircase; Long Corridor; and the Great Dining-Room. This last, however, is not a new erection; it being part of the old palatial buildings, and was erstwhile the "guard-chamber;" but, since it has been completely restored under the able direction of Mr. Blore, we have thought it advisable to give a representation of it.

The Garden Front is an excellent bit of domestic architecture of the Tudor character; and the projecting portions of the building, the bays, cinquefoil-headed and strongly mullioned windows, battlements, gables, towers, and clustered chimney-shafts, combine to form a very picturesque and effective tout ensemble.

The Chief Entrance is in the courtyard; and, passing through it, the entrance-hall is attained, a lofty, square apartment, lighted by a lofty window over the door, and having a nicely groined roof, the groins springing from shafts at the corners of the hall. A flight of steps leads from the hall to a spacious landing, underneath which, at either side of the stairs, are passages leading to the domestic offices. To the height of this landing the hall is wainscoted. The balustrades to the stairs, and landing, are formed of cinquefoil-headed arches. At the top of the stairs, and in continuation of the landing, is a lofty arched recess, whence doors lead to corridors on either hand; and across this recess a screen is introduced, consisting of three arches supporting a frieze, and crowned with a gallery, having a balustrade corresponding in style to that to the stairs. The decorative enrichments to this screen, in the frieze, and spandrils of the arches, are of very good character. On the gallery occasion of Royal or distinguished visits, the chaplains of the Archbishop are congregated, to do honour to the visitors. The appearance of this hall and staircase is very elegant.

The view of the Corridor which we give, includes the landing on the grand staircase; and in its great length are shown the doors of communication with a morning, drawing, and dining rooms, and servants' waiting-room, with the entrance to the guard-chamber. The ceiling is divided into compartments, having bosses at the intersections of the beams; and it is of light stone-colour. The staircase seen in our view leads to sleeping apartments.

The Great Dining-Room, or Guard-Chamber, is a very noble apartment, and its renovation does infinite credit to the taste of the architect. The roof is of oak, panelled in compartments, and is supported by bold arches springing from octangular corbels, the spandrils of the arches being filled by quatrefoils in circles and trefoil mouldings. On the cambled sides of the roof, arches, with similar enrichments in the spandrils, stretch between the great arches supporting the roof; and on the walls, also, arches span from corbel to corbel, and uphold an embattled frieze. The windows to the apartment are lofty and arched. The fireplace is [illegible] and [illegible] character. The room is [illegible]ted; and above the wainscoting, which has interesting series of portraits [illegible] of high merit—of the various learned prelates who have filled the see of Canterbury, forms an appropriate and striking decoration.

THE PALACE CHAPEL.

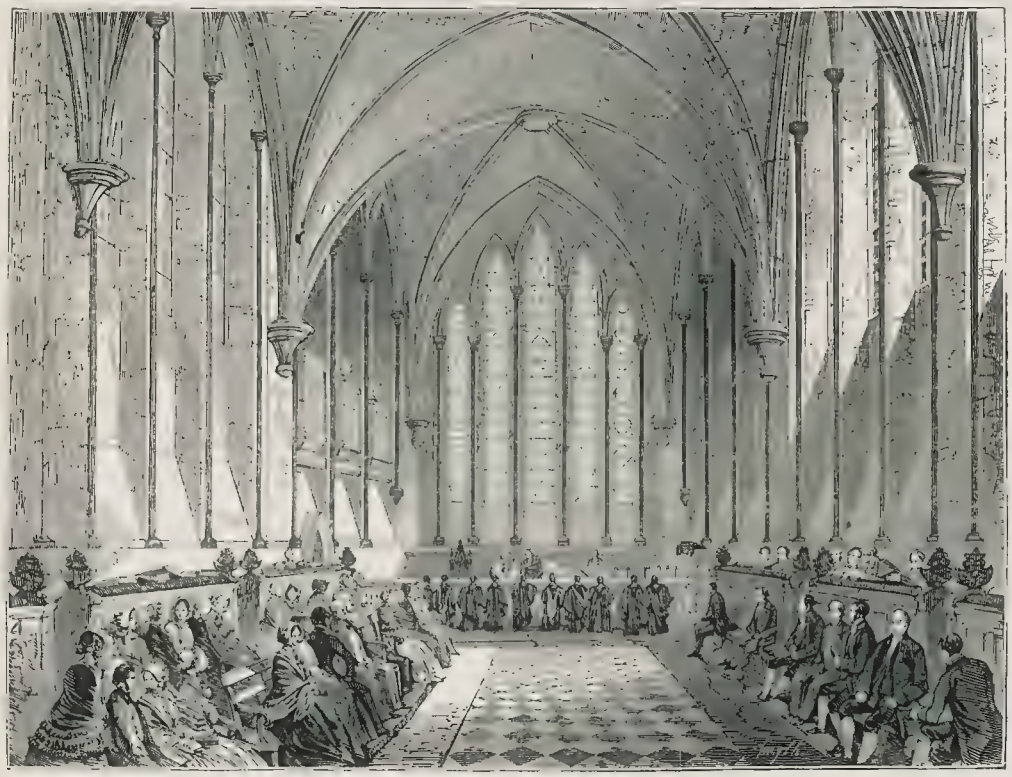
The Chapel has also been repaired by the munificence of the late Archbishop; and, on Sunday last, his Lordship's successor, Archbishop Sumner, held his first Ordination here, exceeding in number any that has been held for some years. The oaths having been administered by Felix Kynvett, Esq., the [illegible] Secretary, the morning service for the day was read by the Rev. John Thomas, M.A., domestic Chaplain to the Archbishop; and the sermon preached by the Rev. Henry Raikes, M.A., Chancellor of the Diocese of Chester.

After this, the Archbishop and Clergy proceeded to the communion table, where the following candidates were admitted into Holy Orders in the presence of the congregation:—

Deacons: William Keating, M.A., [illegible] Coll., Oxon; [illegible] Howell, B.A., Pemb. Coll., Oxon; Arthur [illegible], B.A., Queen's Coll.; [illegible], B.A., Trin. Coll.; [illegible] Watts, B.A., Line. Coll.; Arthur [illegible], B.A., Caius Coll., Camb.; Edw. Lewes Cutts, B.A., Queen's Coll., Oxon; [illegible], B.A., Trin. Coll.; James Scratton, B.A., St. Jon's Coll.; [illegible], B.A., Trin. Coll.; Wm. Thornhill, B.A., Cath. Hall.—Priests: [illegible], B.A., Christ Coll., Oxon; Jas. Wm. Conant, B.A., St. John's Coll., Oxon; W. J. Daniell Mathias, B.A., Bras. Nose Coll., Oxon; J. W. Tomkins, B.A., Worcester Coll., Oxon; R. H. Cooke, B.A., Sidney Sussex Coll., Cam.; H. F. Whisk, B.A., [illegible].

We subjoin a few details of the Chapel, which bear [illegible] marks of antiquity, and are, in our opinion of its being coeval with the time when the estate first became a fixed and archiepiscopal residence. The interior is divided into an inner and outer chapel by an elaborately carved screen; but the roof is concealed by a flat paneling, embellished with the arms of the Archbishops Laud, Juxon, and Cornwallis. At the east end are five long lancet-shaped lights; and on each side are three triplicated windows, resembling those in the Temple Church. These windows once contained some finely painted [illegible] representing portions of the Scriptural history; they were put up by Cardinal Morton, and the restoration of a part of them was one of the charges brought against Archbishop Laud on his trial: the glass subsequently fell a sacrifice to the blind rage of the Puritans. Against the central range of the west window, (beside the Lollard's Tower,) which has been closed up, is affixed a small semi-hexagon kind of Gothic shrine, supported by an angel holding a shield sculptured with the arms of Juxon. This chapel was despoiled during the civil wars, but was renovated by Archbishop Juxon; the screen is most probably Archbishop Laud's addition, whose arms it bears. Adjoining, on the south side, is the Archbishop's seat or stall; and on either hand is a range of [illegible] stalls, for the officers of his household, with seats below for the male servants. The seats for his Grace's family are over the vestry-room, near the east end, and immediately opposite is a plain moveable pulpit.

THE CORRIDOR.



ORDINATION IN THE CHAPEL OF LAMBETH PALACE, ON SUNDAY LAST

[illegible] OF THE PEERS IN THE PRINCE'S CHAMBER, AT WESTMINSTER

ADDRESSES TO THE QUEEN FROM THE CONVOCATION OF THE CLERGY OF THE UNIVERSITIES.

The Queen held a Court on Saturday afternoon, at Buckingham Palace, for the reception on the throne of addresses from the Convocation of the Clergy from the University of Oxford, and from the University of Cambridge.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by the members of the Upper House, and Prolocutor and Lower House, in his archiepiscopal robes, arrived at the Palace shortly before three o'clock, from the Jerusalem Chamber, where the Convocation of the Clergy had assembled. The deputation included the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Bishop of Bangor, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, &c. Her Majesty received the address on the throne, Prince Albert being by her side. Sir George Grey, her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department, was in attendance. The Archbishop of Canterbury having read the address, the Queen received it, and was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:—

"I receive with cordial satisfaction your assurances of loyal and affectionate attachment to my throne and person. It is my earnest desire to promote the welfare and happiness of my people by the maintenance of peace and tranquility, and by measures calculated to extend the influence of our holy religion, which is the sure foundation of national prosperity. I rely with entire confidence on the wisdom and earnestness in inculcating the principles of Christian truth and your zeal and earnestness in inculcating the principles of Christian truth and your real and earnestness in inculcating the principles of Christian truth and charity; and I derive satisfaction from the assurance of your co-operation in increasing the efficiency of the Church for the accomplishment of the great work for which it was established. I trust that, by the blessing of God on the means adopted for the important end, the inestimable benefits of pure and undefiled religion may be generally diffused throughout all classes of the community." The Archbishop of Canterbury received the answer from the Queen, and had the honour to kiss hands, and the Convocation then retired from the presence of the Sovereign.

The deputation from the University of Oxford was next ushered in, to present a loyal address to her Majesty on the throne. The Duke of Wellington appeared in his robes as Chancellor of the University, and wore the insigns of the Garter and the Golden Fleece. His Grace was supported by the Vice-Chancellor, the Rev. Dr. Symonds, and several University dignitaries. The Duke of Wellington read the address, and, kneeling before the Queen, presented it to her Majesty. The Queen having received the address, returned a most gracious answer, which was then delivered by the Chancellor, who, having done so, then retired from the presence of the Sovereign.

A similar deputation and address from the University of Cambridge was presented to her Majesty. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, as Chancellor of the University, read the address to the Queen, and afterwards presented it to her Majesty. The Queen returned a most gracious answer, which her Majesty delivered to the Prince. The Prince Chancellor and the deputation from the University then withdrew from the presence of the Sovereign.

THE JERUSALEM CHAMBER, in which the Convocation assembled, is, perhaps, the most interesting portion remaining of the College at Westminster. With the Deanery, and the Dean's Hall, and Prebendal Houses, it incloses a small quadrangular paved court, the only entrance to which is from the passage leading into the cloisters from Great Dean's-yard.

Some remains of pictures of the days (of Henry the Eighth's time), and somewhat later, are preserved in the windows of the apartments communicating with the Jerusalem Chamber; and in an ante-room is an ornamented niche, probably for a piscina. The Chamber itself, which is 58 feet in length, and 19 feet in width, was repaired in the summer of 1820. The ceiling is coved; and the chimney-piece, of cedar (stated to imitate oak), is charged with arms. The same arms are represented in the large north window, together with seven small historical and scriptural subjects, in stained and painted glass, probably of the time of Richard II. Against the side walls, in frames, are remains of the old tapestry hangings of the Choir of the Abbey Church; and against the south wall is the well-known curious painting of King Richard II., seated in the Coronation Chair. Henry IV. breathed his last in this chamber, into which he had been brought when seized with his final illness, whilst worshipping at St. Edward's Shrine, on March 20, 1413. In early life it had been predicted that "he should die Jerusalem," and the sick King regarded his approaching death as a fulfilment of the prophecy.

either by contempt, neglect, or persecution in the unevenly balanced social scale? It cannot be right or wise that hers should be at once the most important and most despised of the domestic classes which fill the measure of an English home.

It is very clear, then, that you ought to seek to elevate, rather than depress her in the social scale, if you place any sincere value upon the blessings of Family Education. Give her as much companionship with your guests and acquaintances as is compatible with her duties to her charge. Do not banish her from the domestic affections; and if you feel a parting sorrow, let it at least not be a corrupt and selfish one, if she should happen to marry from your home. Keep an acquaintance with her, after you have done with her; and let your children cherish friendship for her in life, after the world has emancipated them from her authority. Never let her approach destitution, and then you will not require an annual fancy fair for its relief. Establish some system of providence for those who are destined to go single to the grave; and when you have done this, you will have accomplished a grand, a noble, and a necessary reform.—A reform in the condition, prospects, and happiness of those whom you entrust with your Family Education.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

STATE OF IRELAND. Earl FITZWILLIAM moved resolutions approving of the wisdom, energy, and prudence of the Irish Executive during the recent period of difficulty; also expressing regret at the continuance of distress in Ireland, and at the little benefit derived from the measures of relief passed last session; and declaring it the opinion of the House that further measures were requisite to remedy the evils and develop the resources of that country. The noble Earl also moved the presentation of an address to her Majesty founded on those resolutions. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE opposed the motion and moved the previous question, which was agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

DERBY ELECTION.—Sir J. PAKINGTON moved the issuing of a writ for the borough of Derby, vacant by the election of Mr. Strutt and the Hon. Leveson Gower having been declared void. Sir R. PEEL opposed the motion; and the House, on a division, passed the motion by a majority of 112 to 97.

SUGAR DUTIES. ADJOURNED DEBATE

The adjourned debate was resumed by Mr. F. W. MILES, who supported the amendment.

In the discussion which ensued the Government measure was supported by Mr. HAWES, and strongly opposed by Lord G. BENTINCK, in a speech of great length, in the course of which he charged the authorities of the Colonial Office with holding certain despatches of the Governors of the West Indian Islands, from the Committee which had investigated the question of sugar duties, because those despatches were favourable to the policy of protection.

Lord J. RUSSELL defended the Colonial Secretary (Earl Grey) from the imputation, as being unworthy of him. The charge of fraud could not be fairly or justly brought against any of the noble lords or gentlemen who usually held high office in this country—it was a charge more applicable to those who followed the pursuits in which Lord G. Bentinck had been so long engaged.

Earl GREY was incapable of such conduct as the noble Lord (G. Bentinck) had imputed to him

Mr. DISRAELI defended the conduct of his noble friend (Lord G. Bentinck) from the imputation of impropriety which the noble Lord (Russell) had sought to fasten upon him.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said a few words in support of his noble friend (Lord John Russell), and the debate was again adjourned.

The House rose at two o'clock.

IRELAND.—From the proceedings at a meeting of the Irish Confederation held in Dublin on Wednesday, it would appear (though the matter is not quite settled yet) that Mr. John O'Connell intended to retire from public life rather than accede to the constitution of the proposed Repeal League to be formed out of the Repeal Association and Confederation. The Confederation, in anticipation of the formation of the Irish League, adjourned sine die, giving power to a council of twenty-one to conduct the affairs of the Confederation until the Irish League be formed.

FALL IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—On Thursday evening, the bakers throughout the metropolis lowered the price of the 4lbs. loaf one halfpenny. Those at the west-end now only charge 7d. for the best quality; the second-rate 6d. and 5½d. Many, however, in populous districts, are selling it at 5d., weighed on delivery.

RAGGED SCHOOL UNION.—Since Lord Ashley's motion relative to the condition of the juvenile poor of the metropolis was brought before the House of Commons on the 6th instant, the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert have been pleased to make a donation of £100 in aid of the funds of the Ragged School Union.

It has been agreed to by the National Assembly that the banquet commence the discussion on the Constitution on Monday next. No public acting will take place on that day, nor on the succeeding one, as some changes are to be then effected in the internal arrangements of the Chamber.

The Duke of Normanby and the entire staff of the British Embassy, ex grande tenue, were received by the Executive Government at the Luxembourg on Thursday last.

Letters from Gueret, in the department of the Creuse, dated the 19th instant, state that the number of killed in the late collision between the troops and the peasants amounts to twenty-two. The hospitals are filled with the wounded

ITALY

The following is the draught of the Constitution which has just been presented to the Chambers—

"The Roman Catholic religion is declared to be the religion of the State, to the exclusion of all others. The King shall be obliged to profess that religion; and should he change it, he is to be considered as having forfeited his throne. The King of Sicily shall not wear any other crown. The sovereignty of the nation is to reside in three distinct powers—legislative, executive, and judiciary. The legislative power is to be fixed in the Parliament exclusively. The Parliament to be composed of two chambers, the Peers and Commons. The number of Peers is fixed at 120. The number of the Commons is to be regulated by an electoral law. The Parliament will assemble at Palermo on the 12th of every January. The King may convoke a Parliament for extraordinary occasions. Every Parliamentary session to last three months. The King may dissolve the Parliament; but the members of the Parliament so dissolved may be re-elected. In case of such dissolution, the King shall be bound to summon a new Parliament within six months. The power to propose new laws is to belong to either Chamber. The National Guard is an institution essentially constitutional. It is to be organised by a special law. The freedom of speech and of the press is secured by law. The abuse of this right to be punished by a special law."

FIRST REPORT ON COMMERCIAL DISTRESS.

THE Secret Committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the recent Commercial Distress, and how far it has been affected by the laws for regulating the issue of bank notes payable on demand, and who were empowered to report from time to time to the House, have taken the subject fully into their consideration, and have agreed upon a report, in which they stated that, having concluded their investigation so far as relates to England, they have thought it advisable to report to the House their opinion on this branch of the subject, together with the evidence

To complete the labour entrusted to them, they observe that the inquiry must be extended to Scotland and Ireland, and they will proceed on this duty without delay.

After stating the nature of the evidence given, the report observes that there has been a general concurrence of opinion amongst the witnesses examined, that the primary cause of the distress was the deficient harvest, especially of the potato crop, in the year 1846, and the necessity of providing the means of payment in the year 1847 for the unprecedented importations of various descriptions of food which took place in that year

Among other causes, the deficient supply of cotton, the diversion of capital from its ordinary employment in commercial transactions to the construction of railroads, the undue extension of credit, especially in our transactions with the East, and exaggerated expectations of profit, have been stated by some witnesses as having contributed to the same result, and the committee see no reason to doubt that these causes have, in different degrees, in different parts of the country, produced the effect thus ascribed to them.

The committee observes, with respect to the period of the Commercial Distress in the Metropolis, that "the feeling of alarm which prevailed appears to have been immediately produced by the issue of the letter addressed by the Bank of England, on the 25th October, by the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer

"The fact that letter was, no doubt, an extraordinary exercise of power on the part of the Government; but the House has decided that, in the peculiar circumstances of the period, they were justified in taking that step. It will be seen from the evidence of Mr. Cotton, the Governor of the Bank in 1844, that the possibility of circumstances arising, in which some extraordinary measures might be called for in consequence of a state of monetary crisis, was not unforeseen by the Government at the time when the Act of 1844 was passed.

"The evidence which has been given as to the effects of the Act of 1844 has been contradictory. Its beneficial effects, as regards the issue of the country banks, have been admitted by many of the witnesses; and although some have suggested an alteration of its provisions, very few have contested the general principles on which it is founded.

"Your committee have had under their consideration, whether it is advisable that powers should be conferred by law upon the Government, to enable them to meet the occurrence of any circumstances which may call for extraordinary interference; but they have come to the conclusion that, looking to the impossibility of foreseeing what the precise character of the circumstances may be, and also what may be the measure best calculated to meet them, it is more expedient to leave to those with whom the responsibility of the Government may rest at the time, to adopt such measures as may appear to them best suited for the emergency.

"Your committee, therefore, after a careful review of all the evidence, are of opinion that it is not expedient to make any alteration in the Bank Act of 1844.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

ARCHITECTS', &c. ANNUITY AND REVERSIONARY INTEREST COMPANY. The first general meeting of proprietors was held on Monday, at the offices in Lincoln's-inn-fields, Mr. Sinkins presided. The meeting was called in compliance with the act of settlement, which provided that a general meeting should be held in the month of June. It was stated that the society had been established in March last, since which time 87 life policies had been issued, and assurances effected to the amount of 370. The statement of accounts was postponed until the next meeting. A complimentary vote to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

CITY OF LONDON COMMISSION OF SEWERS.—On Tuesday a Court of Sewers was held at Guildhall, Mr. Deputy Peacock in the chair. The business of the day was confined to receiving tenders for contracts, and hearing read the reports of the nuisance inspectors. One of the latter contained a detailed refutation of Mr Charles Cochrane's charges against the commissioners, with regard to the existence of nuisances in certain specified localities, from which it appeared that considerable exaggerations had been indulged in by the antagonists of the City of London Commission. The contract for making sewers in the neighbourhood of the Minories was given to Mr. Crooks, whose estimate was nearly three thousand pounds below that of the highest tender. His amount was £3869.

THE SOUTH LONDON FLORICULTURAL SOCIETY.—The exhibition of the fruits and flowers by the candidates for the prizes distributed by this society was held on Tuesday in the grounds of the Surrey Zoological Gardens. They were, as usual, displayed beneath large marquées, arranged and classified with great care. The collection was a very superb one, perhaps the best which has been exhibited under the auspices of this society. There was a great deal of company, and the promenade was enlivened by the band of musicians under the arrangement of the conductor M. Jullien. A great many medals were awarded. The gold Adelaide medal, for the best collection of miscellaneous plants (not orchideous), was won by Mr. Pawley; and the large silver medal for pelargoniums by Mr. F. Beck

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—The Quarterly General Court was held on Tuesday; Sir J. H. Lushington in the chair. The chairman announced that Mr. T. Thompson, M.P., that no official communication had been received from India relative to the death of the Rajah of Sattara, beyond the announcement of the fact. And in answer to Mr. Sullivan, he said that the East India company did intend to take some active means for the promotion of railways in India, and had granted an extension of time to the Bombay Company of four months to pay their deposit of £30,000. Some petitions were presented against idol worship in India.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOLS.—An examination of the large boys' school (in connection with the British and Foreign Schools Society) in Mr. Harbourlane, Camberwell, took place on Wednesday. The number of boys was about 250, and the large school-room was crowded with visitors. In this school a most successful attempt has been made to quit the beaten track in which so-called education is so much made to run; and the pleasing intelligent look of the boys, the readiness of their answers, and the exactness of their discipline, are in the highest degree creditable to their active and enlightened teacher, Mr. James, besides the ordinary exercises of reading, writing, spelling, &c., in which the boys acquitted themselves most satisfactorily, the classes were examined by their respective monitors in botany, in mental arithmetic, and in many other subjects calculated to awaken their mental powers generally and specially. Their answers in mental arithmetic were remarkably accurate and ready. They seemed perfectly familiar with both the theory and the methods of working fractions and all lower rules, and answered questions that would have puzzled a good many of their visitors. Dr. Hodgson, of Manchester, occupied the chair on the occasion, and at the request of the master he examined the class that sat next to him on the grammatical and logical construction of a passage which he took at random from a book which lay before him. The noble Lord expressed that they were acquainted not only with the rules of grammar, but with the elementary principles of logic.

ROYAL NAVAL FEMALE SCHOOL, RICHMOND.—The annual examination of this excellent institution took place on Tuesday last, in the presence of the Right Hon. Earl Manvers, President; Vice-Admiral Lord Norwich; W. Fitzroy, Sir Henry Baker, Bart., Countess Manvers, Lady Fitzroy, Lady Baker, and a number of the gentry of the district. The pupils, 82 in number, were examined in history, geography, geometry, French, and drawing, principally by the Rev. J. Hales, minister of the parish, and acquitted themselves in a manner which elicited the warm praise of all. One of the most striking features of the examination consisted in the performance of the musical classes, under the direction of W. C. Ayre, illustrating the results of a system of simultaneous instruction practised by that gentleman, which has been attended with the most pleasing results about 40 young ladies, after having passed through a rigorous examination on the theory of musical composition, proceed to the practical part of the science, and display admirable precision and neatness of execution, from the works of Osborne, Handel, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Czerny. After short addresses from the Rev. J. Hales and the Hon. Captain Maude, the proceedings terminated with prayer.

ASYLUM FOR AGED FREEMASONS.—The thirteenth annual festival, in aid of the funds of the Asylum for aged Freemasons, took place on Wednesday evening in the Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen-street. The object of the contemplated asylum is to provide that shelter and support in his latter days for the worthy, aged, and decayed Freemason, which many of the present age have already done for those connected with their happier hours, and dependent on their benevolence. About 150 gentlemen sat down to dinner. The Hon. Col. George Anson, M.P., took the chair. The company, after enjoying the pleasure of a concert upstairs, separated at a late hour, highly gratified with the evening's entertainment.

RAGGED SCHOOLS.—On Wednesday afternoon the second annual meeting of the friends and supporters of the Ragged School Established in Grotto-passage, High-street, Marylebone, was held at the Literary Institution, Edwards-street, Portman-square, and was attended by a large number of the neighbouring gentry. Lord Ashley, M.P., took the chair, and said he had no doubt whatever that ragged schools would soon receive Government aid. (Hear, hear). From what had passed in the House of Commons, and from private communications he had had with Government, he knew that a certain number of those poor, destitute, and helpless children who had obtained certificates of good conduct at the schools, and were qualified by a certain amount of education, would be transplanted to a soil where they might industriously, honestly, and happily pass the remainder of their days. (Hear, hear.) Sir George Gray, the Colonial Secretary, said to him (Lord Ashley) a few days ago, "If you take care to attend to the moral training of those children, imbue them with religious principles, and give them a knowledge of some industrial occupation so as to fit them for labour, then I do not hesitate to assert that the means at the disposal of Government will be employed to convey them to the British possessions abroad." The report was read and adopted, and the meeting separated.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY FOR BUILDING, ENLARGING, AND REPAIRING CHURCHES AND CHAPELS.—On Tuesday the Society held its regular meeting at their chambers, No. 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, when the Lord Bishop of London took the chair; and among the members present were the Bishops of Bangor, Gloucester and Bristol, and Norwich; Sir R. H. Inglis, Bart., M.P.; the Hon. Rev. C. L. Courtenay; the Very Rev. Archdeacon Hale; Rev. Dr. Spry; Dr. Wordsworth; H. R. Harris and J. Jennings; Joshua Watson, Esq.; C. F. Barnewall, Esq.; R. J. Barchard, Esq.; James Cocks, Esq.; A. Powell, Esq. The meeting commenced business by issuing orders for the payment of grants, amounting in nearly £3000, voted previously, to twelve parishes, for the building of five new churches, and the enlargement of seven other churches or chapels. The committee then voted fresh grants of money to twelve other parishes or districts, for the erection of six additional churches; the rebuilding, with enlargement, of three existing churches; and the increase of accommodation, by various means, in five others; and we learned some interesting information with regard to some of the places assisted. The proposed new churches are intended to be erected in the following districts; viz. St. James's, Devonport, one of the new districts constituted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the populous parish of St. Dunstan, with 5000 inhabitants. It comprises the poorest part of Morice Town; the population increases rapidly, chiefly in consequence of the establishment of new docks for the accommodation of war steamers and the formation of a railroad. The greater part of these people do not attend any place of worship, and live as pagans and heathens. Numerous public-houses have been licensed, and are growing up without any sort of useful education. Thorpe (the next in rotation) is a hamlet adjoining the city of Norwich, with a population of fifteen hundred persons. Sheeon is a new district formed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the parish of Cadorton, near Neath, in Glamorganshire, with a population of 2250 inhabitants. Headington Quarry, situated near Oxford. Neast, a district in the parish of Dean, containing two hundred hundred inhabitants, very many of whom are mariners. And, lastly, the newly-constituted district of St. Luke, in the island of Jersey, containing a population of 3250 persons. The churches to be rebuilt are—at Foulness Island, near Rochford, Essex, the present church of which parish is built of wood. The other two are at Llanfairfechan, near Bangor, North Wales; and at Wolsingham, in the county of Durham. These churches are all in a very dilapidated condition. The churches to be enlarged, &c., are, at Redbourne, near St. Albans, Rywell, St. Peter's, near Gateshead (Yorkshire); and Leigh, near Reigate. By means of the above works, to which the Incorporated society has thus contributed, upwards of 3800 sittings will be obtained, all of which are for the use of the poor, "free and unappropriated," and of these sittings no less than 1036 will be for children.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL MOVEMENT.—The formation of clubs throughout Dublin and the provinces is progressing rapidly. In Dublin alone there are no less than 40 clubs, each composed of 300 members, making in the aggregate 12,000 men.

All the Dublin Confederate Clubs are to hold an open air meeting on Sunday (to-morrow), at Donnybrook green.

Lord French has come out as a thorough advocate of the proposed union of Young and Old Ireland. A letter from that nobleman, who has been heretofore a decided "Moral Force" man, appears in the Freeman's Journal. His Lordship thus concludes: "The voice of the country seems to demand this union; and I concur in the general expectation that the proposed 'Irish League' will demonstrate with firmness and dignity, that the Irish people fully understand the value of their constitutional rights, and that they are resolved to vindicate those rights against infringement."

EJECTMENTS IN TIPPERARY.—We believe that a larger number of persons have been this year ejected than within any similar period within the oldest remembrance. In this county the number never reached half the amount it has arrived at within the last twelve months. Almost daily the sheriff, or his deputy, is engaged in the sad and melancholy work of levelling the houses of the rural population, who have no resource except the workhouse—not even the workhouse in many unions now, as, with few exceptions, all those institutions are densely crowded. During the present week the deputy-sheriff was engaged in Borrisokane, Portrue, &c. On Wednesday he ejected ten families from a place called Belleen; and it is stated that he has several other similar calls for the ensuing week.

PICTURESQUE SKETCHES OF LONDON, PAST AND PRESENT.

BY THOMAS MILLER.

CHAPTER VI.—LONDON PIC-NIC PARTIES.

OUR Londoners, besides being the first business people in the world, are dear lovers of holydays at such "times and seasons" as when they can, without much inconvenience, lay aside the graver considerations of money-making. Whether it be the gay party in the chesnut avenues of Bushy Park, under whose shade our artist has pictured them, or the merry group which that prince of humourists—PHIZ—has portrayed in our page as having landed from their wherry upon one of the swan-haunted aits beside the Thames, the same good-nature will be found amongst them all. You would scarcely believe that it could be the same Figgins, who so narrowly scanned your banking account the other day, that was there seated on the green-sward, drinking to everything and everybody in sparkling champagne. And you would almost doubt your eyes when you looked upon that laughter-loving young lady who was so ready to sing or play whatever you pleased to request; for you can scarcely conceive that she is the same stately Juliet, whom the other night it was so difficult to persuade to strike a note. Buckle, who belongs to the City Artillery Band, and who has received no end of petitions, both by post and hand, from numerous old ladies in the vicinity of Finsbury-square, begging of him to blow his bugle in a lower key, here resolves to awaken every land and water-nymph with his echoes; but lo! not a note is heard, for some wag in the party has thrust a napkin inside the instrument. Buckle at first grows red with anger, but finding the laugh from all sides against him, he at last joins in it. Jones, who has been on the Continent, and cultivated a pair of moustachios, to give him a Frenchified look, seats himself on the hamper, as he says, to be our "over-looker," when two of the mischievous youths, encouraged by the sly look of their elder sister, draw away the seat, and Jones finds himself anchored in a pigeon-pie, with his feet stranded among no end of glasses and bottles. At this, Simpkins, who is a wealthy printer, laughs from under the umbrella he has put up to keep the heat off, and exclaims that "Jones is only distributing his pie;" but this pun, which would have told well in the office—is lost upon the majority. Clarkson, who has been head cashier in a banking establishment for a quarter of a century, and who can tell a light sovereign or a bad shilling in the dark, and is a kind of "juvenile antique," has retired under the spreading boughs with Jemima, and you may guess the tenor of his thoughts, when on his return he proposes, "All the single married, and the married happy;" and he becomes all at once smitten with the statistics of house-keeping, and thinks lodgings after all very uncomfortable—a strange discovery to make all at once, and after a large part of thirty years spent in the same apartments. But Jemima wears that pink bonnet somewhat jauntily, and for the life of him Clarkson cannot take his eyes from it. He has told Buckle that he thinks he shall leave off taking snuff.

It is marvellous what pretty faces, seen amid fluttering leaves, and in the open sunshine, make amongst our hard-headed money-getting citizens: the consequence arising from a pic-nic party we have now awakened the solemn slumber of Lombard-street, and the enquiry on Change all next day has been the reason why so-and-so drawn so many thousands amount of his banker. The whole calculations of long years, devoted to celibacy, by those sworn never to take the vow matrimonial, have been upset between London and Bushy Park; and this we whisper only into the ears of match-making mothers, who find it difficult to catch any of the wealthier fish for their daughters—so try a pic-nic party on a handsome scale, in some such rural spots as those given in our engravings. The very whispering of the leaves does half the business; there is a kind of "haste and marry me" in the singing of the birds, and it is so natural for the young couple to say, "Isn't that delicious?" and "Oh, how sweet!" If very bashful, plant them close beside the edge of the water, and there they can look down at each others shadows until they get used to it; it is excellent practice, and depend upon it, that from the image they will get to gazing upon the reality. Then the objects mirrored below furnish so much matter for conversation; the blue sky lends naturally to some remarks on the colour of eyes, the white pearly clouds may even furnish a hint about a dress of the same colour, and the flowers that hang downward are pretty sure to be the means of introducing their emblems. Only fancy Clarkson himself, on presenting Jemima with a forget-me-not, which he gathered on the edge of the island, passing off the following verses (which we can swear is the coinage of our own brain) as his own.

|---|---|
| Forget thee, love? no, not while heaven | It hangs its head, and from that hour |
| Has its starred vault across the sky; | Droops only unto death, as it. |
| Oh! may I never be forgiven, | So may I droop, by all above me, |
| If once I cease thine heart a sigh! | If once this heart doth cease to love |
| Sooner shall the flower forget | thee! |
| Shun the fringed brook by which it | |
| grow, | |
| And pore for some sequester'd spot | The turtle-dove shall lost its mate, |
| Where not a silver ripple flows | Hides in some gloomy grassy |
| By the blue sky that bends above me, | shade, |
| Dearly and fondly do I love thee! | And there alone mourn o'er its fate, |
| | With plumes for ever disarray'd. |
| They fabled not in days of old | Alone, alone, it there sits cooing! |
| That what we love we ever cherish, | Deem'st thou, my love, what it doth |
| That what we love we ever perish, | seek? |
| For when the sun neglects the flower, | 'Tis death the mournful bird is wooing, |
| And the round pearly dews forsake it, | In murmurs though its plaintive |
| | words be weak. |
| If in this world I cease to love thee! | |
| | So will I mourn, by all above me, |

Who cannot see by glancing at Clarkson, as he sits with averted face, and his arm round Jemima's waist, that the verses are not without their effect; there is a quiet delight depicted even in the length of his nose—a lovely elongation.

Let those who wish to visit the scenery in Bushy Park either go by the steamboat to Richmond, or by the railway to Kingston, or to Hampton Wick, and they will soon reach the most splendid avenue of chesnuts that ever the eye alighted upon. There is something grand and cathedral-like in this mighty range of "tall great senators" of mighty woods, which at the close of spring are hung with millions of pyramidal silver flowers. The throwing open of such beautiful scenes as these to the public is an answer to all the murmurs about the seclusion and retirement of Royalty; and we much question if in any part of Europe there are more parks or so vast a range open to the lovers of rural scenery, as there are about the domains of our own Sovereign: true, they are some distance from the metropolis, but space is now of little moment compared to what it was under the old modes of travelling.

The crowds we see borne out of the smoky city in summer-time by pleasure-vans, and which we meet wandering about in the green glades of the Royal parks, or gazing in wonder at the Picture Gallery of Hampton Court, show a great improvement in the tastes of the working classes during the last few years. Such amusements are a great march beyond the dog and cock-fights and wrestling matches, which were so common, a quarter of a century ago; and are far preferable to the rude merriment of our country wakes and feasts, where jumping in sacks, and wheeling barrows blindfolded, mounting poles, and hunting pigs with scaped tails, formed the chief of these boorish delights. The increase of visitors to our Museums, National Galleries and other places of amusement and instruction, which are thrown open without charge to the public, are footmarks in the right direction, swerving as they do from the old beaten and barbarous road.

Many a mile of rich scenery stretches along the river by the Surrey side beyond Vauxhall-bridge, which thousands of our smoke-dried citizens have never yet traversed, although it is the old highway trodden by our ancient Kings. We have often lifted up our voice and endeavoured to persuade our City neighbours to make a few more pilgrimages to the green shrines of Nature, where the tall trees rustle on the one hand and the river makes an unceasing murmur on the other; where the far-off bell falls with a music unknown to our crowded streets, and the cawing of the rook, as it hastens woodward in the descending twilight, strikes the ear with pleasing solemnity. A [illegible] even a hard-hearted bailiff delay a day or two before issuing his warrant or distress; it causes a lawyer to linger a little longer before he can screw up his "unnatural" courage to send out a writ; for they find nature so fair and beautiful, the green of the earth so soothing, and the looks of the blossoms and flowers so full of tenderness, that the very remembrance of such softening scenes fills them with the "milk of human kindness."

The very man who scarcely condescends to give you a civil answer if you inquire your way in the neighbourhood of the Exchange, will, while [illegible] in a pic-nic party, begin to "babble o' green fields" as if he [illegible], for such is the change wrought by Nature's wonder-working [illegible].

FANCY SALE IN CHELSEA HOSPITAL GROUNDS.

On Tuesday and Wednesday [illegible] in aid of the Building Fund and Endowment of the Aged Governesses' Asylum," was held in the grounds of the Royal Hospital, at Chelsea. The grounds are admirably suited for such a fête and the fittings for the occasion were well arranged. The large space [illegible] river-front of the Hospital was provided with marquées and tents by Mr. [illegible] ington, whose co-operation was secured by Mr. Belshaw, the active agent of the committee. The centre of the ground was occupied by a handsome circular tent, opening into corridors of canvas on either side. In the centre tent were the stalls of the Marchioness of Londonderry, the Marchioness of Alesbury, the Marchioness of Blandford, and the Viscountess Jocelyn, the latter jointly with Lady Ashley and Lady Robert Grosvenor. The corridors were also filled with well-stocked counters; and among the fair holders we observed the Countess of Antrim, the Viscountess Massareene, the Lady Charlotte Calthorpe Gough, the Lady Charlotte Egerton, the Lady Guernsey, the Lady Brabazon, the Lady Charlotte Guest, the Lady Katharine Stewart, the Lady Caroline Bathurst, the Lady Georgiana Fullerton, the Lady Caroline Stirling, the Lady Kathven, the Hon. Lady Pearson, the Hon. Mrs. George Anson, the Lady Shelley, the Lady Beecher, the Lady Strange, Mrs. Blamire, Mrs. Henry Cliscold, Mrs. S. C. Hall, &c.

FANCY SALE IN THE GROUNDS OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL, IN AID OF THE GOVERNESSES' BENEVOLENT INS[illegible]

The stalls of the Marchioness of Londonderry and the Marchioness of Alesbury, and of the Viscountess Jocelyn, and her sister, Lady Ashley, jointly with Lady Robert Grosvenor, were much frequented throughout each day.

At about four o'clock on Tuesday, Mademoiselle Jenny Lind paid a visit to Mrs. Hall's stall, and made several purchases; but, being inconvenienced by the crowd of spectators, took refuge in the Governor's house. "Here," says the Morning Post report, "an interesting incident occurred.—The youthful band of the Caledonian Asylum were upon the lawn, in front of the mansion, and Mdlle. Lind, observing them, expressed a desire to hear them play a Scotch reel. Captain Forbes, who was present, at once gave the necessary instruction, and the boys played a reel with great spirit, accompanying the music with the peculiar figure of which it is so thoroughly suggestive. Mdlle. Lind was greatly pleased; and, by her own request—this day having been introduced to the saloon in which she then was—she sat down, and, accompanying herself on the piano, sang for their especial amusement one of her favourite Swiss airs. The juvenile musicians were, of course, highly delighted at this act of kindness and condescension on the part of the 'lyric queen.'" The band of the Royal Artillery and of the Fusilier Guards were in attendance during each day, and everything went off admirably.

We have not heard the result of the two days' sales. One fair and distinguished lady, it is said, received at her stall nearly 100 guineas.

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

There was a brilliant array of fashion on Saturday night to witness Mdlle. Lind's performance of Lucia. Her Majesty and Prince Albert honoured the theatre with their presence for the first time since the death of the Princess Sophia.

On Tuesday night, Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" was revived with Lablache as the old bachelor; Belletti, Dr. Malatesta; Labocetta, Ernesto; and Madame Tadolini, Norina. This opera was written for the Italian Opera, in Paris, in 1843, expressly for Grisi, Mario, Tamburini, and Lablache. It was Donizetti's sixtieth opera, and was his last but three, namely, "Maria di Rohan," "Don Sebastian," and "Caterina Cornaro." It is a complete comedy, the story treating of the resolution of Don Pasquale to marry and to disinherit his nephew, Ernesto, on account of the refusal of the latter to marry a rich lady of his uncle's selection, whilst he is attached to Norina, a lively widow of limited means. Dr. Malatesta, Ernesto's friend, relieves the lovers from their difficulties, by passing off Norina on Don Pasquale as an unsophisticated novice from a convent; and, by signing a fictitious contract of marriage, the lady becomes herself such a vixen to Don Pasquale, that he is at last too glad to receive the explanation of the trick which he has been subjected to, and to unite Ernesto and Norina. The dramatic situations are highly diverting, especially the scene of courtship between Don Pasquale and Norina. The entire weight of the drama may be stated to fall on Don Pasquale. It is one of the most admirable assumptions of Lablache. He is comic to the fingers' ends: if he had never been the great basso he is, he would have gained glory as a consummate comedian. His making-up as a young fop, to be introduced to the presumed novice, was admirable. His "indescribables" were of a gigantic check and striped pattern, with an inflammatory tournure, and a party-coloured cravat to correspond. The audience were convulsed with laughter at his strange antics, his eccentric action, and his inimitable by-play. But great as was his delineation of the character, his singing of the music was not less remarkable. His rich powerful bass notes in the concerted pieces told with powerful effect; and his wonderful skill in throwing in his deep tones seemed for the celebrated quatuor, "Bonsmajo," its essence. Amongst the fine points in which his histrionic genius was manifested—soaring at once from broad comedy to the regions of high tragedy—was that in which Don Pasquale receives a blow from Norina: the indignity seemed to overwhelm him more than the supposition of her dishonour. The Don Pasquale of Lablache is one of those memorable performances which may be ranked as derived from the finest dramatic and musical perception.

There was no lack of spirit in the Norina of Madame Tadolini; but her action is of the abrupt, exaggerated, Italian school, and is not sufficiently refined for our connoisseurs. She sang unequally as portions of the opera, proving that her great reputation in Italy and Germany was richly deserved, but evincing too frequently a laboured style, and fatigue in the upper notes. She was encored, with Lablache, in the duo, "Via, sia spento," in the third act; and a rondo finale, which she introduced, was also demanded twice. The Dr. Malatesta of Belletti was judiciously acted and sung, and he gave the elegant melody, "Bella siccome un angelo," expressively. The tenor, Labocetta, does not improve on acquaintance; his voice is hard and harsh, and in the concerted music is scarcely audible, from deficiency of power. The popularity of the melody, "Com' è gentil," ensured its encore, but not without dissent.

The orchestral accompaniments in "Don Pasquale" are full of charm and elegance, but require very delicate and discreet colouring. The stringed instruments and wood band were not sufficiently heard, owing to the undue predominance of the brass. The principal performers appeared before the curtain at the close of the opera.

On Thursday (the extra night) Meyerbeer's "Roberto Il Diavolo" was revived. The house was crowded to excess. It was in this magnificent work that Mdlle. Jenny Lind, on May 4th, last season, first startled the town, by her first appearance in this country. On that occasion Mdme. Castellan enacted the Princess, Fraschini Robert, Gardoni Rambaldi, and Staudigl Bertram. A great change has taken place in the cast this season. The character of the Princess de Isabelle is suppressed, and consequently the second and fourth acts, and the opera has been reduced to three acts. Gardoni is now the Robert, which he has played in French at the Grand Opera, Paris; and his part of Rambaldi is given to Labocetta. Belletti replaces Staudigl in Bertram. On these changes, transformations, and liberties taken with the composer's score, we shall not comment. Let justice be rendered to the transcendant talent exhibited by Mdlle. Lind in her beautiful delineation of Alice. Of this exquisite creation it has been remarked that Alice is a part whose character partakes too much of the angel to be that of the woman, and has too much of the woman to be that of the angel. She was received with immense applause, encored in the air in the second act, and called for repeatedly. The Queen and Queen Dowager were present.

LYCEUM.

Thursday week was a great night for the Lyceum. "The Beggar's Opera" was produced with a strength of cast that we do not remember to have seen equalled, and succeeded beyond expectation, promising to be an attractive feature in the bills for some time. The popular name of Mr. W. Harrison, appeared for the first time at the Lyceum, in his original character of Captain Macheath, the part in which he first made a decided impression upon the public. His reception was most enthusiastic, and upon every occasion of his coming greeting him for some minutes after his appearance, and this was continued throughout the opera, after all his songs, several of which were lonully encored. He was in excellent voice, and sang the music beautifully. An interesting feature in the opera was the début and triumphant success of Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam, as Polly. She appeared to be a little nervous at first; but this soon wore off, and she gave the charming airs allotted to her with great taste and feeling. Her beautiful fresh voice, and unaffected style, created a great sensation. Certainly she accomplished more than she has yet done on the evening, rapidly as she has established herself as a favourite with the London audience. Madame Vestris gave a very clever impersonation of Lucy, sung the music correctly, and keeping everything alive by her charming acting. She looked remarkably well. Mr. Selby was excellent as Filch, and Mr. Leigh Murray, Mrs. Peachum, Mr. J. Mathews, Peachum, Mr. Harley, Lockit, Mr. Granby, Locket, and Mr. Meadows, the Beggar, in the introductory programme, to show how remarkably the parts have been distributed.

At the fall of the curtain the cheering from all parts of a very crowded house was most vehement; and it was gratifying to see several of the gentlemen who had been conspicuous in applauding the French company at Drury Lane, doing their efforts in making the house ring again with their hands and voices, as Mr. Harrison and Miss Fitzwilliam—then Harley and Madame Vestris—came before the curtain to receive the congratulations of the audience.

The costumes were of the last century, and the same exquisite taste observable in all the details, which distinguishes this admirable management.

Mr. Emery, so well known as an excellent actor at the Lyceum during Mrs. Keeley's management, announces his benefit on Monday, at the OLYMPIC, when Mr. Brooks will perform Othello, and Mr. Woolgar (the father of the above young lady at the Adelphi), Iago. The Misses Williams will sing; and the bête-féroce will perform Vanderdecken in the "Flying Dutchman," one of the most effective of our romantic dramas. No actor has a greater claim upon the public than Mr. Emery. He is much esteemed on and off the stage; possesses talents of no ordinary character; and in the family circle is known to be a kind-hearted and honourable gentleman. In patronising him, it is right that the admirers should know that there are several little mouths dependent on him for support, in turn.

It is said that her Majesty and Prince Albert have signified their intention of being present at Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean's approaching benefit, at the HAYMARKET. Mr. Kean, we regret to say, continues indisposed.

"The Confederacy" brought Mrs Julia Bennett a bumper on Tuesday evening. This clever young actress was never seen to better advantage; and Mrs. Keeley covered herself with honours by her inimitable personation of Poppaea.

There is a report that a Mr. F. Cooper is about to open Drury Lane for a week, for legitimate drama. If this be true, we can anticipate the result of the speculation.

The HAYMARKET is announced to close on the 10th, and it is said that the Adelphi company will come there to play during the repairs at their theatre.

LADY John Russell gave a soirée on Wednesday evening, at the official residence of Lord J. Russell, in Downing-street. The invitations comprised the members of the Royal family, the diplomatic corps, and several hundreds of the principal nobility and gentry.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS.

UPPER SINGING CLASSES.—The last of Mr. Hullah's Choral Concerts was given on Wednesday night, at Exeter Hall, being the anniversary of laying the foundation-stone of the New Music Hall, now building in Long-acre. We have had occasion to notice the growing improvement in Mr. Hullah's vocal classes of singing, accomplished by their judicious intermixture with professional persons. The quality of the entertainments provided by Mr. Hullah has been much ameliorated; the schemes have been large and comprehensive, and free from bigotry as to school of composition. The whole of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream" was presented on Wednesday, with Mendelssohn's quartet in D, played by twenty instrumentalists, led by Willy. This was done in imitation of a practice at the Conservatoire Concerts in Paris, and we question its policy. Weber's "Jubilee" overture, and a pianoforte solo played by Sterndale Bennett, were also in the programme. The vocalists were the Misses A. and M. Williams, Rainforth, Howard, Duval, Mrs. Weiss, Mrs. A. Newton; Messrs. Lockey, Sims Reeves, H. Whitworth, and Weiss. Mozart's chorus from the "Flauto Magico," "Peasants Numi," the two parts songs, "Daybreak," by Moscheles, and "For the Woods," by Mendelssohn,—were well sung as choral pieces.

MR. JOHN PARRY.—The annual entertainment of this popular singer was given on Monday night. The Hanover Rooms were crowded to excess, to greet the originator of a new school of comic singing in this country. Many imitators have sprung up since Mr. John Parry first took the field, but he is still without a rival. He combines many advantages for his representations. He is a thorough musician, having been trained as a basso. He is a most expert pianist, and he is a consummate comedian. He possesses, besides, a voice of extraordinary range. Whilst he can descend to the deepest notes of the basso, his tenor notes are always at command, and by the use of a falsetto, he can sing soprano music with facility. He has unexceptionable taste; indeed, the entire freedom from vulgarity in his style, has made him the favourite of all the ladies—from the grave and stately matron or governess, to the young and vivacious girl of the boarding-school. The most severe guardians and rigid parents countenance John Parry's whims and drolleries; and if they try to be serious, whilst the juvenile ones are giggling beforehand, the moment Parry's serio-comic visage is expressing some conceit or ludicrosity, then do the muscles of their stern faces relax, and hearty hilarity breaks forth, the stronger because of the habitual restraint. John Parry favoured his patrons and friends with a new scene, "The Rehearsal of an Operetta." It was completely successful. John Parry personates at the piano Miss Thrush, a prima donna; Mr. Rose, a tenor; and Mr. Reeves, a bass, while he officiates as conductor, with the bâton in his right hand. His amusing accompaniments are thus principally accomplished with the left hand, with a skill worthy of a Dreyschock. In the varied registers of three characters he was really wonderful. If he did not give the Ut de poitrine of Duprez, we had the B flat from the chest of Roger and the double Ut of Staudigl, "in the lowest depths deeper still." His imitations of the bravuras of the prima donna was a capital burlesque. The operetta was immensely applauded; and as it would have been too fatiguing to have accepted the encore, he substituted "Jeannette and Jeannot." He also gave Albert Smith's natural scene, "The true History of England." Benedict and Negri conducted the two parts, the other vocalists being Mdme. F. Lablache, Miss E. Lucombe, Miss Rowland, the Misses Williams, the Misses Pyne, Mdme. Sabatier, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. W. Farren, junior, Mr. J. Calkin, and Mr. Sims Reeves. The Instrumentalists were the Distin family, on the Sax Horns; Mdme. Dulcken, Messrs. W. H. Holmes, and S. J. Nobbs, pianos; Regondi, concertina; and R. Blagrove, viola.

MISS STEELE AND MR. BRINSLEY RICHARDS.—The Hanover-square Rooms were crowded at the concert of this clever vocalist and rising composer and pianist. Miss Steele was assisted by Wallace's pretty ballad in the first part and Sterndale Bennett in the second, with Willy as leader. Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Mr. B. Richards's clever overture in F minor, and Mr. Bennett's "Naiads" were performed. Mr. B. Richards played with admirable skill Mendelssohn's first pianoforte concerto in G, and gleanings from the same composer's songs without words, besides Mr. Richards's own elegant compositions, an Andante and a Nocturne. Original Regondi executed a concertina fantasia with great ability. Miss Steele, the fair beneficiaire, sang in her customary classical style, and was encored in "Where the bee sucks." Encore was also insisted upon for Miss Rainforth's rendering of Wallace's pretty ballad, "Love and Music Sing;" for Mr. Sims Reeves in "Fra poco," from "Lucia;" and John Parry in his "History of England," when he gave "Jeannette and Jeannot." Miss Birch, Mdme. D'Okolski, the Misses Williams, Signor F. Lablache, Mr. W. H. Seguin, and Mr. Calkin were the other vocalists, besides Mdlle. Molina de Mendi (the cousin of Mdme. Viardot), who sang Donizetti's "Tyrolienne," from "Betly." "In queste semplice," in the most captivating manner. The Duke of Newcastle, the Ladies Clinton, and Lord Robert Clinton occupied the Royal box.

MDME. DULCKEN.—One of the fashionable events of the season is the annual concert of this popular and accomplished pianiste. It was given at the Royal Italian Opera with great éclat; although we regretted to observe the absence of three eminent artists—Mdme. Castellan, Signor Ronconi, and Signor Sabatier, Signor Marras, and Herr Pischeck, without any attempt at explanation. There was, however, quite sufficient attraction in the Covent Garden company. Grisi was in fine voice, and with Mario sang the duet, "Ah! Oggi," from the "Favorita," in impassioned style. The prince of tenors was also encored in Morodante's romance, "In terra ci diviseo." Mdlle. Alboni and Madame Persiani secured there customary encore for their "Non più mesta," and the latter in the polacca from "Linda," "Oh! luce di quest' anima." Mdme. Viardot got also Balfe's cavatina from the "Maid of Artois," with Italian words, in the most brilliant style; and her singing of "Dunque io son," with Tamburini, will pique curiosity to hear her in Rosina. Mdme. Castellan, Mdlle. Corbari, Salvi, and Rovere were the other vocalists. Between the parts, Wallace's national hymn, "Scots wha hae," was sung, conducted by Benedict. The composer, Mr. Genge and Miss Temple taking the solos. The audience rose loyally at this hymn. The instrumental attraction was strong. Mdme. Dulcken performed admirably Weber's Concertstück, in F minor, and the two last movements from Mendelssohn's Concerto, and (with M. Charles Hallé) Mendelssohn's Duo Concertante in B flat. Mdme. Dulcken's own compositions are airs and the overture to Boieldieu's "Jean de Paris," and Sir Henry Bishop's March. Lucas conducted the band in the "Fidelio" and "Freyschütz" overtures, and the concert generally, with ability.

BEETHOVEN QUARTETS.—The seventh meeting, on Monday night, Haydn's 82nd in F, Mozart's 5th in A, Mozart's 2nd in D minor, and Beethoven's 13th in A flat were the selected quartets. Molique, Sainton, Hill, and Hausseker were the executants. The cavatina and the presto, in Beethoven's fiery work, ably led by Molique, were encored; as was also the minuet and trio in Mozart's, led by Sainton. There was a full attendance

MISS BINFIELD WILLIAMS.—This pianiste gave her concert at the Princess' Rooms, and played several classical works with artistical intelligence. She was supported by Mr. J. Barnett, Mr. Oury, Mr. Lindley, Mr. Chipp, Mr. Hill, and Mr. H. Chipp (violoncellists), with Messrs. Lucas, Mellon, Mori, Lazarus, Cubitt, Lindley, T. Lucas, L. Lucas, Barge, Reed, Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, John Lucas, and H. Lucas in the wind department. Signor Garcia and Mr. C. H. Horsley were the conductors.

MESSRS. H. AND R. BLAGROVE.—The third quartet and solo concert of these violinists took place on Wednesday night, at the Mortimer-street Rooms, assisted by Mr. Lucas, Mr. Chipp, and Signor Piatti, violoncellists.

MDLLE. ANSCHUTZ.—This lady, who has been so distinguished in the fashionable circles as a most accomplished amateur, gave a morning concert on Monday, at the Hanover-square Rooms, assisted by Mdme. Caradori Allan and E. Deinfield, Esq., whose elegant villa was attended by nearly 400 persons of the fashionable circles. Costa, Piatti, and Benedict officiated as accompanyists. The vocalists in addition to Mdlle. Anschutz were Mdme. Castellan, Miss Rainforth, Mdme. Caradori Allan, Mdme. Stefanoni, Signori Salvi, Mei, Paglieri, Ferrari, and Marini (from the Royal Italian Opera), Collett, and Mdme. Sabatier. The solo instrumentalists were Mdlle. Anschutz (harp), Tomelli (bassoon), Piatti (violincello), Remusat (flute), and Biletti (clarionet).

MR. WILSON.—The concert on Tuesday night at the Music Hall, and at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Tuesday morning, this Scottish vocalist's last public entertainments, which were fully and fashionably attended, as usual. At the London Tavern, on Tuesday night, a superb silver claret jug and salver were presented to Mr. Wilson, at a dinner party given by the admirers of the commemoration of his successful exertions in reviving the public taste for the beauties of Scottish songs."

MADAME SALA.—This vocalist gave her Annual Morning Concert on Wednesday, at the Hanover-rooms, under Royal and distinguished patronage. Mr Lavenu and Herr Ella were the conductors. The vocalists were Mrs. Bishop, Miss Bassano, Miss S. Flower, the Misses A. and M. Williams, Madame Sala, Madame de Lozano, Miss Nelson, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. T. Williams, Mr. W. H. Seguin; Mr. Barker, Mr. W. Harris, Miss Harris, Miss Messent, Mr. John Parry, Miss Kate Loder, and Mr. Jewson, pianists, Mr. Bulsir Chatterton, harp; Miss Rose Collins, violinist; and Mr. Julian Adams, "harmonicon;" contributed their instrumental talents. The programme was judiciously selected, and gave the utmost satisfaction to a fashionable auditory

MADAME SCHWAL.—On Wednesday night, at Crosby Hall, this pianiste gave her annual concert. Mercadé and Lemmens Sherrington were the conductors. Herr Siegfeich (horn), Mr. Goffree (violin), and Mr. Pratten (flute), were the solo instrumentalists. The vocalists were Miss Birch, Miss Eliza Birch, Miss Pyne, Miss L. Pyne, Miss A. Williams, Miss Hartford, Miss Bassano, Miss Hawes, Herr Becker, Mr. Williams, Mr. Burdini, Mr. Gregg, Signor Ciabatta, and Mr. Bodda

HERR KRAUS.—This ingenious pianist-improvisator gave a morning concert on Wednesday, at 42, Great Marlborough-street.

MESSRS. J. AND R. CIEBRA.—These unrivalled guitarists gave a concert on Wednesday morning, at the Hanover-square Rooms, assisted by performers equally celebrated. They were assisted by Mr. Silberberg, violin, and Mr. J. Clinton, flute; and Mdlle. Molina de Mendi, the charming singer of Spanish songs; the Misses Macnamara and Mdlle. Rosa, Spanish dancers, also contributed.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.—A fresh band of "Nigger" Serenaders called "Bigge's Virginia Harmonists," have made their débuts in London, and a "Rock and Steel" band, the players executing their music on pieces of rock and steel, is amongst the musical novelties or vagaries of the day.—On Monday next will be the eighth and last Philharmonic Concert, which will be honoured by the presence of her Majesty and Prince Albert.—Benedict's concert will take place the same morning, at the room at Her Majesty's Theatre; and Madame de Lozano, at Willis's rooms, has a matinée musicale.—Mr. Wilson's last Scotch entertainment for the season will be given at the Musical Hall on Monday night.—On Tuesday afternoon will be the Director's Concert, at the Musical Union.—On Wednesday will be the fourth and last of Mr. Blagrove's quartet parties.—On Thursday, a concert in aid of the family of the late Julian Kench will be given at the Freemasons' Hall; and on the same morning Berlioz, the composer, will have his concert at the Hanover Rooms.—Amongst the arrivals in London, has been that of Manuel Garcia, the celebrated Professor of Singing at the Conservatoire in Paris. He is the brother of Malibran and Mdme. Viardot, and was the teacher of the latter, as well as of Mdlle. Lind. The Swedish Nightingale, on learning the arrival of M. Garcia, immediately went to pay a visit to her master.—We learn that Mr. J. L. Hatton proposes to visit the United States in the autumn. He is one of our best English composers and a most accomplished pianist. He is an admirable singer, whether as a serious bass or as a comic vocalist. Mr. Hatton is one of the best musicians of the age; for he is thoroughly versed in the old and classic masters, as he is intimately acquainted with the modern school: he composed the opera of "Pascal Bruno" expressly for Staudigl in Vienna. We wish him every success in his Transatlantic trip.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord MONTEAGLE moved resolutions condemnatory of the conduct of the Irish Poor Law Commissioners in issuing a circular letter, directing certain relief to be given contrary to the provisions of the Act. After an explanation from the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, and a short conversation, the noble Lord withdrew his motion.—Adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

WEST INDIES.—SUGAR DUTIES

Sir J. PAKINGTON stated that, as the plan proposed by the Government as a remedy for the West India distress had given so much dissatisfaction to the country, he had come to the resolution to substitute, for the amendment of which he had originally given notice, one to the effect that the House, considering the evidence taken before the Sugar and Coffee Planting Committee, was of opinion that the remedies proposed by the Government would neither avert the ruin with which our possessions in the Mediterranean are now threatened, nor check the stimulus given to the slave trade by the operation of the Act of 1846.

Lord J. RUSSELL hereupon asked if he was to understand that it was the intention of the honourable member to propose any alternative to the plan of the Government?

Sir J. PAKINGTON replied that his object was to move a direct negative to the noble Lord's proposition.

Mr. CARDWELL suggested that, as the country should have time to consider this question maturely, it might be well to pass a temporary bill to continue for a short time the duties now in force on all sugar.

Mr. ELLICE considered that, great as was the alarm caused by the statement of the Minister, delay in deciding the question would aggravate the mischief.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Government had considered the question of delay, and had decided that nothing could be worse. The right honourable gentleman expressed his regret at the determination come to by Sir J. PAKINGTON, not to move a distinct differential duty of 10s., in conformity with the recommendation of the West India Committee.

On the motion that the house resolve itself into committee to consider the resolutions on the sugar duties,

Mr. ELLICE appealed to the government to explain their views of the future prospects of the colonies, the policy to be adopted towards them, and the other measures in contemplation for retrieving their condition. He believed that the days of protection, as protection, were gone by; but, in the peculiar circumstances of the times, and when we had adopted the policy of low prices and high taxes, from which there was no chance of escaping, he thought that some substantial assistance ought to be afforded to the colonists. The right hon. gentleman, amongst other remedies, suggested that the whole system of colonial government should be reformed. He could not say whether he should vote for going into committee to consider the ministerial resolutions or not, until he could hear the explanations he required.

Lord J. RUSSELL declined to enter into a general course of making the general explanations asked for, and thus anticipating the discussion to be raised by Sir J. Pakington's amendment. With respect to that amendment, the noble lord said, that in his opinion its adoption would place the colonies and the house in an embarrassment; because, if the proposal of the government should be rejected, and no other plan substituted, the existing Act, and the changes to take place under it in July, would remain in operation.

Sir J. PAKINGTON, as an amendment to the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, moved a resolution to the effect that in the opinion of the House the plan proposed by the Government would neither afford a remedy for the colonial distress nor check the stimulus given to the slave trade by the Act of 1846. The hon. Baronet said that in his opinion it was the duty of the House to express their decided approbation of the plan proposed by the Government. This was a question that did not belong to the category of the Free-trade questions, but was one apart, and that should be considered on its own merits. The hon Baronet proceeded to give a picture of the depressed condition of the West Indies and of the Mauritius, which he proved, from the evidence taken before the committee, from the governors of the several colonies, and from the memorials of some of the Legislative Assemblies, to be the sole consequence of the Act of 1846. He contended that this Act, so destructive to our sugar-producing colonies, had produced no advantage to our home manufactures, and that it would ultimately lead to an increased price to the sugar consumers. He then turned to the consideration of the subject as it bore on the slave trade, and demonstrated that there had been a frightful increase in the importation of slaves to the Brazils during the last few years, and that the Act of 1846 had revived the slave trade in Cuba, which, at the passing of the Act, was nearly extinct. In conclusion, he appealed to the House and to the country not for a faction fight against the Free-trade theory, or for the problematical saving of a penny a pound on sugar, to continue giving encouragement to the abominable slave traffic; and he implored them, as they valued the great independencies of the British Crown, and as they valued the honour, the reputation, and the consistency of this Christian land, to retrace their footsteps, and so shape their legislative course as to place our free-labour colonists in a position to compete with slave-producing countries.

Sir E. BUXTON seconded the amendment. If he could, he would have slave-grown sugar entirely excluded from the British market; but as he could not hope to obtain that at present, he would support the amendment for the abatement of slave produce. He lamented that the high principle which had formerly distinguished this country had been supplanted by the very inferior principles of cheapness and free trade.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER contended that slavery could never be put down except by the successful competition of free labour. The blockade of Africa had proved utterly ineffective in putting an end to the slave trade, and all other previous efforts with the like intent had also failed; therefore nothing remained but to try the efficacy of free competition. The principle of permanent protection to the colonies had already been given up in 1846, and the evidence taken from the West India Committee did not go further than a temporary protection; whereas the amendment of the honourable gentleman asserted the principle of permanent protection or left the question quite undecided. The right hon. gentleman, at great length, argued that the course taken by the Government was the true one, and that any other would defeat the cherished object of effectually putting down slavery.

Mr. KER SEYMER was favourable to a protective duty of 10s. against all foreign producers, but, in accordance with his sentiments set before the house, he had only then to declare against the plan proposed by the government. The hon. member denied that free labour was cheaper than slave labour, and that protection had proved injurious to the colonies.

Mr. HUME said that the annals of legislation did not furnish a parallel for the shameful treatment by England of the West India colonies. Every engagement made to them, every pledge given to them, had been completely broken. The hon. member branded the Colonial Office as a nuisance, and charged Lord Grey and Mr. Hawes with knowing nothing of colonial affairs. Mr. Hume insisted that those colonies were entitled to protection, and that unless the House was prepared to give the adequate protection it would be better to let them die at once and perish under the existing law. He supported the amendment, taking it for granted that, in case it should be carried, Sir J. Pakington would be prepared to submit some distinct proposition for the consideration of the house.

Mr. MOFFATT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. CARDWELL pointed out the difficulty in which the House would be placed, whichever side prevailed in the debate, in consequence of the shortness of time between this and the 5th of July. He again urged the advisability of passing a short Act continuing the present duties.

The debate was adjourned to Thursday

The Public Health Bill was read a third time and passed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

DECIMAL COINAGE.—Dr. BOWRING inquired of the Master of the Mint whether any progress had been made with the decimal coinage, and when they might expect to see issued the tenth of a pound piece? Mr. LABOUCHERE said that some delay had unavoidably taken place in making the coin. There was a commission at present sitting on the subject, and until that commission should have made its report, it would be very difficult to enter into a new contract with the company called the "Money Office," which was indispensable.

ENGLISH WORKMEN AND THE FRENCH SAVINGS BANKS.—Mr. B. COCHRANE wished to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office whether any compensation had recently been made to those English workmen who had been turned out of France without having received the sums they had deposited in the French savings banks. If no such arrangement had been made, he wished to ask whether there was any objection to lay before the House any correspondence that might have passed between himself and the British Ambassador at Paris upon that subject; and also whether it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to demand redress for the very great injury which had in that way been done to British subjects?—Lord PALMERSTON said, that communications had passed between the Marquis of Normanby and the French Government upon that subject; and the French Government had promised that the deposits of the English workmen should be restored to them in full, although a different arrangement had been ordered with regard to French depositors. No information had reached the foreign Office to the effect that those deposits had been actually paid. He believed, however, that the French Government and the gentleman would see that it would not be expedient to produce any correspondence upon the subject until the matter should have been definitively arranged.—Sir DE LACY EVANS said he believed that many of the workmen in question, who were at present in great distress, would immediately emigrate to the colonies if they had the means of so doing. He would therefore suggest that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, and the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office, should take into their consideration the expediency of making some moderate advances to those poor men, in anticipation of the realisation of their claims on the French Government, so as to enable them at once to emigrate.—Lord PALMERSTON said he fully comprehended the object of his hon. and gallant friend, and he would take his suggestion into consideration.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.

A great number of petitions were presented from all parts of the kingdom in favour of Mr. Hume's motion for household suffrage, vote by ballot, triennial Parliaments, and for a more equal apportionment of members to population.

Mr. HUME said that, after such an exhibition, he might be permitted to say that the country did feel an interest in the motion which he was about to submit to the consideration of the House, and that an answer had been given to the speech of Lord John Russell on a recent occasion, when he asserted that the people did not wish for the reform contemplated by himself and those around him. The motion he had to submit was conceived in the following words:—"That this House, as at present constituted, does not fairly represent the population, the property, or the industry of the country, whence has arisen great and increasing discontent in the minds of a large portion of the people; and it is, therefore, expedient, with a view to amend the national representation, that the elective franchise shall be so extended as to include householders; that votes shall be taken by ballot; that the duration of Parliaments shall not exceed three years; and that the apportionment of members to population shall be made more equal." He was not one of those who thought we ought to have no military establishment for domestic purposes, but he thought we had far exceeded in this respect the requirements of the country. To obtain a reduction of this wasteful expenditure, it became necessary to give the people a greater influence over Parliament. The Reform Bill had not answered his expectations in this respect. He (Mr. Hume) proposed that every householder rated to the poor should be entitled to be registered and to have a vote, and that every lodger should have a right to be so rated if he should think proper, and to a vote also, after twelve months' registry and residence. They had, therefore, ready to their hand, all the machinery for carrying the plan into execution—a plan which would add two millions of voters to the constituency, drawn from a class the most politically honest and intelligent of the community—classes inaccessible alike to bribery and the good things which gentlemen on the Ministerial benches might have to offer for their votes. The hon. gentleman then explained his regard to dividing the country into electoral districts, subsequently advocated the necessity of adopting vote by ballot, and finally contended that the duration of parliaments should be limited to three years, and that all property qualifications for members of Parliament should be abolished. In conclusion, the hon. member said, the object of his resolution was to pledge the House to an extension of the suffrage, and in the means he had described of exercising it; but that, when his bill should come before the House, every member should be at liberty to endeavour to have it altered as he might think proper. No one should be considered as pledged to its details.

Mr. HENRY DRUMMOND followed Mr. Hume. He was in favour of an extension of the suffrage to all who have property, and he should be glad to advocate the necessity of shortening the duration of Parliaments, for he thought it would be well if hon. members were thrown back oftener upon their constituents, which would be only reverting to our ancient constitutional system. He was opposed to the system of electoral districts, thinking that large constituencies sent members to that House who certainly represented their local interests and feelings, but who by no means represented the interests and feelings of the empire at large.

Lord JOHN RUSSELL observed that he rose thus early in the debate, because the House was entitled to see an explanation from him of his views with regard to the honourable gentleman's motion. But, first, as to the petitions presented to the House, it did not appear that, except for the Charter, any great number of petitions had been presented during the early part of the session, with regard to those which had since been presented, and to the meetings which had been held to support the motion of the honourable gentleman, they were attended by two remarkable incidents in the first, a studied misrepresentation of what had fallen from him about a month ago; and the other, that, although the meetings were called to support the honourable gentleman's motion, they generally ended with a vote in favour of the Charter, or by forsaking the question altogether. His declaration had not been against all reform; nor could meetings so convened and so terminating be regarded as a movement in favour of the hon. gentleman's plan. He concurred with Mr. Hume that to the Reform Bill was chiefly attributable the peace of the country in the present crisis. But the honourable gentleman had made an admission of the power of the electors, under the Reform Bill, to return to Parliament members who might fairly represent them, which should induce the House to pause ere it listened to a proposal for further reform. The hon. gentleman's plan, as detailed to the House, did not accord with the abstract propositions which he enunciated at the heads of his scheme. One of these propositions contended for the right of voting without qualification. But the hon. gentleman himself proposed a qualification. And if there might be one qualification, why not another? And what was there in that proposed by the hon. gentleman which showed it to be preferable to the existing qualification? The proposition submitted was vague and indefinite, pointing out distinctly, neither how were to be excluded in, nor those who were to be excluded from, the franchise. He differed entirely from the hon gentleman as to the foundation of his whole scheme. In his opinion, what every person at full age was entitled to by his country was, as well, indeed, as the whole population, was the best possible Government, and the best legislation which it was possible for it to give them. The mixed constitution of England had for a long period provided for the happiness of its people. It had always felt how difficult a matter it was to alter in any way the adjustment of the different powers of the State. He besought the House therefore to approach with the greatest circumspection the question of any change in the elective franchise. Viewing the matter from this point, the question for them to consider was, whether a Parliament elected by householders and lodgers would be likely to represent more fairly the property represented by the present body of electors. If they conceded universal suffrage, he could not see how they could avoid the division of the country into equal electoral districts, and he had no doubt, and said so in saying that, that would be the result from such universal suffrage. The inequality which characterised the distribution of the representation, and the anomalies existing accompanying it, were, in his judgment, rather subject of many advantages. He could not follow the honourable gentleman in detail through all his propositions. As to the ballot, he thought that it would be no effectual remedy against intimidation. As to triennial Parliaments, whilst it might be advisable that members should be frequently thrown back upon their constituents, it was also desirable that there should be some stability in the policy of the country. The present constitution of Parliament was, in his opinion, gave it that stability. If they were to change that duration at all, he thought it would be better to take one year instead of three years, the latter being about the worst proposition, in the remembrance of the House. He was satisfied with the present duration of Parliaments, and would certainly give no vote in favour of departing from it. He would also put the question raised by the honourable gentleman to another test, which he could not refuse to subject it. The reform of Parliament took place in 1832. Had the House of Commons showed itself since that time to be the mere tool of the aristocracy—a class afraid to enter upon any reform, or indifferent to the necessities of the time, who considered the changes which had been effected since that time, could justly lay such charges against the reformed House of Commons. What Mr. Hume proposed would effect a great change in the constitution. He, on the other hand, was for gradual reform. Since 1832 no great change in the Reform Bill had been projected or proposed. But the public mind was now turned to the consideration of such subjects, and the time might not be far distant when some reforms might be usefully effected. They might soon be in possession of sufficient information to enable them to extend the franchise, without compromising the basis of our representative system. He was, therefore, not disposed to say that they could not and might not usefully and beneficially improve the Reform Act. But, if he were asked whether he was prepared to vote in at the present moment any measures for that purpose, he would unhesitatingly reply that he was not prepared to introduce any considerable measure for such a purpose. He could not agree with Mr. Hume that there was a good time for the introduction of a large measure of reform. The House represented, and, since the Reform Bill, had faithfully represented, the nation; and it was due to the nation on that occasion that it should give a determined negative to the proposition just submitted to it.

Mr. W. J. FOX said it would be gratifying to the country to know that the noble Lord was not opposed to further organic changes in the representation, vague and indefinite as had been his intimation of the nature of the changes that might be anticipated from him. The hon. gentleman contended that the franchise should be extended to the labouring classes, who had, at least, a property in their labour, which Parliament should not refuse to recognise.

Mr. DISRAELI replied to the speech of Mr. Fox, contending that the plan of Mr. Hume raised new obstacles in the way of the very class of society whose interests the hon. gentleman had just been advocating. In reply to the argument that a reform was necessary, owing to the extravagant expenditure of the country, he pointed the attention of the new speaker to a fact stated by Mr. Mackay, amidst continued laughter and cheering from all parts of the House. The movement, he contended, was a middle-class movement, and for middle-class purposes; and he was opposed to any movement tending to give a predominance of power to any class of the community whatever.

Mr. B. OSBORNE moved the adjournment of the debate, and it was, after some discussion, accordingly adjourned to Friday.—The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to five o'clock.

BOROUGH OF CHELTENHAM.—Mr. A. STAFFORD moved the issue of a new writ for the election of a member for this borough, in the room of Sir Willoughby Jones, whose election has been declared void.—Mr. MOWATT said the House, by refusing to issue the writ, was assuming the powers of the three estates in the realm. He thought some further information should be given of the intentions of the government, so as to enable them to say if the question was one upon which every hon. member must exercise his own judgment; and it was not therefore necessary that all the members of the Government should vote the same way. He would himself vote in favour of the motion, for he could see no sufficient grounds for witholding the writ. After some observations from Mr. ANSTEY and Mr. GORING, Sir J. HANMER opposed the motion, and said that the number of cases of bribery established was no criterion of the extent of the evil, for the petitioners were never anxious to increase their expenses by diving into superfluous cases. Mr. ADDERLEY said the bribery established in this case had been very partial, and he hoped the House would not withold the issue of the writ. After some further discussion, the House divided, and the motion for the issue of the writ was carried by a majority of 89 to 47.

TENANT RIGHT.—On the question of going into committee on the Tenant Right (Ireland) Bill, proposed by the Hon. H. DRUMMOND, a discussion ensued, it being supported by Mr. S. Crawford, Mr. Anstey, and Mr. Fagan, while it was opposed by Sir W. Somerville, Mr. S. Herbert, Colonel Conolly, and Sir G. Grey. Eventually the bill was withdrawn.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS The House went into committee on the Parliamentary Electors Bill. On the first clause proposing to do away with the necessity of paying the assessed taxes, as well as the municipal rates, a short discussion took place, which terminated in a division, affirming the clause by a majority 59 to 47.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

SPAIN

Lord STANLEY inquired whether any further communications had been received from the Spanish Government, at the Foreign-office, after the departure of M. Isturitz from this country.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said that no further communications had been received, because diplomatic relations between the two countries had ceased to exist.

Lord STANLEY further asked whether application had not been made by some of the parties connected with the Spanish embassy in London to have despatches which had arrived from Spain, after the departure of the Spanish Ambassador, received by the Foreign Office.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE replied that application had been made, but that the despatches could not be received as diplomatic relations had been broken off.

The Criminal Law Consolidation (No. 2) Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

COPYHOLD TENURE.—On the order of the day for the second reading of the Copyhold Enfranchisement Extension Bill, the Marquis of SALISBURY opposed the bill, which, he contended, would have the effect of destroying all copyhold tenure, and he moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months

After some discussion, the House divided, when the second reading was carried by a majority of 31 to 16.

The Evicted Destitute Poor (Ireland) Bill was re-committed, and some amendments affecting the machinery of the measure were agreed to on the motion of Lord MONTEAGLE.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.—Mr. COBDEN gave notice, on the part of Mr. Hume, that the adjourned debate on the motion for Reform, which had been fixed for Friday, should be postponed to Friday the 30th inst., which day the Government had agreed to give up to the discussion.

BOROUGH OF HORSHAM.—Mr. GORING moved that a writ be issued for the election of a member for this borough, in the room of J. Jarvis, Esq., whose election had been declared void.—The JUDGE-ADVOCATE opposed the motion, which on a division was carried by a majority of 54 to 30.—The writ was accordingly ordered to be issued.

SUGAR DUTIES.—THE WEST INDIES.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

After a somewhat desultory conversation on the probability of Irish distillers being injuriously affected by the proposed reduction of the duty, the adjourned debate was resumed by Mr. MOFFAT, who opposed the measure of the Government, on the ground of its being a retrograde movement in the direction of protection.

In the discussion which ensued, Mr. GLADSTONE opposed the measure of the Government, on the ground that the West Indies presented an exceptionable case to free trade, as the contrast which, at the time of negro emancipation, were entered into by this country with the colonies, had been broken by our Government.

Mr. WILSON strongly advocated the policy of the Government measure.

The debate was then adjourned, and the House shortly afterwards rose.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Thus, usually, when he was asked to sing,
He gave the different nations something national:
To
Him music owed the largest
His main debt of increment of anything
Even more than his lyric fame in his own rational:
If Pindar sang horse races, what should hinder
Himself from being as pliable as Pindar?
DYER.

"Liberté! Fraternité! Egalité!" Here are three words which savour to the million of marrow and fatness, while "the twice two thousand that the world was made for" relish them as the human stomach is said to receive "cold porridge." Of course, in very imposing instances of pomp or circumstance office increment to our muse; for that reason, and seeing, moreover, that service may come of it, we will gossip a little—with your leave and license.

Now, you would expect all to say upon velvet in the Park—but it is not reasonable: according to Virgil it didn't do so with the mythology of Olympus. But that beings, whether human or inhuman, should, from sheer taste for such costume, "go about with their backs" [as a social phrase] is of very difficult solution. Is especial, that this peculiarity should attach to societies expressly constituted for the purpose of practising and promoting our great National Sports must mere the utmost wonderment. That such has been—and, we had almost said, will be the case—is not, unfortunately, news for the meanest who dabble in such details. There used to be a casus belli every season for one cause or another—or for no cause—between members and the Leagues of the Jockey Club. First they put some right honourable—or honourable—or other member into Coventry—and then comes retaliation: they threaten to turn A. off the heath if he does not behave himself; and B. promises to send them to the right-about unless they manage to mend their manners. Then they go to loggerheads with some plebes—and lo! he finds a knight that takes him in hand—and woe is me! they bite the dust. Fact—but in general terms. Now "the chivalry of this bright age" came off second best in these encounters. How shall it fare, peradventure, with those gentlemen who champion "the dangers of the seas?"

On the gallant shore of West Cowes fashion loveth to promenade what time galleys muster in that most learned of bays. Well did the begetteh a like spirit, and many a pleasure mariner crammeth his "gig," or "dandy," to make one of the festive throng. For seamen in enamelled buskins and patent polish, mud and shingle are unmeet: so the Government had placed—as it was stated: at the disposal of the Royal Yacht Squadron a certain landing-place of fair granite, hight the Ordnance Steps. Hereupon would its members disembark from their gilded shallops—there being taken to fit it for each foot by means of daily courses of scrubbing-brushes and bees' wax. Thus things were on for a time—indeed, until, by some extension of courtesy, the same privilege against mud and shingle, by the same means, was awarded to the sobs of the Royal Thames Yacht Club. This was not a popular step. In face of a European revolution, was it proper to expose a toe familiar with Almack's to possible contact with tribes which frequent Fleet-street, and are common to Wapping or the Strand?

Need the sequel be told as they say in the Minerva Press? The Secretary of the Royal Thames Yacht Club is in receipt of a cartel to the effect that henceforth the Squadron repudiates the Ordnance steps; and hinting that if the Royal Thames Yacht Club has any interest in preserving its purchased seat it contemplates a descent upon West Cowes—it had as well provide its own brushes and bees' wax. There will, of course, come ill blood of this. We have heard a rumour that what we call the Royal Squadron will not venture to say more at present than that the charge will most probably be sounded—by Adams's Band.

Reader, gainsay us not our gossip—we set out by pleading pliability of theme.

SPECIAL CONSTABLES ENTERTAINMENT ON CLAPHAM-COMMON.

CLAPHAM SPECIAL CONSTABLES' DINNER.

On Tuesday evening, the anniversary of Her Majesty's accession to the Throne, a public dinner was given at Clapham, which was attended by about 550 of the special constables of the district, who volunteered their services for the preservation of the public order, on the memorable 10th of April, 1848. A marquee was erected for the occasion in a field adjoining the Chase on Clapham-common. It was decorated with flags and evergreens, and on the tables were from splendidly piled with the choicest fruits. The dinner was excellently served by Mr. Robert Nash, of the Bowyer Arms Tavern, Market-road, Clapham. The chair was occupied by John Thornton, Esq., the senior resident magistrate, who was supported by other magistrates, the rector, and clergy, and Mr. Bowyer Atkins, the lord of the manor. A large number of the inhabitants were present as guests or spectators.

The fine band of the Coldstream Guards attended, and greatly enhanced the festivity of the scene. The following toasts were drunk with great enthusiasm:—"Her Queen," "The Queen Dowager" and "Royal Family;" "The British Constitution," "The Industrious Classes," and "The Friends of Good Order."

At the termination of the after-dinner proceedings, the company rose, and proceeded to Clapham Common, where the band continued to play, and the guests performed for some time.

The celebration of a constitutional demonstration, such as was that of the 10th of April, is novel, striking, and memorable. It was adopted, not as a reward for services which our country has, at all times, a right to expect from her sons, but to commemorate the signal loyalty and energy exhibited by all classes of our fellow-subjects, who came forward to aid in upholding the ancient institutions of the nation against the attacks of misguided men, seeking to profit by a period of general convulsion in other countries of Europe, to disturb the peace and good order of their own.

FATAL ACCIDENT AT THE LIVERPOOL ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

On Saturday morning, Richard Howard, one of the keepers at this establishment, had occasion to correct, for some disobedience, the stupendous elephant Rajah, when the infuriated animal struck the poor fellow to the ground, and then crushed him to death with his foot. The Messrs. Atkins, the proprietors of the beast, immediately resolved upon destroying the animal; and for this purpose two ounces of prussic acid and twenty-five grains of aconite were administered to him in a bun. Within two minutes after he ate some grass, and beyond a slight uneasiness he did not seem affected by the poison though it would have been enough to kill instantly 3000 men!

After three-quarters of an hour, as the poison did not take full effect, it was resolved to shoot the animal. For this purpose, a detachment of the 32nd Rifles (stationed in Liverpool) was sent for. On their arrival, fifteen men entered the passage before the den, and having waited their opportunity, fired; the elephant staggered, and leaned against his den. Fifteen other men then fired at him, when he fell on his left side and died instantly. As a precautionary measure, immediately on the death of the keeper, Mr. E. Atkins repaired to Mr. Dowling, at the head of the Liverpool Police, and obtained an order for two 6-pound cannons from the Albert Dock, which he placed against the elephant's house, in case of an attempted escape.

Among the gentlemen who were present when the animal was destroyed, was Van Amburgh, who is at present fulfilling an engagement at the Theatre Royal. There were also several medical gentlemen in attendance, to aid in dissecting the animal.

The elephant is said to have been the finest in Europe; he cost £800 eleven years since, but was estimated to have been worth more than £1000. This above was the second keeper he had killed; yet Rajah was ordinarily tractable, and walked about the gardens on gala nights with a car behind him.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "LES QUATRE SAISONS," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

OUR Illustration is taken from the new divertissement of the "Quatre Saisons," which we spoke of last week as having been produced with such great success at Her Majesty's Theatre. We were compelled from want of room to be very brief in our notice; but we can now return to the subject at greater length

The scene is remarkably beautiful, and represents a lovely conservatory with a fountain and exquisitely laid-out garden, about which are statues of rural and floral deities disposed in admirable taste. There is evidently great rejoicing and festivity going on—the garden teems with lady guests, rivalling the flowers in beauty: and all wears the air of a fête. Presently the four principal ladies meet, and plan a masque. These four are Cerito, Carlotta Grisi, Rosati, and Marie Taglioni; and they agree, in the above order, to assume the characters of Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter. Nothing can be more delicious than their appearance in their costumes, nor more appropriate than the very effective manner in which these are arranged, with the symbols and trappings of the season of the year they represent.

Followed by a train of nymphs, arrayed in similarly attractive guise, they perform a series of the most charming groupings we ever remember to have seen. Endless combinations of tints and poses, each of which seems to have exhausted the strange invention of Perrot, only to be followed by something more beautiful, form a perfect human kaleidoscope, if we may be allowed the simile; and then a grand pas de quatre takes place, for the four goddesses of the dance. This surpasses all, and raises the enthusiasm of the audience—as well it may—to the highest possible pitch. They first dance singly, Cerito bounding round in her own inimitable style, catching up flowers from baskets presented to her, and throwing them above and around her with most joyous abandon, and Carlotta looking more lovely and dancing with greater eloquence—for every attitude speaks for itself—than ever. Rosati performs all her choicest feats, and Marie Taglioni does wonders in her peculiar line. At last they all unite in an ensemble, and the delight of the spectators reaches its climax, the applause coming like a thunder-storm upon the festival.

The "Quatre Saisons" is a Terpsichorean achievement of the highest order, bidding fair to eclipse all that Perrot has hitherto done, great as have been his triumphs. We expect, however, that he must have attained the highest pitch of success; if he ever surpasses this, we shall deem him more than mortal. Apart from the agreeable nature of the subject in itself, the whole idea is worked out with consummate skill and artistic taste. A vein of high poetry runs through every pose and combination formed, and the eye is unceasingly delighted by some of the most beautiful effects of colour and graceful disposition of charming forms that it is possible to conceive. On no account should the opportunity be lost of witnessing it.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Donizetti's "Anna Bolena" was given for the second time on Saturday, with its powerful cast, and went off with infinitely greater spirit than on the preceding Thursday. It is a work exacting a great combination of talent to render effective, and it has been most carefully mounted on this occasion. The Anna Bolena of Grisi is one of her finest impersonations: the indignant exclamations in the scene in which Henry VIII. orders her trial, always excite the auditory prodigiously; and her picture of woe in the execution-scene is touching and dramatic. Santos has an elegant romanza, "Dehl non voler," in which Alboni is always encored. Our artists depict her singing this air of the Page, sitting on a stool, with a harp, in presence of the Queen and Court. Mdlle. Corbari sang the music of Lady Jane Seymour most charmingly, but she is wanting in animation in her acting. The Percy of Marlo, and the Henry VIII. of Tamburini, with Tagliafico as Rochford, combine an admirable ensemble. The vestibule, or Tudor-hall of the chamber, where the council is assembled, is a magnificent scenic display, as much in actual construction as in the painting. The burst of the military band, outside the prison-walls, just as Anna is to be conducted to the scaffold, is one of those highly dramatic effects, so carefully attended to by Mr. Costa in his musical direction. The splendid scenery and gorgeous appointments—the musical, as well as pictorial beauties, of "Anna Bolena"—are evidences of historical accuracy, judgment, and good taste, in every respect to be commended.

On Tuesday night "Norma" was given, with Grisi, Corbari, Mario, and Salvi; and the comic scene from "Betly," with Alboni.

On Thursday, for the extra night, Rossini's ever popular opera, "La Gazza Ladra," was revived with an unprecedented cast, Grisi being the Ninetta; Mdme Bellini, Lucia, the mother of Giannetto (Mario); Lavia, Isaaco, the Jew Pedlar; Tagliafico, Fabrizio, the farmer; Polonini, Giorgio; Soldi, Antonio; Tamburini, the soldier Fernando; Marini, Il Podesta, the wicked magistrate; and Alboni, the generous hearted Pippo. The interesting story—familiarly known to the public as the pathetic drama of "The Maid and the Magpie," played by Miss Kelly in former days with such power—the scientific harmonies, canons, imitations, and masterly construction of the concerted pieces, and the exquisite melodies of the "Gazza Ladra" bring into play every variety of lyric perfection." The overture, with its martial introduction and fiery allegro, is alone worthy of hearing, as interpreted by Costa's band. It was rapturously encored. It was in Ninetta that Grisi first made her début in this country in 1834, and her supremacy in the part has been absolute. It taxes severely the histrionic and vocal powers, as Ninetta is scarcely absent from the stage from the beginning to the end. The joyous movements in the introduction, the air of Mario, the Drinking Song of Alboni, the quaint air of the Jew, the masterly trio, "Oh, Nama," the duo between Tamburini and Grisi, the wonderful trial scene, the touching duo between Grisi and Alboni, "Ebben per mia memoria," and the affecting march and prayer in the execution, were superbly rendered. The second and last acts of "I Capuletti," with Viardot's magnificent acting in Romeo and Castellan's masterly Juliet, were given after the "Gazza Ladra." The house was fully and fashionably attended.

Owing to the prevailing wet weather, the fairs, and consequently the buyers, the beef trade was excessively dull, at a decline in the quotations of Monday of 2d per 8lbs. The highest figure for the primest Scots was 3s 10d per 8lbs. The sheep trade in this stock was scarcely good, and nearly 500 Scots were on offer from Scotland, in excellent condition. Although the supply of sheep were to the fairness, the sale for that description of stock was steady, at full rates of currency. Prime Down lambs were in fair request, at extreme currencies. In all other lots very little was doing, the rates having a downward tendency. With calves we were heavily supplied; while the veal trade was dull, at barely late rates. In pigs next to nothing was done. Milch cows were dull, at from £19 to £21 each, including their small calf

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The first report of the Select Committee upon the operation of the Bank Charter Bill is just issued. This report gives the result of the inquiry as far as relates to England, it being intended that Scotland and Ireland shall form separate subjects of consideration. Mr. Hodgson, Mr. Turner, Mr. Muntz, and Mr. Salt were the parties examined on behalf of the Liverpool and Birmingham interests; Mr. Gurney, Mr. Bates, and Mr. Bevan were called to give evidence with respect to London. Mr. Birkbeck represented the country bankers. Mr Pease furnished information regarding the northern coal districts. The Governor and Deputy-Governor, and also Mr. Horsley Palmer, and Mr. William Cotton, gave evidence respecting the proceedings of the Bank of England; and, lastly, Mr. Samuel Jones Loyd, Mr. Tooke, and Mr. Taylor were examined on account of their general connexion with currency and banking. After much contradictory evidence the great majority of the witnesses recognised the justness of the principles upon which the act is founded, and the committee arrived at the prudent conclusion, that "it is not expedient to make any alteration in the Bank Act."

All transfers to Consols being suspended until after the payment of the dividend, there was is now consequently limited to transactions for the Account. As the purchases on behalf of the public are, with few exceptions, made for money, and immediate delivery, at the present time the influence on the market usually produced by such purchases necessarily ceases. Added to this, an indisposition exists on the part of the speculators to deal, from the peculiar position of affairs. The balance of opinion is decidedly in favour of a contin ance, but bulling to any extent during the existing state of Continental politics—a rather a dangerous undertaking, while, on the other hand, the expectation for a fall dare not venture to deal on, from the knowledge of political prejudices existing, within the is sited interval of an account. These united causes have tended to limit business, and to render prices rather flatter, although the depression in Consols has not exceeded an eighth per cent during the week. On Monday the opening price was 83¾, but it soon receded, and remained during the day at 83⅝ to ¾ for Account. A slight flatness on Tuesday closed quotations at 83⅝. The market would have been heavy to operate to a greater extent, but a large purchase in Reduced supported quotations generally, contributing, at the same time, to equalise the prices of that stock and Consols. On Wednesday there was scarcely a movement during the day; but the dullness of the weather and the absence of depressing news influenced prices favourably on Thursday. Exchequer Bills are firm at about previous rates, and New Three-and-a-Quarters per Cents have advanced, upon a large purchase on behalf of the Bank of England. At the close of the week quotations stood as follows:—Bank Stock, 192½; Three per Cent. Reduced, 84; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 84¼; Long Annuities to expire January, 1860, 8¾; India Bonds, £1000, 3s; Consols for Opening, 83⅝; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 40 p; Small, 37 p; Ditto Advertised, June, 32 p

The foreign Market continues without movement, the business transacted being on the most limited scale. During the week the greatest fluctuation has been a fall of one per cent. in Peruvian, the other stocks only varying to a fractional extent. In the Spanish market there was a little more firmness, and Mexican advanced upon the ratification of the treaty of peace. Prices of security actually dealt in are for Brazilian Bonds, Account, 66; Chilian Bonds, Six per Cents, 1842, Account, 87½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent. Certificates, 55; Five per Cent., 1845, 103; Ditto, Account, 103¼; Peruvian Bonds, Six per Cents, 32; Spanish Bonds, 1840, Account, 11½; Ditto, ditto, Three per Cent., Account, 22¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 55; Ditto, Four per Cent. Certificates, 64¼

Depression and diminution of business continue the leading characteristics of the Share-market. To the reduction of the traffic returns this may be mainly ascribed, the high-priced share quotations in the general decline. The heavy state of the market will be readily seen by the following quotations:—Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 23; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 18½; Boston, Sleaford, and Midland Counties, 9½; Caledonian, 3⅞ dis.; Caledonian, 30⅜; Chester and Holyhead, 14¾; Eastern Counties, 14; Ditto, New, Guaranteed 6 per Cent., 3; Ditto, Extension, 5 per Cent., No. 2, £9 13s. 4d., 4 dis; East Union, Scotch, 5 per Cent., 12½; East Lancashire, 18 x. n.; Ditto, 6 per Cent. Preference Quarters, 2½; East Lincolnshire, 20¾; Great Northern, 5⅞; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 21; Ditto, New, £40, 64; Great Western, 84¾; Ditto, Half-Shares, 44; Ditto, New, £17, 7½; Hull and Selby, 4 Shares, 48¾; Lancashire and Carlisle, 51½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 4 Shares, 13; Ditto, New, Guaranteed, 6 per Cent., 2½; Ditto (Preston and Wyre), 5½; London and Blackwall, 4¼; London and Brighton, and South Coast, 30½; Ditto, Guaranteed 5 per Cent., 8½; London and North-Western, 118½; Ditto, New, 2½; Ditto, Fifths, 6¼; Ditto, Fifth (Oxford and B. C. & J. Extension), 1; Ditto, Western, £50, 20¾; Midland, 100; North British, 21½; Ditto, Half Shares, 9½; Ditto, Extension, 4; Ditto, Thirds, ½; North Staffordshire, 9½; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 6½; Royston and Hitchin, 24; Ditto, New, 5; South Devon, 18; South-Eastern, 23½; Ditto, No. 1, 14½; Ditto, No. 2, 11½; Ditto, No. 4, Thirds, 5½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick Extension, No. 1, 17½; Ditto, ditto, No. 2, 14; Sambre and Meuse, 4

SATURDAY MORNING.—Consols opened yesterday at 83⅝ ¾ for Account, but some sales depressed prices to 83⅝ ½, which was the closing quotation. The Foreign and Share Market displayed no feature of interest.

OBSERVATORY ON THE CROSS OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

ORDNANCE SURVEY OF LONDON AND THE ENVIRONS.

IN our Journal for April 22, we briefly explained this important work; and illustrated the subject with two Engravings—one, the observatory, or "Crow's Nest" upon one of the towers of Westminster Abbey. We then intimated that a similar construction was to be put up above the cross of St. Paul's Cathedral: this has been completed within the last few days; and, by the obliging aid of the officers concerned in the construction, we are now enabled to illustrate the subject more in detail than hitherto.

In order to conduct the Survey, it is necessary to select high buildings, as principal observing stations; whence "are taken angles with theodolites from the most commanding objects to the other remarkable objects, such as church spires, or towers, cupolas, factory chimneys, &c., for the purpose of ascertaining their relative bearings and distances."

St. Paul's Cathedral, by its position and commanding height, is, probably, the best station in or about London. Accordingly, there has been erected a scaffold from what is termed the Golden Gallery to the summit of the Cross, as shown in the first Engraving. Upon this scaffold is a stage, 10 feet square, which supports an observatory, within which is placed upon a tube a theodolite 18 inches in diameter of the circle. A railing, roughly but securely put up, surrounds the stage, which, with the observatory, is shown enlarged in the second Engraving.

The observatory is a hexagon figure, 3 feet in diameter, and about 11 feet high, with panelled sides and canvas roof. The interior is shown in the third Illustration.

The construction of the scaffolding and stage should be detailed. The former is of rough poles, and the stage itself has its principal bearing on the Golden Gallery, or top of the great cone. The four lower posts, which are 29 feet long, stand upon short planks bedded on the stone footway; and the top supports the angles of four horizontal planks, each 23 feet long, and bolted together at the angles. From these planks has been erected a screen of boards, to prevent materials, &c., from falling. The base of the four upper posts, (which are 53 feet long) rests on the angles of the above planks; and the scaffold, in addition to these posts, consists of four sets of horizontals, and four sets of transverse, braces, on each of the four sides, the whole being fastened together with spikes and ropes. Again, fifty-six feet of the uprights are double poles placed base and point, and bound together with hoop-iron and wedges, and bolts and hoop-iron at the splices.

The height from base to floor is 82 feet, and to the extreme top of the observatory, 92 feet. The ascent is by the inside of the tower or lantern to the circular openings; then passing to the outside to the foot-ladders, which are set at the north-east corner, parallel to the north-east principal post, inside the scaffold.

The whole of the materials have been drawn up from the floor by a permanent windlass (erected in the tower) to the Golden Gallery; and thence passed to the outside horizontally, through an aperture 22 inches wide; and they were further drawn up and put in position by purchase erected for the purpose. The greatest care has been taken to make the stage secure, and fit for the important use for which it has been constructed. It is about five tons weight; and, deducting the time for stoppages (during the performance of Divine Service in the Cathedral), as well as taking into account all the attendant difficulties, the raising has been by no means slow. The whole has been executed under the superintendence of Corporal Beaton, by direction of Captain Yolland, of the Royal Engineers.

The probable number of points to be observed is about 900; and the number of observations may be 1600 or 1800.

We subjoin a few additional details, explanatory of the Survey, from the Builder:

"In every extensive survey, conducted with a due regard to scientific accuracy, it is a matter of the first importance to determine with unerring correctness the relative distances and bearings of the principal or most conspicuous objects within the country or district to be surveyed. To effect this, the first operation is to measure a "base line"—that is, a straight or right line between two points, varying in length according to the extent of the survey and the facilities afforded by the nature of the ground for the measurement. For this purpose, glass rods, deal rods, steel bars, steel chains, compensation bars (that is, bars of different metals so arranged that, like Harrison's Gridiron Pendulum, they counteract each others expansion during changes of temperature), have been severally used in different countries in the operation.

"The base line being measured, the next step is to connect its extremities by means of angles taken with theodolites or other angular instruments, with all the conspicuous objects visible; the relative distances and bearings of which with each other, and with the base, become thus determinable by means of certain well-known trigonometrical formulæ. By selecting the most suitable of these observed objects for new observing stations, the calculated distances become, in their turn, base lines for expanding the operations of the 'triangulation,' until the whole country, by a connected line of observing stations, becomes united or interlaced by a perfect net-work of triangles,—the distances and bearings, the latitudes and longitudes of which are all unerringly ascertained.

"This 'triangulation' forms the basis or groundwork for an accurate detailed survey of the entire district or country over which it has extended, and obviously affords accurate data for detecting or eliminating all practical errors of measurement or other detail—operations which may, and inevitably will, in the progress of extensive works, creep in, with the most careful surveyors. It also affords the means, and the only means, of making a connected survey of a country or extensive district; that is, of making (or giving the means of doing so) the several parts of which it is composed harmonize and fit together, which, without the binding power of a general triangulation, would be impossible.

"The area intended to be comprised in the metropolitan survey is something above 200 square miles, or nearly 130,000 acres, and as the map is to be constructed on the very large scale (for a district of such an extent) of 60 inches to a mile, or 1 inch to 88 feet, which, when completed will occupy about 500 sheets 3 feet by 2 feet, or about 3400 square feet of paper or copper—it would be utterly impossible to make the survey and project the map on such a scale, so that the several consecutive parts or sheets shall combine and fit together to form one entire map of unquestionable accuracy if every possible precaution (and the number and extent of these precautions can only be known to practical professional men) were not rigidly attended to in the outset with the preliminary part of the work.

"But what (ask some simple-minded men) have the 'crows' nests' on the tops of the steeples to do with 'levelling' the ground for sanitary improvement? Nothing whatever, directly; but everything as forming an essential part of an indivisible whole. But correct levels are comparatively useless without a correct map to insert them on; a correct map cannot be produced without a correct survey; and the essential preliminary part of this correct survey is the 'triangulation.'

"The London survey will be connected by its triangulation with the general survey of the country, and in its levelling with the one uniform datum plane to which the altitudes of the Ordnance six-inch map are referred. By this means, when the map is complete, the relative level of any two points within the eight-mile radius of the metropolitan survey, or of any part of London, and any part of the north of England, may be seen at a glance by those who require and know how to look for the information."

WINCHELSEA, SUSSEX.

THE ancient town of Winchelsea, added before the reign of Henry III. to the Cinque (or Five) Ports of the Conqueror's time, lies on the Sussex coast, between Hastings and Romney. It is a place of great antiquity, having been known to the Romans. It was, however, of no considerable importance till under the Saxon government. There is great doubt as to the original site of the town, as in 1287 it was totally destroyed by a sudden irruption of the sea. The greatest probability is that it was near Camber Point, near which are still the remains of Camber Castle, erected by Henry VIII., connected by subterraneous caverns with the Church and Friary, from which it is distant more than a mile.

The town was originally surrounded by a wall, built by Edward I., having three gates, which are yet remaining, though greatly dilapidated. The one in the best state of preservation is the Strandwell or Pipe-well Gate, near the watch-house, on the Rye road.

Of the three churches, one only—dedicated to St. Thomas à Becket, or St Thomas of Canterbury—has a portion left, namely, the aisles and the chancel surmounted by a tower, which are used for Divine service.

Winchelsea, till the passing of the Reform Bill, returned two members to Parliament. It has a corporation, consisting of a mayor and twelve jurats, who have the exclusive privilege of the "silver ear," an authority held by the ser-

INSURRECTION IN PARIS.

PARIS, Friday, 5 30 P.M.

The National Guard and the troops are fighting with the people. All is in confusion, and an awful sacrifice of life has taken place.

Our Correspondent writes "Everything has begun again" The Boulevard du Temple, up to the Place de la Bastille, is the scene of a collision between the National Guards and the people, (ouvriers). Barricades have been formed: one of them opposite the Porte St. Martin, has been taken by the National Guards. There has been some sharp firing by workmen from the roof and third story house of M. Jobrin, at the corner of the Boulevard, near the Porte St. Denis; (one of the guards, close by our Correspondent, was shot in the thigh.) but the house has been taken by the National Guard. For some time, not a single soldier of the troops of the line was to be seen; but crowds of National Guards were throwing down their arms, and running away in every direction; a few were standing on the barricades, and firing at the windows of Jobrin's house. At the moment of our Correspondent writing, the Boulevard had been swept by the National Guards, up to the Chateau d'Eau. The troops, cavalry, foot, and artillery, had come up, with General Lamoricière at their head.

RED REPUBLICANISM.

THE "Red Republicans" have justified their name. They have filled the streets of Paris with blood. They have enacted scenes unparalleled in the annals of civilisation. They have offered the world a more unhappy spectacle than has yet been recorded in history. They have perpetrated atrocities, which, if committed by nation against nation, would have excited the execration of the present and the immortal infamy of the future; but which, being committed by brother against brother, and by class against class of the same people, add sorrow and sympathy to our indignation and horror. Nor are these mingled feelings rendered less intense when we reflect upon the unhappy fatality by which the consummation was hastened, and on the overwhelming necessity which impelled the friends of order in France to crush at any cost, however stupendous, an insurrection, of which the success would have been more awful than the most awful possible form of its suppression.

The history of the sad calamity which will render memorable in all time the month of June, 1848, is by no means intricate. Its simplicity is as striking as its magnitude. The clue to all its windings is easily found. The catastrophe has long been foreseen. It sprang, as a necessary consequence, from the premises laid down in February. While every one must deplore, none can be surprised at it.

On the 24th of February the populace of Paris were victorious, not merely by their own efforts, but by the very apathy of the middle classes. The latter could not take up arms for a system of corruption like that of Louis Philippe. Moral strength and dignity were wanting to its support. It fell from the combined operation of the physical force of one class of society and the moral disgust of the other. But, on that very day, when the old system was overthrown, and a new one was installed in its place, a difference sprang up between the active and passive agents of the Revolution. The disunion arose in the very birth of their alliance. The operative and middle classes were at feud from the outset. They had embarked in the career of Revolution from different motives; and, in their intentions, aspirations, and ideas, were wide as the poles asunder. The working classes, or "Red Republicans," were imbued with the doctrines of Communism. They looked for a regeneration of society. They expected that a political change would bring about a social Revolution, that workmen should never more lack work, and that work should never more lack adequate pay in the happy land of France. They looked upon the old doctrines of political economy with distrust or abhorrence, and considered that, as every man had a clear right to his life from Nature, he had as clear a right to the means of living from society or the state. As the standard of this new creed, they raised the red flag. They called themselves Red Republicans, and those among them who were sincere looked for a social Millennium as the inevitable consequence of a Revolution founded upon their ideas.

The middle classes, however, did not share these ideas. They aided to overthrow a corrupt system—because it was corrupt; and they rejected Louis Philippe and his monarchy, because Louis Philippe inspired no respect, and because monarchy had been tried under every form in France, and under every form had proved a failure. They wanted no red flag, which was to them an emblem of terror alone. They were content with the old tri-colour, and with the ideas with which it was so intimately associated. These were ideas of political, and not of social change,—ideas of republicanism as distinguished from monarchism,—of an elective president, instead of an hereditary chief,—and of the old social instincts, governing free as well as despotic states, and which had hitherto been the guides of mankind in all the peaceful pursuits of modern civilization.

These two flags and two principles were brought, if not into physical, at least into moral collision, in the hour of their combined triumph over the monarchy. They met face to face upon the steps of the Hôtel de Ville. M. de Lamartine represented the one—the whole populace the other. In the midst of difficulty an danger, which might have appalled the bravest of men, but did not appal M. de Lamartine, he defended the tri-colour against the drapeau rouge. He used all the eloquence of which he is master. A thousand weapons were raised against him; but his eloquence prevailed for the moment, and red republicanism consented to furl its flag, and adopt the old standard of the Republic. But while the emblem was discarded, the thought remained. The orator had touched the imagination, not the heart of the multitude. Nevertheless a truce was sounded, and M. de Lamartine became the chief of the Provisional Government in the interest of the middle classes, of the old traditions of the Republic, and of the principles of political economy relating to labour, capital, and the industry of nations, which had hitherto guided the world. Men of his own principles were installed along with him. But by their side were found the men of the new ideas,—men who, at that hour of their triumph, were not to be shaken off,—men who looked for social, more than for political change. Albert (ouvrier), Louis Blanc, and Flocon were co-equal members of the Government in the interest of the working classes. They told the people by authority that the revolution which they had wrought should this time be turned to their advantage; that, though often deceived before, they should not be deceived again; and that work and pay should never more in France fail the heroic "people" who were the fathers of the Revolution. During the first few weeks of the Republic these men spoke—not merely with authority, but with power. Their ideas seemed to be in the ascendant, and, if not understood, were at all events acquiesced in by the other members of the Government. The working classes—flushed with success—flattered by all parties—amused with fêtes and festivals of the most gorgeous magnificence—waited for the good things that were promised them, and defended the new régime with the same enthusiasm and zeal which had been so valuable in founding it. The national workshops were established by the consent of the whole Government. The tax-paying community—already over-taxed—were once again taxed, in order to support them. Although trade was at a stand, and although, as a necessary and inevitable consequence of such a convulsion as that which had swept over France, the middle classes were impoverished, and daily lost some portion of the hardly-earned rewards of their industry, enterprise, and economy, the "people" were not allowed to suffer. They were fed with large wages, and supported at the public expense either in total idleness, or in work which was of no productive advantage, and which diminished instead of adding to the wealth of society. Consequently, the re-action, which virtually began on the steps of the Hôtel de Ville, went on increasing. It could not do otherwise. The "Republic" itself was never really in question; all men of sense were agreed upon the necessity of giving it a fair trial; but the right of those who possessed nothing to live upon the substance of those who possessed something, was every day denied with bitter words by an increasing army of men engaged in trade and commerce, and who formed the true wealth, power, and intelligence of the community. The cry of "reaction" was raised by the conquerors of February. The working classes could not but see that the Revolution was in the hands of men who were not inclined to reconstitute society, however much they might be inclined to reconstitute Government, and who had not utterly discarded all the experience of past ages. The election of a National Assembly that was not Communist gave the finishing stroke to this feeling, and convinced the Communists, once for all, that their ideas and their friends had lost ground, and that they would find no future favour with the body that was to govern France in the name of the Republic. They knew that they had made one Revolution in February; they had been flattered and caressed for their pains: they attempted another in May, doubtless expecting a similar result. The attempt was premature, rash, and ill-conducted. The middle classes, no longer apathetic, were active. It failed, as a matter of course; and its leaders, Blanqui, Cabet, Raspail, Albert (ouvrier), and the other chiefs of the Red Republican or Communist factions, were transferred to the dungeon of Vincennes, to await punishment for the heavy crime of treason against the National Representation and the safety of the Republic.

The breach continued to widen. The feud between the Communists and the anti-Communists in and out of the Government, in the National Assembly, and in the streets, was rendered more bitter and more desperate by the result of the 15th of May. The one party prepared for a more vigorous attack—the other for a still more obstinate defence. The Red Republicans determined to found a Republic of their own, upon the overthrow of that previously existing; and the Moderates, or, as they were derisively called, the "Pale Republicans," determined, if once called to arms by the faction of Communism, to crush it for ever. The necessity for disbanding the immense army of workmen, amounting to more than 120,000 men—composed not merely of Parisian operatives, but of idle and dissolute adventurers, galley slaves, and plunderers who had flocked into Paris from all parts of the country, and who were consuming the very vitals of the Republic, at a period of commercial and monetary pressure brought the feud to a crisis. The sincere operatives, aided by the villanous plunderers—the whole of them well organised, commanded by resolute chiefs—designing men, whose names are as yet concealed, prepared in secret for the final struggle. Discarding all the cries of mere faction of the people—thinking nothing of Buonapartism, Louis-Philippism, or Henri-Cinquism—they commenced operations on Thursday week in the name of the "Red Republic—democratic and social." They fought obstinately. They were obstinately resisted. After a struggle of four days, unparalleled for its savage ferocity, they have been vanquished, but at a cost which it is fearful to contemplate. Three or four thousand killed, and double that number wounded, is the very lowest estimate of the loss.

The offensive operations of the insurgents were planned and executed with consummate skill. Their strategy has excited the admiration of men whose trade is war. They were well supplied with arms and ammunition; and they were aided by an amount of zeal, daring, and savage enthusiasm on the part of the lower orders of the population, male and female, which is perfectly marvellous. On their side the defenders of order manifested resolution, coolness, and perseverance; and the Garde National, the troops of the line, and the Garde Mobile vied with each other in bravery and self-sacrifice. The last-named body elicited the surprise as well as the gratitude of Paris. It is composed chiefly of lads under twenty years of age, mostly belonging to the working classes; and their zeal in defence of order was so great and so constant, and testified by so many acts of heroism, that, while it drew upon them the applause of the well-disposed inhabitants of the capital, it excited a feeling of intense hatred in the minds of the insurgents. The latter had evidently calculated upon their support; and their indignation was so much the greater, when they found that these "children of the people," as they called them, had turned their arms against the workmen. Whenever any of this devoted band fell into the power of the insurgents, they were slaughtered remorselessly; and among the many fearful episodes of the struggle, it is related that the heads of many of them were cut off by women and stuck on poles at the head of a barricade which they had lost their lives in attempting to storm.

Many such fearful episodes are narrated. Many more equally fearful will perhaps never be known. The death of the unfortunate Archbishop of Paris is perhaps the most affecting of them all. The venerable prelate, after having consulted with General Cavaignac as to the expediency of so doing, went forth from his residence, attended by another priest, to address words of peace and conciliation to the armed multitude on the Place de la Bastile. While engaged in this task, so touching and so appropriate to his high and sacred office, he was shot in the loins from behind. After lingering twenty-four hours, he expired of the wound. The bullet seems to have come from the window of one of the houses of the Place, and the insurgents earnestly denied all implication in the guilt of the catastrophe. It is generally looked upon as the result of accident, but is none the less affecting and remarkable on that account. Three or four members of the National Assembly have been killed, and many wounded. Ten or twelve general officers—more, it is said, than ever fell in any one battle, however sanguinary, under Napoleon, have lost their lives: while it may be truly said, that there is scarcely a family in Paris that has not lost a son, a brother, or a husband in this abominable struggle of a desperate faction.

The powers confided to General Cavaignac were necessarily dictatorial. It remains to be seen whether they will be continued for a while, for the very safety of society itself, in his hands, or in those of any other individual to whom it may be judged more politic to confide them. Let us hope that from so awful a lesson, the French people of all classes will derive instruction, and that it will prove of inestimable value to them amid the many and great perils that yet menace them. The desperate nature of the struggle shows that it proceeded from a deeply rooted conviction in the minds of those who commenced it at such odds, and carried it on for so many days, under such an amount of disadvantages. The Government, whether that of an individual, of a dynasty, or of a Legislative Assembly, which is compelled by an unhappy fatality to act with such terrible rigour, draws upon itself by its victory an amount of hatred not to be measured at the moment of its success. It is not possible but that the worst feelings should be excited in the breasts both of the victors and the vanquished in a war like this. We dare not hope that the worst is yet over. The old question of labour and food will still arise. There were 120,000 workmen receiving state wages. If 10,000 of them have been killed or taken prisoners, there will still remain 110,000 men, —a fearful army, clamouring for bread and work. What shall be done with them? That is the problem to be solved. A mighty and intricate one it is; and one which, we must confess, we see no solution that shall not entail additional misery upon unhappy France.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALIAN STATES.

LOMBARDY. Letters from the Sardinian head-quarters at Vallegio, of the 19th, state that, since the commande to Verona, the whole army had remained in its old positions. A smart affair took place on the 18th ult., near Rivoli, between 2000 Austrians cut off from the river, and driven on the Montebaldo, and two battalions of Piedmontese, which ended in the defeat of the former, with the loss of 47 killed and 27 prisoners.

The whole army was set in march towards the Upper and Lower Adige on the morning of the 19th, but head-quarters still remained at Vallegio

The city of Venice was well prepared to defend itself from any attack of the Austrians, being supplied with a garrison of 13,000 men, composed of Neapolitans and Romans, under the command of Lieutenant-General William Pepe.

The blockade of Trieste still continued. The wealthy inhabitants had almost all fled; and it was said to be far from tranquil.

The Chamber of Turin was engaged with a project of law for ratifying not only the union of Lombardy, but also of Padua, Vicenza, Treviso, and Rovigo, to Piedmont. A decree was passed for an immediate enlistment of twenty thousand men. The Milanese Government has published an energetic proclamation, exhorting the people of Lombardy to extraordinary sacrifices and exertions. Through the German papers we learn that the Austrian Cabinet had accepted the mediation of England in the Italian question, and that negotiations for peace would be shortly opened at the Court of Sardinia. They are to be conducted on the following basis: That the provinces of Lombardy and a portion of the province of Venice be abandoned in exchange for a portion of the public debt of Austria.

ROME. Reinforcements to the Italian army, with arms and ammunition, are about to be sent to Rome. Ancona has offered 12,000 men ready armed.

Advices from Rome, of the 19th, state that the Ministry had resigned.

NAPLES. Advices from Naples, of the 17th, announce that the situation of the kingdom is so serious, the insurgent provinces having had some successes and refusing to lay down their arms, that he had spoken of abdicating in favour of his son; but (add the advices) it will be too late. The city of Naples was apparently tranquil, and the state of siege had been removed. The King's health was said to be very delicate.

SICILY.—The Sicilian Parliament, sitting at Palermo, has published the list of four candidates for the throne of Sicily. They are a son of the King of Sardinia, the son of the Duke of Tuscany, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte (son of the Prince de Canino, Lucien Bonaparte), and the Prince de Scaturbaria.

SPAIN

Accounts to the 23rd ult. have reached us from Madrid. The official organ of the Government had, on the preceding day, published a decree profoundly for the purpose of ameliorating the financial condition of the country, of which the first article commands a forced contribution of 100,000,000 reals, in anticipation of the taxes to be due in the year 1849. The second article decrees that a saving of 40,000,000 reals shall be accomplished in the public expenditure. A commission is appointed to revise the situation of the Bank, to be composed of wealthy capitalists.

A Royal ordinance appoints Manuel de la Pezuela, Marquis of Viluma, to be Royal commissioner of the Spanish Bank of St. Ferdinand, in place of M. F. Orlando. J. N. Calderon is appointed counsellor of the Spanish Bank of St. Ferdinand.

General Count de Mirasol had arrived at Madrid.

Senor Isturitz arrived in Madrid on the 22nd, and his appearance gave rise to a rumour that a change of Ministry was imminent. The declaration of Lord John Russell in Parliament, that Isturitz had been cancelled, created a good deal of alarm at Madrid, and entirely dispelled the comfortable effects of the Heraldo's assurance the day before, that the retirement of Isturitz was quite voluntary.

Mr. Webster, the Queen's counsel, arrived at Madrid on the 22nd, with despatches for Mr. Otway, of the British Legation, commanding the immediate departure of the members of the Legation. Mr. Brackenbury, the Queen's courier, was to remain with the despatches, and, should the case British subjects that still remained in the capital.

General Concha had received orders to organise a regiment of cavalry to replace that which revolted at Madrid

A Carlist rising was spoken of as likely.

PORTUGAL.

Advices received this week from Lisbon state that numerous arrests of parties formerly connected with the Oporto Junta had taken place, and a great many more were concealed, for fear the police. Mr. Jackson, Secretary of Legation, at Lisbon, had received upon the evidence of parties they were said to have enlisted for an insurrectionary movement. The truth of these accusations was greatly doubted as regards some of the prisoners; and with respect to Mr. Jackson, the whole had been delayed beyond the time allowed by the charter. The editors of several of the liberal journals were amongst those seized by order of the Government. The Cortes were to open on the 15th of June, but the session was likely to be brought to a premature close for want of members.

AUSTRIA.

Advices from Innspruck, the capital of the Tyrol, where the Imperial Court has been staying for some time past, mention that the Archduke John had left that town for Vienna, where he was to arrive on the 23d ult., and at once enter upon the duties of his temporary regency. The Ministers Dobloff and Wessenberg accompanied him. The majority of the corps diplomatique had gone to Ischl, to which place the Emperor had been advised to repair. His state of health is asserted to be very precarious.

In Vienna great excitement prevailed among the workmen, who, though employed and supported by the State, continued creating disturbances, and making the most unjust and exorbitant demands. In some partial outbreaks, the National Guards had acted with great energy, and captured some of the ringleaders. There were about 20,000 workmen kept by the State, and paid 25 kreutzers (10d.) each, which makes a total amount of wages of from 8000 to 10,000 florins per diem.

HUNGARY

According to advices from Pesth, dated the 19th ult., the insurrection was still spreading in several parts of Hungary, particularly about Neusatz, where the discontented Servians and Illyrians were awaiting the attack of the Hungarians. It has been officially stated that 40,000 more troops are required to put down the insurrection.

Carlowitz had been bombarded by the Field-Marshal Lieutenant Baron Habrawsky. The town was completely destroyed, and was now one smoking heap of ruins. No trace was left of the splendid Cathedral and Archiducal Palace.

BOHEMIA.

Letters from Prague, of the 21st ult., state that order is now restored in that town, that the shops are again opened, and that confidence is returning. Papers, which contain important information of the purpose and extent of the conspiracy, are in the hands of the Government, and a number of arrests have taken place, especially among the clergy

If we are to believe the German papers, whose statements, however, respecting any of the nations (Hungarian, Bohemian, or Polish) who are subjected to German rule, must be received with great caution, as being generally coloured, and often directly falsified, the insurgents had made a list of the names of 1400 Germans whom they had doomed, and the peasantry were prepared to assist in the butchery. Prince Windischgrätz is enthusiastically praised for his foresight, prudence, and energy, and it is added that almost all the Czechish leaders had an eye to the Bohemian crown, and that, if their sanguinary undertaking had succeeded, they would have fought for its among themselves. Baron Villani, Count Bonqui, and Fuster, a publican, were the principal candidates, each of whom had his party. Count Leo Thun, the head of the Czechish Provisional Government, was less an accomplice than a tool in the hands of these men. His life was in jeopardy during the insurrection, and he fled to the Hradschin (the citadel of Prague), where he still continued to remain, as the gate has since, though nobody thinks of obeying them. Prague is altogether in the power of Prince Windischgrätz and his troops.

GERMAN STATES.

FRANKFORT. On the 24th ult., the Frankfort Constituant Assembly was still occupied with the discussion of the motion relating to the establishment of a central power. The great point of debate is, whether that power, when created, shall have a veto, or shall be obliged to promulgate the decrees of the Assembly. During the discussions, Herr Ravenna, the Cologne deputy and popular orator, spoke in warm terms of the Natzona. Assembly of France, and asked the members to rise from their seats in acknowledgment of the friendly behaviour and expressions of that body. Nearly all the members of the Constituent Assembly immediately rose up amidst loud and long-continued cheers from all parts, including the public tribunes. The debate was resumed on Monday, but the result has not yet transpired. It appears that Lamartine, the Minister of the French Chamber of Affairs, [illegible] Ravenna, and warmly thanked him for [illegible] with regard to the French Republic.

PRUSSIA

M. Camphausen, the Prime Minister, having resigned, and M. Hansemann having failed to form a Cabinet, all is uncertainty respecting the formation of a Ministry. The latest accounts from Berlin, viz to the 27th ult., hold out a hope of Herr Auerswald being likely to form an administration of this kind: himself President of the Council; Kuhlwoller (of Aix-la-Chapelle), Minister of the Interior; Reidle, Minister of Commerce; Rodbertus, Minister of Public Worship; Von Schleinitz, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Hansemann, Justice; Von Schreckenstein, War; and Maercker, Justice. The next post, however, may bring the intelligence that this combination has been broken up; for there is, according to all accounts, an immense difficulty in composing a new Ministry. Meantime considerable excitement prevails in Berlin; and the various political clubs display the greatest activity. The members of the Democratical Central Committee have received orders to quit the capital.

Twelve Counts, eighteen Barons, and several members of the lower order of nobility, residing near Königsberg, have forwarded addresses to the Ministry pro tem. at Berlin, in favour of the establishment of a First Chamber (a species of House of Lords), in the formation of which due regard may be paid to large landed property; and in support of their address, they refer to the English House of Lords as to an illustrious example, and declare that in that House the English people view the chief support of their rights and liberties

The ministerial crisis is said to arise from the reluctance of Camphausen and Minutoli (the Prefect of Police), and some other heads of departments, refusing to lend themselves to a reactionary policy. Camphausen's retirement, especially, is attributed to his refusal to permit any longer the business of the foreign department to be kept secret from the rest of the ministry.

SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

From authentic intelligence, dated Malmo, June 20, we learn that the conference there was still going on at that place respecting an armistice, with a view to a treaty of peace

On Thursday week the troops of the duchy of Mecklenburg-Strelitz marched through Hamburg, en route for Schleswig-Holstein. The family relations between that duchy and the Danish Court render this step a very delicate one on the part of the former, the divorced wife of his Majesty of Denmark (a Mecklenburg Princess) receiving a handsome annuity from him. The duchy, however, as a portion of the Germanic Confederation, has been obliged to obey general orders.

BELGIUM.

The newly-elected Chambers were opened at Brussels, on Monday last, by King Leopold. A more than ordinary interest was attached to this ceremony, occurring amidst the intense excitement produced by the appalling intelligence from Paris. It was, moreover, the opening of the first session of a Reformed Parliament, called together under circumstances of greater difficulty than any which the country had witnessed since her political regeneration.

The King, on horseback, accompanied by the Duke of Brabant, his eldest son, and attended by a numerous staff, left the palace at one o'clock; the Queen, the Count of Flanders, and the young Princess and suite followed in carriages. The royal party proceeded to the Chamber by the Rue Royale. On entering the house, their Majesties were received in the most enthusiastic manner by the assembled senators and deputies. The appearance of the house was extremely animated. Numbers of elegantly dressed ladies filled the galleries, and the diplomatic circle was filled with the various representatives of foreign powers, in their official costume. His Majesty then read the speech from the throne, which, after referring to the satisfactory relations of Belgium with foreign countries, thus referred to the cardinal point of the finances:—

"All our efforts, gentlemen, must tend to preserve a good financial position for Belgium. There its strength and security in a great measure lie. The ordinary budget of expenses shall be reduced My government is resolved successively to secure efficacious reductions.

"Several taxes must be modified in their basis. We will not lose sight in the distribution of burdens of the consideration owing to those who maintain their existence by labour only. We will continue to inquire, with a real solicitude, into all the measures calculated to improve and raise the condition of the working classes."

On the King concluding his speech, the cheers were deafening, and his Majesty seemed evidently affected

Their Majesties returned to the palace by the Rue Ducale, and the grand review took place.

HOLLAND.

A new fundamental law or constitution was presented to the Second Chamber of the States-General on the 20th ult., and accompanied by a gracious message from his Majesty King William. This modified form of the old fundamental pact extends the liberal provisions of the constitution of the Netherlands, and would, it was supposed, give general satisfaction.

RUSSIA.

The movements of Russian troops from one locality to another, in the vicinity of the Prussian frontier, have given rise to rumours of the wildest kind in the German papers, respecting a supposed Russian invasion of the German States. These rumours are quite groundless

UNITED STATES.

By advices received this week from the United States we learn that intelligence had reached that country of the confirmation of the treaty was received at New York, by telegraph, on the morning of the 10th ult. At the great National Convention, assembled at Philadelphia, General Taylor was nominated for President, and Millard Fillmore for Vice-President of the United States: and it was deemed probable that those gentlemen would be successful candidates for the highest honours of the States

Orders have been issued for the withdrawal of the American army from Mexico.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We have received Cape Town papers to the 23d of April. If the press can be taken as an exponent of public opinion, Sir Harry Smith continues to give universal satisfaction, for all the journals, of every shade of opinion, conspire to chant his praises. It appears that the Governor's proclamation, announcing the system on which he intends to govern the colony, had been misapprehended by some of the Dutch occupants of the out-lying settlements. As soon as Sir Harry learned this, messengers were despatched to these settlements, to give the inhabitants every explanation and assurance that might be requisite. A measure of Sir Harry's—the encouragement of Kaffir youth to spend some years in the colony as apprentices—intended to serve the double purpose of augmenting the labouring population and accelerating the civilization of Kaffraria—had given rise to some discussion. On the whole, however, the measure appears to have been favourably received. Those who at first demurred to it, have latterly modified their opposition into representations that its adoption will render an improved law of vagrancy expedient.

IRELAND.

THE PROPOSED REPEAL LEAGUE.

Mr. John O'Connell has written a letter to the people of Ireland, stating that he feels he cannot reconcile it to his sense of duty to join the Irish League; but that he will work in conjunction with it. Of Repeal's sons. The letter at great length sets forth the hon gentleman's "doubts and fears" as to the dangerous consequences likely to result to the cause of Repeal from the doctrines and proceedings of the Leaguers, together with the "moral force" reasons for refusing to join the new body, and thus concludes:—

"Under the circumstances I cannot join the new 'League.' Meantime, as the majority of the country seem bent upon it, the experiment may, of course, be made. I cannot, with the fears that are upon me, advise the people to it; but I shall oppose no obstacle to their will. In conclusion, I must distinctly declare that I am not a man deep and considerate enough to be easily persuaded that if I acted otherwise than I am doing, I should, in so far as I have any influence with the country, endanger the safety of the people and the success of the cause I have the guilt of disregarding the best interests of both, and abnormous to the charge of abandoning our only real hope—that of peaceful, legal, and constitutional agitation. The principles which my beloved father taught, and which I advocate, do not constitute a policy suited to bygone times and different circumstances. If they did so they would be degraded to the level of expediences. But being principles, they are of universal application, and they shall be, until they shall be tested (which I declare that they have not been), and shall be fully proven to have failed, I can never part with them, modify, or change them. At the same time I distinctly guard myself against being supposed that I censure others, who are willing to join the League, of any desire to abandon those principles They do not see matters in the same light that I do. They may be mistaken, or I may be mistaken. Events will decide; and I have only further to say that no one will more fully and readily acknowledge and retract his error than I will if it shall appear to me that the mistake has been on my side.

"I am, beloved fellow-countrymen, your devoted servant,

"JOHN O'CONNELL

"P.S.—By way of postscript I add that I should perhaps not have used the word 'refinement,' but rather that of 'refusal,' to join the new League. I trust to labour still for Ireland as a member of Parliament, and at home by writing, where I am precluded from speaking."

THE CLUBS.—The following is the mode of proceeding with respect to the formation of clubs: Whenever twenty Repealers, or upwards, reside in one neighbourhood, it is recommended that they unite and form a repeal club. The mode of doing so may be this:—The first twenty to form themselves into a provisional committee, undertaking to work for a few months at the formation of the club. This provisional committee to select a place of meeting for the club, choose out of their own number a vice-president or vice-presidents, treasurer, and secretary, leaving the choice of president for a more advanced period. That the following, or some similar rules, with such by-laws as the committee may think necessary, be posted in the place of meeting, and that the committee watch over their execution: RULES.—I. That every Repealer residing in —— shall be entitled to be a member of this club, on undertaking to comply with its regulations, and on being proposed and seconded by two members of the club. II. That the following be the officers and committee for the local management of the club for the first six months:—Vice-presidents, treasurer, readers, collectors, secretary, committee, with power to add to their number. III. That the rooms of the club be open to members from —— o'clock until —— o'clock, each.—— IV. That in the absence of [illegible] presidents (or presidents), the members of the committee take the chair in rotation, to preserve order and method in the conduct of the proceedings. V. That no sectarian discussions be allowed in the club-rooms, under any pretence whatever. VI. That no member be expelled from the club without a hearing, and the vote of a clear majority, at a regularly summoned meeting; but that any member appearing in the club-rooms in a state of inxication, le thereupon at once expelled from the club. VII. That all proceedings of the club be open, and that all secret signs and pass-words, or any other concealment, be strictly prohibited. The roll should be called aloud at each regular meeting, and ought be kept in the following form (which is given). Each member ought to be called upon, in turn, to bring in a new member to the club, till its number is completed. The club, when completed, might consist of 720 men, divided into six divisions of 120 men each, so that each division might have the exclusive use of the club-rooms for one night in six nights. Each division should have two vice-presidents, a sub-treasurer, and a secretary; a division might be subdivided into six sections of 20 men, living in the same locality, with a collector and assistant-collector, whose duty it would be to hand the numbers' subscriptions every week to the treasurer, and a reader who would read books or newspapers when called on. The objects of the organisation are to unite and maintain their rights, and to spread amongst them the principles of toleration and brotherhood.

THE REPEAL PRESS. The Irish Felon, Monday a meeting of the united Repealers of Clonakeagh, Dundrum, Donnybrook, Sandymount, and other suburban districts, was held or Donnybrook Green, a demonstration in favour of "the League The clubs were present in great force, and several resolutions in accordance with the object of the meeting were unanimously passed.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the adjourned meeting of the committee held on Sunday afternoon, at the Corn Exchange, the following resolution was adopted:—"That the committee deeming it advisable that further time should be given for collecting more fully the opinion of the country on the question as to the formation of the proposed Irish League, have agreed to adjourn the next meeting of the Repeal Association to Monday, the 10th day of July next."

THE CONFEDERATES AND THE POLICE.—The presiding magistrate at Celbridge-street police-office was engaged for two hours on Monday, in the hearing of several charges preferred by the police against certain parties for rioting, assaults, and violations of the peace, consequent on the meeting of the Confederate Clubs at Donnybrook-green on the preceding day. A motion was adopted binding nature, arising out of the interference of the police with the procession of the Confederates. Two only were sent for trial.

GOVERNMENT is about strengthening Clonmel, which commands Kilkenny and Waterford. It is the key of the latter. Guns are to be mounted and new barracks to be erected capable of accommodating 1000 men. When the new barracks are constructed, it is generally supposed the head-quarters of the 9th will be transferred from Cahir to Clonmel.

GENERAL HONOURS TO MR. STEELE. In the early part of the week preparations were being made to give a fitting reception to the body of Mr. Steele. Conciliation Hall, in which the corpse was to remain until Friday, was hung with black drapery, and a catafalque, the same which bore the corpse of his leader, was erected in the centre of the Hall. A procession was to attend the transfer of the body from the steam-ship to its temporary abode.

CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE.

PARIS has again become the theatre of one of the most sanguinary struggles that even its blood-stained streets have ever witnessed. Nothing approaching the carnage of the last few days has, it is said, occurred in that capital since the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The ouvriers—the workmen of the national workshops—have constituted the plague-spot on the Republic, which has developed itself into this frightful disaster. We mentioned in our last Number that the Government had determined on sending out of Paris to the provinces such of the workmen of the ateliers nationaux as had come up to the capital since the revolution of February, attracted thither by the wages offered by the Government. This circumstance led to the outbreak which took place on Friday (last week). We give the details of each day's events as they occurr:

THURSDAY

Twelve thousand of those ouvriers who had been required to return to their departments, were advised by their comrades to resist, being told that they would be maltreated on their arrival. On Thursday morning (last week), a body of about 400 went in procession to the Luxembourg, requiring to speak to the executive commission. M. Marie having consented to receive a deputation, five of them were admitted. One of them attempted to address M. Marie, but he refused to hear him, as he had been an active party in the affair of the 15th of May, and, addressing another, he said, "You are not the slaves of that man; you can stain your own grievances." After having listened with attention, M. Marie assured them that the Government was occupied with their wants. On going back to their fellows, they distorted the expression of M. Marie, and said they had been termed "slaves." The mob then cried, "A bas Marie!" "A bas la Commission Executive!" "A bas l'Assemblée!" Some of them forced their way into the church of St. Sulpice, probably with an intention of sounding the tocsin, but the doors were speedily closed. They then went to the quays by the Rues de Condé, Colombier, and Jacob, and commenced their work of organising as they proceeded. In the evening they stationed themselves in the Place de la Bastile, and at the Barrière du Trône. Some commissaries of police endeavoured to disperse them, but they cried "Vive Napoleon! Vive l'Empereur! A bas Marie! Nous resterons!"

Barricades were formed at the Porte St. Denis and Porte St. Martin. The Government now ordered out some troops.

Before midnight the attroupements augmented at various points. The environs of the Hôtel de Ville, of the Luxembourg, the Boulevards, and the quarters of St. Martin, St. Denis, and Le Temple, were all thronged with multitudes of operatives.

At eight o'clock the square of the Panthéon was filled with several thousands, who arched with banners to the Faubourg du Temple, where they were joined by large bodies of ouvriers

Measures of precaution were taken during the evening. The National Guard were called out by "convocation a domicile." Numerous detachments of troops were stationed at the Luxembourg At ten o'clock a squadron of dragoons and several companies of the troops of the line were marched on the place de l'Hôtel de Ville. At eleven o'clock a battalion of the line took possession of the court of the Prefecture of Police. The perisyle of the Palais de Justice was guarded by the Garde Mobile. The Assembly was filled with troops. A service of "surveillance extraordinaire" was established around Paris. Everywhere the armed force was very numerous

FRIDAY.

The night (Thursday) passed over without any violence. The insurgents, however, in the course of Friday morning threw up barricades in various quarters on both banks of the Seine, and at noon were to be seen in all directions the formidable nature of the preparations which they had made for the coming contest, which was of a totally different description from that of which the result was the revolution of February. In February the insurrection, sharply it broke out in the same part of the city as the present, the Porte St. Denis, spread towards, and was, in fact, almost confined to, the portion of Paris occupied by the mercantile and richer classes. The quarter of the Tuileries, the Bourse, the Faubourg St. Honoré, the Chaussée d'Antin, and the rich outskirts of all that great district, were the scenes of the revolt. It was, in fact, an insurrection set up by a bourgeoisie dissatisfied with their Government in the determination of getting reform; and if it turned out afterwards into a republican revolution, the result was one certainly not intended by those who were the authors and chief actors in it. The insurrection of the past week has been quite different It was confined entirely to the working classes, to the 100,000 ouvriers who have for some months been employed in the ateliers nationaux, and who, being dissatisfied with the nature of that employment, their only means of support, at a period when all the ordinary sources of labour were destroyed, were driven by the desperation of hunger into rebellion. No doubt there were also in the insurrection many of those who had other and far more culpable views, and who urged them to their destruction; but the real combatants were the labouring classes, and their hope and object was the fulfilment of the promise of "guaranteeing labour to all." On Friday the only flags shown were those of les ateliers nationaux, with the inscription of "Le travail ou la mort." There were very few party cries. In the whole course of the day the cry of "Vive Napoleon!" or "Vive Henry V.!" or even "Vive la République!" was very little to be heard on the side of the insurgents. The great cry was that of "Le travail à Paris!" so that whatever may arise ultimately from the recent insurrection, the cry for bread and the dread of starvation were its real origin. It must not, however, be supposed that there were no cries but those for bread and labour. The exasperation of the people naturally led them to execrate those whom they considered the authors of their evils, and occasionally "A bas le Pouvoir Executif!" "A bas l'Assemblée Nationale!" "A bas Marie!" (who was peculiarly unpopular, from the false report that he had called the ouvriers slaves) were to be heard, mixed with cries of "Vive la république vouge!" and "Vive Barbès!"

The aspect of Paris, too, in the late contest differed much from what it was in February In February the fighting was, as already mentioned, in the richer districts, while the Faubourg St. Antoine and the other portions of the capital occupied by the labouring classes were perfectly quiet, and apparently indifferent as to the result. The Quartier Latin and the Faubourg St. Marceau were also quiet on that occasion. On the late occasion the fighting was entirely in the Faubourg St. Antoine, the Faubourg St. Michel, the Faubourg St. Marceau, and the Quartier St. Jacques, or, in other words, the poorer districts of the capital. The Rue de la Harpe, the Rue St. Jacques, and the innumerable and close streets in the same neighbourhood, were from the beginning of the fight barricaded in every direction, and dotted the 50,000 troops of the line and the numberless National Guard of Paris for several hours

The insurgents' plan of operations displayed great strategetic skill and correct military judgment, and they fought with the former with a determination which the experience of men. The insurrection extended on the right bank from the Faubourg Poissonnière to the Seine, embracing thus the whole Faubourg St Antoine; on the left bank it occupied the Faubourg St. Marceau, the Quartier Latin, and the lower part of the Quartier St. Jacques; these two positions were connected by the occupation of many points, such as the church of St. Jervais, a part of the Quartier du Temple, the approaches of Notre Dame, and the Pont St. Michel

The church of St. Severin served as head-quarters, and the Faubourg St. Antoine as a magazine. This plan was ingeniously conceived, for the insurgents were thus masters of an immense semi-circle which formed nearly one-half of Paris. In case of check, the nature of the houses and the narrow streets created difficulties almost insurmountable to the troops, and afforded certain chances to the insurgents of retreat; in case of success, the position of St. Severin, which served them for head-quarters, and that of St. Gervais, which directly menaced the Hôtel de Ville

The measures taken by the authorities cost a great number of lives; but that end result was inevitable, from the savage energy with which the insurgents defended themselves.

The aspect of the Boulevards, and the neighbourhood of that classic ground of revolutionary barricades the Portes St. Martin and St. Denis, on Friday after noon and one o'clock, is thus described by an eye-witness:—"I found the shops in the whole line of the Boulevards all closed, the streets crowded with people anxious to know what was doing, the drums under the escort of strong piquets beating to arms, and strong bodies of National Guards gathering on the Place de la Bourse, the Boulevards, and the mairie of the 2d arrondissement. On approaching the neighbourhood of the Porte St. Denis, I was surprised not to see a single soldier in National Guard, but, on the other hand, I was equally surprised to find several thousands of the conspirators in possession of the whole of the district, and already strongly entrenched in barricades of the most formidable description. Across the boulevard, and quite close to the Porte St. Denis, was an immense barricade, formed of four or five omnibuses, several carriages, a huge waggon, and paving-stones taken from the streets, which were torn up for a considerable distance on both sides. The whole was so high as to be sufficient to be a powerful defence against a coup de main. The end of the Rue du Faubourg St. Denis was also closed up with a huge barricade, which prevented the egress of troops from the outskirts. The Rue St. Denis, the Rue Vieilleuve Bourbon, the Rue de Cléry, and the other streets abutting on the spot in possession of the conspirators, were similarly defended, and thousands of persons were industriously working with pikes and muskets tearing up the streets and adding to the defences

"The barricades were defended by some hundreds of the people in blouses, of whom many were not armed, or at least did not show their arms They had a great number of tricoloured flags stuck upon the top of the barricades, with the words 'Liberté ou Mort' inscribed upon them, and some other words which I could not distinguish. The Porte St. Denis, which was in the hands of the conspirators, was decorated with a black flag, and on the top of it were arranged heaps of paving-stones, apparently for the purpose of being thrown upon the heads of those who might attack it. The whole scene was a very curious and busy one. Every one seemed bent on completing the defences, and there was no appearance of alarm, anger, or any excitement, beyond that of the anxiety to complete their work.

"While this was going on, the alarm was suddenly given of the approach of the military. In the distant part of all the streets abutting upon the Porte St. Denis, dense columns of troops were to be seen advancing. There was a sudden movement among the conspirators, a few of whom took to their heels, but the greater part of whom remained at their posts. A large body of troops measures to meet the extreme gravity of the state of affairs. In the course of the morning the Executive Government met at the Palace of the Luxembourg. The President of the National Assembly joined them soon after ten o'clock, and it was at once arranged that the Minister of War, General Cavaignac, should be invested d'urgence with the chief command of all the troops of the line and other military force in the department of the Seine. He at once accepted, but on condition that he should be allowed to take all the steps of a military nature which he thought proper, without interference on the part of the civil power. The following order of the day was accordingly posted on the walls:—

"'By order of the President of the National Assembly and the Executive Government, General Cavaignac, Minister of War, will take the command of all the troops, National Guards, and Garde Mobile. Unity of command and obedience therein will be strength, as therein is right.

'The President of the Assembly, M. SENARD.

'The members of the Executive Government,
'ARAGO, GARNIER-PAGES, LAMARTINE, LEDRU-ROLLIN.'

"M. Bonjean and M. Bixio, on learning at the Assembly the disorder in Paris, said that the members of the Assembly should be the first to expose themselves to the fire. 'Our place (said M. Bixio) is at the head of the National Guard, to stop, if possible, the effusion of blood;' and borrowing the scarf of one of the members, he immediately left the Chamber to carry out his declaration. M. Bixio was only too true to his glorious aspirations; he was shot in the breast, and it was feared mortally wounded. M. Clement Thomas received a ball in the thigh. General Bedeau was wounded in the left thigh. M. Dornès, a representative, and editor of the National, who accompanied General Cavaignac, was also wounded. M. Pierre Bonaparte, son of Lucien, had his horse wounded by a ball by the side of M. de Lamartine. During the greater part of the day Lamartine accompanied General Cavaignac to all the scenes of contest.

"A foundry of balls was established on the Place Cambrai."

The following absurd and lying proclamation, which shows in a strong light

CARRYING THE WOUNDED.

the low state of political morality among public men in France, was issued by the Mayor of Paris in the afternoon. No man knew better than M. Marrast that he was uttering a falsehood in attributing the insurrection to the machinations of foreigners; but he believed it necessary to assign some cause for the frightful catastrophe resulting from the incompetency and folly of the men who have endeavoured to administer the affairs of the country since the Revolution of February. M. Flocon, too, the Minister of Commerce, and M. Garnier Pagès, one of the Executive Commission, were not ashamed to proclaim the same fallacy in the National Assembly:—

"PARIS, June 23, Three p.m.

"CITIZEN MAYOR,—You have been a witness from the morning of the efforts made by a number of disturbers to cast the greatest alarm into the midst of the people. The enemies of the republic assume all disguises. Foreign agents join them, excite, and pay them. It is not only civil war which they seek to light up amongst us, but it is pillage, it is social disorganisation, it is the ruin of France which they prepare, and it may easily be understood with what views. Paris is the principal seat of these infamous intrigues. Paris shall not become the capital of disorder. Let the National Guard, which is the first guardian of public peace and of property, understand that it is, above all, their interests, credit, and honour which are brought into question. If they desert themselves, it is the whole which they will give up at every hazard—it is property and family which they will leave exposed to the most frightful calamities. The troops of the garrison are under arms, numerous and perfectly well-disposed. Let the National Guards station themselves at their quarters at the sides of the streets; the authorities will do their duty—let the National Guard perform theirs.

"Salut et fraternité.

"Representative of the people, Mayor of Paris, A. MARRAST."

The aspect of Paris during the night of Friday was strange and saddening in the extreme. Those who witnessed it, state that none, save those who have been in a battle-field, or in a city attacked by an enemy, can have an adequate idea of it. "After ten o'clock the movement of the troops rapidly increased, and all the signs of an approaching struggle, of the most serious nature, were manifest. The generale continued to be beaten in all quarters till midnight. Nothing could exceed the terror that was everywhere spread. Cavalry and artillery passed at full gallop, every moment, along the Boulevard. About midnight these troops drew up for the night along the sides of the street: the cavalry dismounted and bivouacked on the footways. Towards the approach of early dawn, the soldiers, who had been on duty from a very early hour, completely overcome with fatigue, were to be seen, extended everywhere on the footpath sleeping, having their helmets and swords laid beside them. Some tended the horses, who in thousands occupied the carriage road. This state of things continued until three o'clock, when the trumpets and drums again sounded, the cavalry and artillery mounted, and infantry formed, and marched off to another scene, to commence the battle of Saturday.

SATURDAY.

In the course of half an hour discharges of cannon and musketry began to be heard.

THE CONFLICT IN THE RUE DU FAUBOURG ST. ANTOINE.

Early in the morning the neighbourhood of the National Assembly was strongly occupied. The Place de la Concorde was crowded with cuirassiers, lancers, and artillery.

Those troops, with infantry of the line, and the Garde Mobile occupied the Champs Elysées, the bridge opposite, the Chamber, and the quays on both sides, were similarly filled. The gardens and palace of the Tuileries, and the Place Carousel, were filled with National Guards. The esplanade of the Invalides was occupied in like manner as well as all the streets debouching from the Palace of the Assembly. From nine till twelve o'clock the Boulevards continued to be patrolled by troops.

Members of the Assembly, in various numbers, also patrolled the principal streets about noon, each escorted by detachments of National Guards. At one o'clock, notice was given by these functionaries and others, that the capital was declared in a state of siege, and all individuals except those in arms as National Guards were ordered to remain in their houses. It was announced at the same time that the Executive Commission had abdicated, and that General Cavaignac was appointed Provisional President of the Republic, with the powers of a dictatorship.

The following are the terms of the decree by which the National Assembly declared Paris in a state of siege:—

"Art. 1. The National Assembly remains en permanence.

"Art. 2. Paris is in a state of siege.

"Art. 3. All power and authority is delegated to General Cavaignac."

The National Assembly also voted unanimously a decree, by which the wives and children of the citizens who have fallen or may fall in the defence of order are to be adopted by the country."

After this decree was passed, the Executive Council resigned its powers in the following letter, addressed to the President:—

"Monsieur le Président—The Executive Committee would think it was wanting alike in its duty and its honour if it withdrew before sedition and a public

"24th June.

The extreme left was strongly opposed to this proposition, and a number protested against Paris being declared in a state of siege ... al Perrot was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the National Guards of ... vice.

Although the fight was resumed in various quarters at daybreak on Saturday morning, the severest struggle took place in the district of the Cité and St. Jacques. From one o'clock A.M. until four o'clock P.M., the fusillade and cannonade continued incessantly. The insurgents had thirteen pieces of cannon. Three were taken. ... who were surrounded on almost all points, succeeded in forcing a passage by means of their artillery. About ten o'clock this column was in the quarter of the Halle, where a bloody encounter took place. At the same hour the insurgents of the Faubourg St. Antoine were marching to operate in junction with the column of St. Jacques, and an armistice until eleven o'clock was proposed by General Cavaignac, who declared that after that hour the most energetic terms would be adopted.

"The insurgents refused to surrender, and the combat was resumed. Shot and shell were used against the insurgents, the centre of whose operations was at the church of St. Severin. The battle raged without cessation the whole day in this quarter, and thousands, it was computed, fell on both sides.

"At half-past three P.M. the insurgents were driven to the Pantheon and there surrounded; they fought desperately and with a courage which would be admirable if devoted to a just cause; and at five o'clock the Pantheon was recovered from them after three hundred discharges of cannon.

"The conduct of the Garde Mobile during this fearful struggle was most heroic, and they were well supported by the National Guards.

"During the engagement on this (the left) side of the Seine a dreadful act of butchery was committed about one o'clock by the insurgents at one of the barricades in the Faubourg St. Germain. They had taken five of the Garde Mobile prisoners, and held them apart without injury. Hearing, however, that the troops of the line were coming down in force, they determined to abandon the barricade. But at the same time they came to another terrible determination, which they forthwith carried into execution—they cut the throats of the five prisoners! The lifeless bodies of the unfortunate lads, for none of them had exceeded the age of eighteen, were found still warm when the troops of the line and a party of the Garde Mobile came up.

"This act had the effect of exciting the most intense exasperation, and particularly amongst the Garde Mobile. Shortly afterwards 1800 of the insurgents surrendered on the Place du Panthéon. These men were being led across the garden of the Luxembourg, when a large body of the Garde Mobile, who were then guarding the Palace and gardens, being unable to restrain their desire for vengeance for their murdered comrades, sent a volley into the body thus passing, and killed upwards of 100.

"Prisoners were brought in from time to time to the building in which the National Assembly sits. Amongst one batch of twenty-five was a young girl dressed in male attire, who was most active in supplying ammunition to the insurgents, and a republican guard, who had been prominent amongst the insurgents.

"Some conception may be formed of the carnage in the Quartier St. Jacques, when it is mentioned that during fifteen hours the fire never slackened.

"When the assault on the Pantheon was determined upon, the 11th Legion first advanced to the attack, but it was received with such a fire from the colonnade of the Pantheon as to be forced to retire on the Rue St. Jacques. Two hours afterwards the Garde Mobile endeavoured to take the houses in construction which surround it. The fire was most murderous; more than a hundred of the Mobile fell under the balls of the insurgents, who forced them to intrench themselves in the Ecole de Droit. It was not till about one o'clock that the troops of the line arrived to the assistance of these brave young fellows, and that they were able in concert to break through the railings of the Pantheon, and gain the interior, where the insurgents had established their head-quarters. But to take the Pantheon was only a quarter of the task; there remained the barricades of the Rue Vieille-Estrapade, Rue Neuve Saint Geneviève, Rue de ... A.

... hours the artillery continued to be heard; a frightful carnage took place; great losses were suffered on either side; and it was not till four o'clock that the streets were free, and that M. Payer, representative of the Ardennes, whose house had been invaded by the insurgents, was able to get to the Assembly. Along with the horrible scenes which he witnessed during the 12 hours which he was confined to his house, M. Payer related facts which prove that a great many of the insurgents were unfortunate men who had been ... ; and if many of them had money in their pockets and excited the ... by every description of false report, the greater number of them were, nevertheless, workmen in despair, borne down by the misery which, for four months, had crushed them. If you demanded of them why they fought, their only reply was, 'Better to die from a ball than from hunger.' Not one of them, on being offered it, would take wine without water; and one of them having slain a Mobile who had wounded him in the hand, he sat down and cried like a child.

Mesures sought without cessation to excite them, by seeking to ... strong liquors among them, and repeating to them every kind of false ...

It was also remarked that the Mesures were almost all hatted as ... in redingotes, and without arms, never exposing themselves, and always disappearing at the least danger.

When the Pantheon was taken, the troops found that several of their officers, who had fallen into the hands of the insurgents, had been hanged.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Evicted Destitute Poor (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF DESPATCHES.

Mr. HAWES made a statement explanatory of the charge brought against him by Lord G. Bentinck, of having either been troubled with the shortest memory of since the days of Theodore Hajocchi, or else guilty to the guttings up of ante-dated minutes on the back of the despatches withheld from the Sugar Committee. The hon. member asserted that it was he and Lord Grey's intention that the despatches should have been produced, and he referred to many collateral facts to prove that there had been a systematic attempt on the part of the Colonial Office to suppress the truth, and to keep back from the debates in Parliament, and from the Sugar Committee, evidence that told against their own theories. The charge he (Lord G. Bentinck) made against Lord Grey and the Colonial Office was that of politically holding back, for political purposes, documents most material for a fair verdict on the West India question—he did not charge them with any sordid fraud. As an independent member of Parliament, it was his duty to arraign high Ministers of State whenever he found them guilty, and to prove that they had forfeited their claim to the confidence of the people.

Lord J. RUSSELL required the noble Lord to state distinctly whether he maintained the charge that the minutes had been fraudulently concocted, or the alternative, that Mr. Hawes had the shortest memory since the days of Theodore Hajocchi.

Mr. DISRAELI thought that Lord G. Bentinck had admitted that the circumstances relative to the making of the minutes were correctly stated; but it was still an extraordinary fact that three despatches had been withheld from the committee. The Government were obliged to plead guilty to that charge they said they had committed a blunder, but not a crime—their only defence being to throw the blame upon two gentlemen in the Colonial Office. That was one of those cases that peculiarly called for investigation. The honourable member then instanced a declaration made by Lord Grey, in the House of Lords, relative to a mournful fact from certain proprietors and lessees in Jamaica, and charged his Lordship with having used this memorial to lead to the inference that a remonstration had taken place in Jamaica such as to hold out inducements for the investment of British capital, whereas the words of the memorial were, that they could not cultivate their sugar plantations for another year. The hon. Member said he could not find a term sufficiently strong to designate his condemnation of such mistaken and misrepresentation of documents by a high Minister of State.

After remarks from Mr. V. Smith, Sir J. Pakington, and Sir G. Grey, Lord G. BENTINCK said he remained of the same opinion, that Mr. Hawes's memory was of the shortest and his apprehension of the most obtuse kind during his examination before the Committee.

Mr CHARTERIS and Mr. NEWDEGATE offered a few observations, and the subject dropped.

In a question from Mr. B. Osborne, Lord PALMERSTON replied that the only channel of communication in London at present, between the Spanish and British Government, was the Consular agent.

SUGAR DUTIES.

The adjourned debate on the motion to go into committee to consider the Sugar Duties, and Sir J. Pakington's amendment thereto, was resumed by Mr. G. THOMPSON, who opposed both the proposition of the Government and the resolution moved as an amendment. He believed the Ministerial plan to be a change which would give no advantage to the colonists, and an unnecessary departure from the principles of the Act of 1846; he should, therefore, vote against it. Principle compelled him to vote against the amendment.

Mr. BERNAL spoke several of the statements made by Mr. Wilson and other members of the committee of the House, and adduced a large amount of facts, derived from personal experience, to show the injury done to the West India Colonies by past legislation, and to demonstrate the perfect inability of the remedies proposed by the Government. The hon. member concluded his speech by declaring his intention to vote for Ministers—an announcement that convulsed the House with laughter.

Sir J. GRAHAM said he had given an unwilling assent to the Act of 1846, but as it was passed, after a full consideration of all its consequences by both Houses of Parliament, he considered it had settled the question of our policy with respect to sugar. When he found Mr. Disraeli boast that no prophecy of ruin from free-trade policy was about to arrive; when he heard Lord Stanley in another place propose a prolongation of the time within which the Corn Laws shall expire; when he found Mr. Herries give his own time for the duration of protection amounting to prohibition could effectually benefit the West India Colonies, when he heard the Duke of Richmond enthusiastic "cheapness" in articles of consumption declared, these were the circumstances of intention to take the first step towards that reaction which had been prophesied; and as he felt satisfied that a reversal of the policy lately adopted would be impracticable, impossible, all the reasons of general principle he would oppose the amendment before the House, and vote for the motion to go into Committee and consider the proposal of the Government.

Mr. CALLAGHAN supported the Ministerial proposition so far as sugar was concerned, reserving himself on the question of spirits.

On the motion of Sir E. Lees, the debate was adjourned to Thursday.

The Public Works (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill was read a second time.

The Prisons Bill passed through committee.

The committee on the Highways Act was nominated —Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE MISSING DESPATCH.

Earl GREY drew the attention of the House to certain despatches from the West India Islands, and entered into a lengthened statement with a view to exonerate the Colonial Office from the charge preferred against it by Lord George Bentinck, in the House of Commons, of having wilfully and with a view to deceive the West India Committee, withheld these despatches from the committee and from Parliament. He admitted that a mistake had been committed in connection with some of these despatches by the subordinates of the department, who had been instructed to lay the despatch of Governor Grey before the Committee. He then indignantly repelled the insinuations of political fraud made against himself and Mr. Hawes, and deplored the recklessness with which some members of the other House of Parliament had recently indulged in charges of the gravest character against parties connected, in different capacities, with the Government, a course which he deprecated for many reasons, but more particularly for the danger which such a practice involved to the efficiency of the Government and the prestige of our institutions. He concluded by moving that an address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to lay upon the table of the House the correspondence which had taken place between the Colonial Department and the sugar-growing colonies of the Crown.

Lord STANLEY carried that any personal imputation was cast on the noble Earl—the charge was against the Colonial Office, and the noble Lord who made it was as free from any personal imputation as the noble Earl himself. He did not believe that any documents had been purposely withheld from the Committee by the noble Earl; but the circumstances were sufficiently suspicious to demand explanation, and to shield those who demanded that explanation from any charge of having been actuated by malicious or sinister motives.

Lord BROUGHAM exonerated Earl Grey from any improper conduct whatever, and regretted the time of the House should be taken up with a matter entirely foreign to the business, and which bore relation to the amount of information furnished to a committee of the other House.

Earl GREY said that Lord G. Bentinck was apt, in advancing great questions, to attribute unworthy motives to his opponents. He vindicated the observations of Lord J. Russell towards the noble Lord, although those observations were misunderstood. What his noble colleague meant to say was, that the statement which the noble Lord was compelled to entertain while investigating the transactions of the turf, he carried with him when challenging the proceedings of a totally different class of society.

Lord STANLEY reiterated his disclaimer of any personal imputation on Earl Grey, but insisted that documents had been brought imperfectly under the notice of Parliament.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE thought the matter had been set at rest by the speech of his noble friend at the head of the Colonial department, and deprecated the acrimony which had characterised the debate on the subject.

After some observations from Lord REDESDALE, the motion was agreed to, and the subject dropped. Adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

At four o'clock, there being but 31 members present, the House stood adjourned to the following day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House sat from noon to six o'clock.

JOHN MITCHEL.—Sir G. GREY took an opportunity of stating that there was no truth in the rumour that John Mitchel had breakfasted at the mess of the officers of the Conservator.

DUBLIN [illegible]ty to a question from Sir E. Inglis, Sir G. GREY said that he had made inquiries respecting the legality of Derby sweeps, and found that, by the 42nd Geo. II. cap. 19, they were illegal. They were also illegal by the 6th and 7th Wm. IV.; and instructions had been issued to the Excise to take the necessary steps to put a stop to them in future.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.—On the motion for going into Committee on the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, Mr. GORING moved, as an amendment, that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the bill on that day fortnight.—A discussion ensued, in which Sir H. Willoughby, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Forbes, Mr. Sergeant Jolland, Mr. Newdegate, and Colonel Conolly took part; after which the House divided and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 103 to 76.

The House then went into Committee, and some very close divisions took place, in one of which an amendment moved by the Attorney-General was only carried by the casting vote of the Chairman. Very little progress was made in Committee.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The report on the Ecclesiastical Unions and Divisions of Parishes (Ireland) Bill was brought up and agreed to.

LAW AND EQUITY BILL. This bill was read a second time and ordered to be committed. Adjourned

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE NEW REFORM MOVEMENT.—At the request of Lord J. RUSSELL, Mr. HUME consented to put off the adjourned debate on his motion upon its subject from the next day (Friday) to Thursday next.

SUGAR DUTIES.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Sir R. H. INGLIS commenced the debate. The hon. gentleman opposed the Government measure, on the ground that it was part of a scheme of policy which encouraged slavery and the slave-trade.

Mr. BARKLEY also opposed the measure of the Government, and contended that a fixed differential duty of 10s. on slave produce for a few years would effect more good for our colonies than the present scheme.

Mr. LABOUCHERE strongly advocated the Government plan.

In the debate which ensued, Mr. CHARLES LUSHINGTON supported the amendment, while Sir R. PEEL supported the measure of the Government.

On a division, the proposition of the Government was carried by a majority of 260 to 245.

Adjourned.

NATIONAL SPORTS

> How heartless are relations! how charming cheats
> Companions are! how false are friends!
> Of foes, of vipers, all we know!
> Weigh not the first nor wish the last—
> But of the kindred seek where you may find
> Some likeness, watch the glittering gems combines
> Of modern, reigning, sterling, staple stamp—
> Yet ready money is Aladdin's lamp.
> BYRON.

If it be a gracious philosophy to find "sermons in stones," it will not be objected against essays of this nature, that occasionally they point a moral. Those who watch the progress of our National Sports cannot but remark that their changes are singularly akin to the operations of matters of higher social account; that a greater character "grows with their growth and strengthens with their strength;" that the vernal of sporting, like the spring-tide of those who adopt it, is a season of flowers and blossoms—but that both the harvest and the reapers come in due time. The simple wreath of evergreen—which Pindar sings was the first prize presented by the people—and the silver ball, the bauble which constituted our own racing prize in the early age of the turf. We have no authentic records of the substitute for the "chaplet of wild olive" but our "cup" presently became a "bowl," anon a "cup;" then a vase, or piece of plate, or shield, or candelabrum, or some such ornamenta. contrivance.

In the course of last year, a professional proprietor of race-horses won more cups, vases, shields, candelabra than his horses could hold: trophies intended to decorate the castles and banquet-halls of those who formerly represented the cause of our National Sport—the turf. Similar prizes awarded to the skill and spirit of the Queen's Ships. But the running of the marine model—he was soon exhausted, and nothing remained to him in the fact or fable of the sea whence to design an appropriate reward for master navigators. Still, rather than grant amphibious chivalry "with common dross," recourse was had to the domestic circle: and we have witnessed a naval triumph crowned with "a silver teapot, sugar-bowl and cream-jug to correspond." . . . . Britain [illegible] From glory down to a complete tea-[illegible]

Like the turtle, during the past season one gentleman carried off "tin" enough to furnish a serviceable shop: his cabin had all the air of a butler's pantry—preparing for company. But this gentleman's wager-yacht was no more constructed upon the principle of yacht-sailing, than the banker's house upon that of the noble's mansion. His wager-craft was a species boat—running but ribs and spars: made to sail—as the razor-rogue's blades were made to sell. Now the commentary on these facts is the unique manner they are the cause and the consequence. Speed is fast becoming a substitute for honourary prizes. The Royal Thames Yacht Club now give money in lieu of "cups;" and the turf, instead of more problematic plunder in pewter and plate, roubleau, and bags of dollars, comes to it as the harvest-time of sporting. Thus, in the barren interval, this week of most unwelcome ease, when neither Doncaster nor Ascot—the sanctuary of set-enjoyment—is in the ascendant, we have taken occasion to point out the loss of sporting as it at present prevails. Stewards of races, regattas, and revels of all sorts and societies, are now to look upon themselves as the executors of the sporting exchequer. They must eschew the ornamental, and bestow on their duties attentions of "a Merlin stamp."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The early news from Paris on Monday leaving the issue of the sanguinary struggle then existing in a state of doubt, caused the opening prices of Consols to be quoted at a fall of about ¼ per cent. The first quotation was 84¾ for the opening, and after a slight rally some bargains were done at 84⅞. On the publication, however, of the second editions of the morning papers, announcing the gradual defeat of the insurgents, prices rapidly advanced, and 84⅞ was the closing quotation. The continued success of the French government induced a further advance on Tuesday. During the day Consols fluctuated only between 84⅞ buyers and sellers, closing at 84⅞ to ⅞. Wednesday's Market opened steadily, and although the business transacted was most limited, Consols closed at an advance of ¼ per cent., the price being 85¼ to ⅜. On Thursday the Market was steady, but the absence of business in the chief departments created little pressure on the Market from Foreign political events. At present the speculators appear to be all for "the rise;" and as the Budget will not appear during this session, no chance has occurred to show the deficiency in the revenue is to be provided for, forms no subject for consideration just now; but must shortly exercise some influence on prices. Exchequer Bills have scarcely varied; but India Bonds rather materially low prices. Bedford has recovered its relative position in the price list. At the close of the week there was a steady market at the following rates:—Bank Stock, 185½; Reduced, 84¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 93¾; Three per Cent. Consols, 84¾ for the account; Long Annuities, to expire January 1860, 8 11 16; Ditto October 10, 1859, 8 7-16; India Bonds, £1000, 20 p.; Consols for Opening, 85¼; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 39 p.; Ditto, £500, 39 p.; Ditto, £100 and £200, 39 p.; India Stock, 270.

The Foreign Market was heavy on Monday, Spanish quoting the decline of 1¼ for the Five per Cents, and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents also marking a decline. On Tuesday, however, there was a rally of ¼ per Cent. Mexicans, 16¼; Spanish Five per Cents to 11⅞; the Three per Cents to 22⅝; and Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents to 43¼. There has been but slight variation since, and the state of the country reigning in the capital may be seen by the following quotations being the only business registered at the close of the week:—Belgian Bonds, 64; Mexican, Five per Cent., 1846, 16¼; Portuguese, Four per Cent., 1841; Spanish, Passive, 5½; Dutch Four per Cent. Certificates, 95¾; Ditto, Bonds, 99¾.

At the beginning of the week the Railway Market displayed considerable depression across the entire chances up to Monday, after the declaration of the measures of the established lines, and the remote prospects of lines progressing being able to find the funds for completion except at a ruinous sacrifice of the original prospectus. Prices at the close of the week were, for Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 23; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 19; Boston, Stamford, and Birmingham, 36; Caledonian, 20; Chester and Holyhead, 20½; Eastern Counties, 4; Ditto, New Guaranteed Six per Cent, 3; East Lincolnshire, 20½; Great Northern, 20; Great South and West (Ireland), 20½; Great North of England, 230; Ditto, New, 45½, 2½; Great Western, 78½; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 50½; Lancashire and Yorkshire, 72; Ditto, Fifths, 7; Ditto, New, One Six per Cent, 2½; Leeds and Bradford, 89½; London and Blackwall, 4½; London, Brighton, and S. Coast, 90½; Do., New £5, four Six per Cent, 2½; London and North-West., 120½; Ditto New, 29½; London and S.-West., 40½; Manchester, Buxton, and Matlock, 1½; Midland, 99½; Ditto Birmingham, and Derby, 73½; North British, 21½; Ditto, Quarters, 4½; North Staffordshire, 9½; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 20½; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 6½; Shrewsbury and Birmingham, 21½; Do. 4½, Class 1½; South Eastern, 3½; Do., No. 3, 4½; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, 8½; Do. Original New Berwick, 30½; Do. Extension, No. 1, 17½; Do. G. N. E. Preference, 9½; Do., East and West Riding Extension, 20½; Namur and Liege, 3½; Northern of France, 4½; Sambre and Meuse, 2½.

SATURDAY MORNING. As it has been already remarked, the speculation appears to be for a rise, and the operations of Friday were generally in its favour. Consols advanced to 84⅞ for the Account, and New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents to 84⅞. Consols closed a shade worse, quoting 84. The Foreign and Shares Markets, without any great alteration, were decidedly firmer.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A very moderate supply of wheat of home produce has been received up to our market this week, consistwise as well as by land carriage. To-day the show of samples of that grain were small in the extreme. Selected qualities of both red and white moved off steadily, at, in some instances, an advance on the prices of Monday: it is par quarter. Inferior sorts were firm, and quite as dear. Scarcely any foreign wheat was come in [illegible]. Neither large quantities were disposed of by factory dealers, at extreme rates of currency. Bonded parcels were quite as dear, notwithstanding the advance in the duty to be paid on entry. Barley was a slow inquiry, but, as the imports are not large this week, its likers would not consent to any further reduction in value. The malt trade was very dull. In peas there were little difficulty supported. Oats, beans, peas, and all other articles moved off nearly at late rates.

in the groin, from which it is understood that his death has resulted. The following is the manner in which he was wounded:—The venerable prelate having offered Gen. Cavaignac to go on a mission of conciliation to the insurgents, the offer was at once accepted, and three members of the National Assembly, MM. Larabit, Galli-Cazalet, and Druet-Desvaux, volunteered to accompany him. On their arrival at the entry to the Faubourg St. Antoine, the Archbishop and his companions advanced to speak to the insurgents. They were just crossing the formidable barricade at the entrance to the faubourg, when unfortunately the beat of a drum alarmed the insurgents. They thought that the attack was about to recommence; some shots were discharged on both sides, and unhappily one of the balls struck the Archbishop, who immediately fell. Some of the insurgents went immediately to the assistance of the venerable prelate, who was carried to the hospital of Quinze Vingts. As for M. Larabit and the other members, they hastened to descend from the barricade, but, as they had advanced too far to retreat, they fell into the hands of the insurgents, and remained prisoners the whole of the night. Immediately after being taken away, they were carried before the leader of the insurgents, who was dressed in the uniform of a Captain of the National Guard. The man promised to do all in his power to save them, and brought them to his own house. About three o'clock in the morning some of the insurgents went to M. Larabit, and asked him to interfere in their behalf with the Government, in order that hostilities might cease. M. Labarit agreed to do so, and to accompany the delegates of the insurgents to the Assembly, promising at the same time to return again as a prisoner if the Government refused the proposal. Before starting, however, one of the insurgents enabled the three representatives to escape, and showed them a route by which they could get out of the faubourg. The lives of the representatives were several times threatened. The insurgents denied that the fatal shot came from their side.

The situation of Paris on Saturday night was still very alarming: though the insurgents had been driven from their positions on the left bank of the Seine, and that part of the city was quite free from them, being held by strong patrols of troops, National Guards, and Mobiles, they were posted in great force at various points on the right bank, from which the troops had been unable to dislodge them, notwithstanding the most vigorous and repeated assaults, in the course of which great loss of life occurred. The Faubourg St. Antoine and Faubourg du Temple, towards the east, and the Clos St. Lazare, in the north side of the town, formed their strongholds in this direction.

SUNDAY.

These localities were the chief points of attack on the morning of Sunday.

WOMEN ON THE BARRICADE, NEAR THE PORTE ST. DENIS.

INCIDENT ON THE BOULEVARDS

The conflict began at an early hour (five o'clock), and after a severe struggle the barricades at the barriers of Rochechouart, and along the line of the outer Boulevard, were carried early in the afternoon. It was proposed to bring cannon against the barricade Rochechouart. 'No,' said the National Guards, 'we will storm it.' 'But the loss of life?' 'What care we for the loss of life? They (the insurgents) have not spared ours.' And it was manfully stormed, though defended by demons who resisted to the last. It was there that Roche, editor of Le Pere Duchesne, fell. He was summoned by a Garde Mobile to surrender, and having refused, the Garde shot him in the head. In falling, a pistol, which La Roche held in his hand, went off, and shot the Garde Mobile through the body.

After the barricades had been carried by the troops and National Guards and Mobiles, the Clos St. Lazare became the theatre of the fighting at this end of the metropolis. A great hospital in that square, which is not yet finished, became the citadel of the insurrection (it was to have borne the name of Hôpital Louis Philippe, but is now the Hôpital de la Reanmur). The attack upon this stronghold and the defence were among the most determined incidents of this dreadful insurrection. It was carried at three o'clock. From thence until nine o'clock he troops were engaged in sweeping the Boulevards in the direction of the Faubourg St. Antoine.

In the vicinity of the house on the Boulevard du Temple, from which Fieschi fired on Louis Philippe, the insurgents fought with the most determined courage throughout the day. Not content with defending the positions in the Rue de Crussol and the Rue Menel Montard, they determined on a sortie, and debouching from those streets spread themselves along the Boulevard to the Théâtre de la Gaeité, fighting hand to hand with the troops, while their main body, sweeping by the Jardin Turc, drove the National Guards and troops past the Cadran Bleu, and into the Rue Charlot. Their success was of only brief duration. They were driven back at the point of the bayonet, and although they continued to resist for hours afterwards, were ultimately obliged to retreat.

General Negrier, one of the Questors of the National Assembly, was killed on Sunday. In the course of the evening, after a sanguinary contest in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel de Ville, he marched by the Quai des Ormes at the head of a detachment of the 24th of the line, with artillery and a body of the National Guard, in the direction of the Pont Marie and the barrack of the Célestins which was occupied by the insurgents. The General, accompanied by his aides-de-camp, carried in succession a great number of barricades, and after an obstinate resistance he re-captured the barracks, and drove the insurgents from the corn stores, where they had fixed themselves; then returning by the Boulevard Bourdon, he sent Commandant Boisard, of the National Guard, to order reinforcements, in order to disengage the upper part of the Rue St. Antoine from the insurgents, who were still in the neighbourhood of Saint Paul, when he was struck by a ball, at the entrance of the Rue Saint Antoine, in front of the great barricade which defends the entrance of the faubourg. General Charbonnel, a representative of the people, was severely wounded beside him.

"SHUT THE WINDOWS!"

At nine o'clock on Sunday night orders were given that all the persiennes or shutters of the windows of all the houses should be thrown and left open, as several National Guards and soldiers had been killed by shots fired within the houses by men concealed behind those persiennes.

During the day, at Clignancourt, the troops found a pail filled with turpentine and other inflammable matter, and a syringe with which it was said the Communists were determined to set fire to the houses in Paris after they had pillaged them. The troops likewise discovered the grocer who had supplied those materials, and were about to inflict summary justice on him when the unfortunate man supplicated them to spare his life, assuring them that he had been robbed of those articles by an armed force, who broke into his house. The inflammable matter and apparatus were lodged in the mairie of the 2nd arrondissement.

In the Faubourg du Temple, the femme (keeper) of a wine shop infused arsenic in the wine she served to the poor soldiers, many of whom fell dead in consequence of partaking of the deadly draught. The same occurrence was repeated in other parts of Paris, and many soldiers thus miserably perished.

One of the first orders of General Cavaignac, after the capital was declared in a state of siege, was that the troops of the line and the Garde Mobile should fight, and that the National Guard should guard the streets, prevent the assembling of crowds, and watch over the preservation of private property. The plan was an excellent one. It completely stopped all assistance being sent to the insurgents. Every person not on duty as a National Guard was searched, his residence asked, and he was led by a National Guard to his own door. No one was allowed to move about who was not possessed with a laisser passer, and even business was not taken for an excuse for being out in these terrible times.

Many curious discoveries were made in consequence of this arrangement. In the Rue de Helder, and in the neighbourhood of Notre Dame de Lorette, well-dressed females were detected carrying ball cartridges in their baskets. A man feigning to be wounded was carried on a mattress which was filled with gunpowder and ball, and some hearses were seized which contained powder and ball.

On Sunday afternoon the following order was issued for the arrest of M. Emile de Girardin, for the seizure of the Presse, and for the suppression of the opposition newspapers generally:—

"FRENCH REPUBLIC.

"LIBERTY EQUALITY FRATERNITY

"The Chief of the Executive Power, —In virtue of the decree of the National Assembly, which places the city of Paris in a state of siege, resolves:—'The Prefect of Police, and every agent of the public force, on the view of this present decree, will cause to be arrested the citizen Emile de Girardin, and to suppress the journal the Presse.'—The Prefect of Police will immediately order the seizure of all public newspapers, which, by their hostile publication, prolong the struggle which is embruing the capital in blood, and compromising the safety of the Republic. "CAVAIGNAC.

"Paris, June 25, 1848."

In consequence of this decree M. de Girardin was arrested at three o'clock, and sent to the Conciergerie. The article in the Presse of Sunday, complaining of Paris being under the regne du sabre, considered as having a tendency to create excitement and rebellion, was the cause of the arrest.

The following ordinances were also issued the same night.

"FRENCH REPUBLIC.

"LIBERTY EQUALITY FRATERNITY

"The Chief of the Executive Power determines as follows:—

"Every individual working at or raising barricades shall be considered as if he were taken with arms in his hands. "The Head of the Executive Power

"CAVAIGNAC."

"Paris, 25th June, 1848."

"The head of the Executive Government determines: The Mayors of the different arrondissements of Paris are to proceed forthwith to the disarming of every National Guard who, without legitimate motive, has failed to answer to the appeals which have been made to him to join in the defence of the Republic.

"Paris, 25th June, 1848." "E. CAVAIGNAC."

"Considering the decree of the National Assembly declaring Paris in a state of siege, we, the Commander-in-Chief of the military forces of the capital, in virtue of the powers conferred on us by the same decree, decree as follows:—

Art. 1. All placards on political subjects, and not emanating from the authorities, are forbidden till the re-establishment of public tranquillity. Art. 2. All authorities, civil and military, will look to the execution of this decree

"24th June." "CAVAIGNAC."

The Moniteur du Soir gives the following resumé the operations of the army on Sunday

"The attack was commenced at an early hour against the Faubourgs du Temple, St. Antoine, St. Denis, and the streets du Temple and St. Martin. The Rue du Temple was first cleared, but the insurgents who were driven from it entrenched themselves in the faubourg of the same name, towards the Rue Saint-Maur, and joined their friends in La Villette and La Chapelle The left bank of the Seine was completely in possession of the National Guard and of the troops of the line. At the Place Maubert, however, a musket shot was fired from a window on the republican guard, which was drawn up there. The soldiers instantly entered the house, and having found the man who fired the shot, they forthwith put him to death. Some attempts were made during the day to erect barricades on the left bank of the Seine, but they were instantly destroyed by the National Guard and the troops of the line, who remained definitively masters of every point. On the right bank the contest was prolonged, but several of the barricades in the Rue St. Antoine were carried and the insurgents lost ground. They retrenched themselves, however, on other points, and forced their way into several houses, from whence they fired on the troops. This occurred towards twelve o'clock in the Place du Châtelet, the Quay of the Magasserie, and in several adjoining streets. Some battalions of the National Guards of the departments, which were marching in perfect confidence on the Quai de la Magisserie, received several discharges which caused them a severe loss. A similar occurrence took place at the Place du Châtelet, and in the small streets in the neighbourhood, where the insurgents endeavoured to form barricades without success. Engineers and firemen were employed to dislodge the insurgents entrenched in the houses. Those houses were pierced in the rear or in the roof, a passage having been effected through the adjoining houses. At three o'clock the insurgents were defeated on almost every point. The Clos St. Lazare and the Faubourg du Temple were cleared. The insurgents then entrenched themselves in the Marais, where preparations were made to dislodge them.

"Five thousand muskets were captured by the National Guard, who passed from house to house until they reached the barricades The engineers and corps of firemen afforded valuable assistance in accomplishing those perilous operations. During those attacks, which cost several valuable lives, a superior officer of the artillery of the National Guard of Neuilly was severely wounded. An officer of the former Garde Républicaine was captured whilst firing on the troops at the barricade of the Rue Planche Milbray. The troops would have shot him, had not M. Dutier, a representative of the people, saved him by throwing his scarf over him. He was lodged in the cellars of the Hôtel de Ville. M. Michel, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Parisian artillery, was wounded near Notre Dame

The company of the National Guard, composed of inhabitants residing in the CANNONADE IN THE CLOS ST. LAZARE.

Rue de la Paix, lost seven men killed and ten wounded. Amongst the former, we mentioned M. Bussrot Jeudier, a stationer, of the Rue de la Paix and M. Lepaulle, a locksmith.

M. Duhac, Colonel of the 20th Regiment of the line, has been promoted to the rank of General of Brigade for the bravery he displayed during the two days in the attack on the barricades.

It is said that the 7th Legion of the National Guard Mobile lost 800 men at the attack on the Clos Saint Lazare. A private of the 4th Legion of the same corps, describing the attack on a barricade in the Rue Saint Jacques, said that he left there three-fourths of the legion. He added that he escaped solely by throwing himself on his back, and he was immediately covered by the men who fell under the fire of the insurgents. "The dead bodies," said he, "were tossed about as paviors throw paving stones."

After the capture of the Clos St. Lazare, some of the insurrrents made a rush into the Rue St. Lazare, and attempted to force into the houses, but they were driven back by the National Guards on duty at the corner of the Rue des Martyrs."

MONDAY

On Sunday night the troops and insurgents remained under arms, and on Monday morning the state of Paris was as follows:—On the left bank of the Seine the insurgents had been entirely dispersed, with the exception of a few isolated parties, who still held out in the most remote part of the great Faubourg St. Marceau, and who would have surrendered before then, but that a rumour had got among them that no quarter was to be given. In the whole of that district, however, the danger was at an end, and there was not the slightest appearance of a fresh insurrection. The Island of St. Louis, which had been on Sunday for some time in the hands of the insurgents, had also been retaken. On the right bank the insurgents had been driven from the formidable Clos St. Lazare, after a murderous struggle, in which a vast number of lives were sacrificed on both sides. The insurgents had been dislodged, also, from all the positions which they occupied in the Rue St. Antoine, and in the streets between the Hôtel de Ville and the basin of the Canal St. Martin.

The National Guard and the troops occupied the whole of the Line of the canal from the Place de la Bastile to the district called the Chapelle St. Denis, which last place had been taken at a late hour on Sunday night, after a murderous struggle. General Duvivier, who commanded in the quarter of the Hôtel de Ville, had completely suppressed the revolt in that quarter, was master of the whole line as far as the Bastile, and had formed a junction with general Lamoricière, who commanded the troops in the north of Paris, and who had succeeded on Sunday evening in taking the Clos St. Lazare. The insurrection has thus been driven from the heart of Paris, which it occupied till the preceding evening, and it was on this (Monday) morning confined to the Faubourg St. Antoine, which, however, was a very extensive district.

Up to this period of the conflict it was estimated on the best-informed quarters that the number of troops, National Guards, and Garde Mobile killed and wounded, was upwards of 15,000. This is probably a little exaggerated, but there is no doubt that the number was enormous. On the side of the insurgents the casualties were no less numerous.

On Monday morning an armistice took place, when the insurgents sent a deputation to propose a surrender on the condition that the insurgents should be allowed to retain their arms. This proposal was at once rejected by General Cavaignac, who insisted on an unconditional surrender, and only allowed the insurgents till ten o'clock to determine what they should do. At that hour it was thought that the time proposed were agreed to, and some of the Government troops having got within the lines of the insurgents, were fired at, and a great number of them were killed. Hostilities immediately recommenced, which, after a short contest, was brought to an end by the unconditional surrender of the insurgents, who themselves assisted in pulling down their barricades.

"During the conflict on Sunday and Monday, it should be mentioned, the National Guards from the departments near Paris, particularly Rouen, Amiens, Orleans, &c., fought gallantly by the side of their Paris brethren.

"Monday night passed without the slightest disturbance or appearance of an intention on the part of the insurgents to renew the contest. After one o'clock in the day there was no fighting, but it was not till twenty-five minutes to ten o'clock at night that M. Sénard, the President of the National Assembly, announced that all was terminated, that the barricades had been taken down, and that not one gun remained excepting that agitation which was inseparable from such events.

A great number of the insurgents had laid down their arms, but by far the greater number of them had taken refuge in the country between Vincennes and St. Denis, where they were pursued by several regiments of cavalry and infantry. In the course of Monday evening 1500 took up their quarters in the cemetery of Père la Chaise; but on an alarm that the troops were coming, they retreated to the neighbourhood of Romainville.

The total number who had fled to the country amounted to several thousands. The number of prisoners already made was very great. The prisons were filled with them, and every hour added to their number. Four thousand 500 prisoners who had surrendered in the Pantheon during the night were marched along the Boulevard strongly guarded by infantry, and carried to one of the detached forts in the neighbourhood of Paris. They consisted principally of ouvriers, but several of them were dressed in the uniform of National Guards, and a considerable number in that of the Garde Républicaine and on the same evening the whole of the city was illuminated for so much as a token of rejoicing for the victory gained, as to enable the sentries to distinguish each other, and to prevent any further attempt upon the part of the insurgents. In the course of the evening General Cavaignac issued the following proclamation to the National Guard and the army:—

"Citizens, soldiers,—The sacred cause of the Republic has triumphed; your devotedness and unshaken courage have baffled getting treason and the most impious attack. In the name of the country, in the name of all humanity, be thanked for your efforts be blessed for this necessary triumph. This morning the emotion of the victorious Republic proved principally of ouvriers, but as great in calm as you have just been in the combat. In Paris I see victors and vanquished, but may my name be accursed if I should consent to see victims. Justice will take its course—but as your chief—but as your friend—I swear it. Ready to return to the rank of simple citizen, I will carry in the midst of the civic souvenir of having, in these grave trials, only taken from liberty what the safety of the Republic itself demanded, and of having set an example to whoever may be in his turn called on to fulfil such great duties.

The insurgents had resolved to defend themselves to the last, and had posted up a printed proclamation to that effect, declaring that they would bury themselves under the ruins rather than surrender, except on their own terms. They had cannon of large dimensions, from which they poured a murderous fire upon the troops, and they only gave way when they found that the mortars were rapidly thinning their ranks. They then began to fly in every direction, many of them abandoning their muskets; but the exasperation of the troops of the line and the artillery of the National Guard was such that it was impossible to prevent a considerable massacre among the insurgents. A great number, however, were made prisoners; and the armed fugitives, who in their flight frequently turned round to continue the attack, were pursued by a division of the artillery of the National Guard to a considerable distance. The number of muskets abandoned by the insurgents was sufficient to load several carts. The well-disposed inhabitants of the faubourgs were loud in their exclamations of joy at being delivered from the turbulent men who have for several days kept them in agitation and alarm.

Dreadful atrocities are related of the insurgents, and in particular of some of the females who assisted in their defence. One woman cut into pieces the bodies of two of the Garde Mobile, who had been killed. She was taken, and in the heat of indignation the mob threw at her everything with blows from the but-ends of muskets. The injury caused to property by the artillery is very great, but less than might have been expected.

The insurrection was by far the most terrible that has ever desolated Paris. The number of killed and wounded will probably never be known; but certainly they amount to many thousands. Many calculate the number as high as 20,000, and none estimate it below 10,000. The troops of the line suffered greatly, and of the Garde Mobile nearly one-third are either killed or wounded.

The Moniteur mentions the following journals as being placed under interdiction for the entire duration of the state of siege:—Presse, La Révolution de 1848, L'Organisation du Travail, La Vraie République, L'Assemblée Nationale, Le Napoléon Républicain, La Liberté, L'Atmabile Faubourien, Le Lampion, Le Père Duchesne, Le Pilori.

M. Sénard, President of the National Assembly on more than one occasion spoke with just indignation of the atrocities committed by the insurgents. Information the most correct does not permit a doubt, the fact of accounts which one might have supposed copied from the most savage tribes of America.

We have spoken of the mutilation of the wounded of the Garde Mobile, who were decapitated by a man clothed in the garments of a woman; we have told of the poisoned brandy and wine sold in many quarters of the National Guards and soldiers, of the cowardly acts of many of those who fell, and of the poisoned balls extracted from the wounds of the blessés. Many similar [illegible] related. In the principal barrier of the Faubourg Saint Antoine many [illegible] been seized on by the mob, made sport of, and dismembered. The body of a Republican guard, in the Pantheon were found hung up by the wrists, the bodies of many of the Garde Mobile pierced by stabs of swords and bayonets. In the Clos Saint Lazare an aide-de-camp of general Perrot, [illegible] had his wrists cut off, and left to die slowly on the ground of his frightful wounds. A dragoon had his feet cut off, and then placed dying on his horse and driven [illegible]

Constitutionnel gives the following affecting anecdote:—"After having been so unfortunately wounded, the Archbishop of Paris was carried to a house in the Rue St. Antoine, in the hospital of the Hospital of the Quinze Vingts. On the way he was escorted by some Gardes Mobiles. The physiognomy of one of these brave lads had struck him, having seen him fight and disarm his enemy, after being wounded several times. Calling him to his side, he had strength enough left to raise his arms, and taking a little wooden crucifix attached to a black collar which he had, he gave it to the young hero, saying to him, 'Never quit this cross: lay it on your heart, it will make you happy.' Francis Decavrignière, such was his name, swore, with his hands joined, and in the attitude of prayer, ever to preserve this precious souvenir of the dying prelate."

From the Départements La news is of a chequered kind. A serious insurrection broke out at Marseilles on the 22nd ult. Like that of Paris, it was caused by the workmen of the ateliers nationaux, who were discontented with the measures taken for regulating their labour. These workmen, who were organised as auxiliary companies of the National Guard, and provided with ammunition, in the first place attacked the Prefecture, which fortunately they were not able to take. Repulsed by the National Guard and the line, they fell back towards the Place aux Œufs, which is the old part of Marseilles, and is composed of a labyrinth of narrow streets. Here they raised barricades, and entrenched themselves in the houses, from which they kept up a hot fire from the windows. The National Guard and the line, aided by a detachment of sappers, were obliged to besiege each house successively. The insurgents resisted during the day with extraordinary fury. At last, being forced in their last retreat, they were obliged to disperse, or to hide themselves. About fifty were taken. The loss of the National Guards and the line is reckoned at about one hundred. General Sultar Martin, commandant of the Marseilles National Guard, was wounded, as well as many other of the principal citizens of that town. In the evening the contest was not looked upon as at an end. A very strong barricade in the Place Castellane was still occupied by a mass of insurgents, and great anxiety existed through the town. Reinforcements were looked for during the night or on the morrow.

Other accounts state that the insurrection is completely suppressed, and that the city is perfectly quiet.

[illegible] very satisfactory. The city is tranquil, and a large [illegible] ordered to march to the assistance of the [illegible]

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

The National Assembly during the four eventful days of the insurrection was occupied solely with the consideration of the scenes of horrendous warfare which were being enacted around it. On each day the President reported all the various sittings the progress of events at intervals in the Assembly.

SATURDAY.—The following decrees were passed:—

"The Republic adopts the unfortunate victims of the calamities who fell on the 23rd of June, and who may hereafter fall in the defence of order, liberty, and the French Institutions."

"Art. 1. The National Assembly declares itself en permanence.

"Art. 2. Paris is placed in a state of siege.

"All the Executive powers are delegated to General Cavaignac."

In the course of the sitting the President read to it the following letter, which he had received from the Executive Committee

"M. le Président, We should have been wanting in our duties and honour had we withdrawn before a sedition and a public peril. We withdraw only before a vote of the Assembly. By surrendering into its hands the power with which you had invested us, we have remained at the Executive Committee re-enter the ranks of the national representation, to devote themselves to the common danger and to the safety of the Republic.

"The Members of the Executive Government,

"ARAGO, LEDRU ROLLIN, GARNIER PAGÈS, LAMARTINE, MARIE, PAGNERRE, Secretary."

"June 24, 1848.

The President then added, that such of his colleagues as were anxious to repair to the different quarters of Paris, to tell the masses what their consequences dictated, might proceed with security to the three following points:—First, to the head quarters of General Lamoricière, at the Gate of St. Denis; to those of General Duvivier, at the Hôtel de Ville; and to the of General Damesme, on the Place de la Sorbonne

The President invited them to wear over their coats the tricoloured scarf.

SUNDAY.—A decree was passed, postponing, in consequence of the present disturbances, the 4th of July, the payment of coupons due on the 22nd of June, the 23rd of June. The President also read to the Assembly a project of decree, which, after stating that the agitation and sanguinary collision which took place during the last two days had suspended all the works and deprived the labouring classes of all means of existence, proposed to open a credit of 3,000,000f., to be distributed among the indigent population of the 14 arrondissements of the department of the Seine, and charged the Minister of the Interior and the Mayor of Paris with that mission. The President observed, that the adoption of the decree was urgent, and the Assembly voted it by acclamation

MONDAY. It was decreed as follows:—

"Art. 1. Every individual taken with arms in his hands shall be transported beyond the seas

"Art. 2. The Executive power is charged with the execution of the present decree.

"Art. 3. Algeria is excluded from the Transatlantic possessions of France to which the insurgents are to be transported."

A decree was also passed to the effect of appointing a committee of fifteen members to investigate the causes of the insurrection, and all the circumstances connected with the disasters of July, the payment of coupons due on the 16th of May.

At two o'clock, M. Corbon, one of the Vice-Presidents, took the chair, and read the following letter to the Assembly.

"Citizen President,—In the attitude of the National Assembly, and the devotion and courage of the National Guard and army, the revolt has been suppressed. The struggle has completely ceased in Paris. The moment I am assured the powers confided to me by the National Assembly are no longer necessary for the salvation of the Republic, I will respectfully resign them in its hands. (Signed) "CAVAIGNAC

The communication excited the liveliest enthusiasm, and the whole Assembly, rising, cried "Vive la République!"

M. Corbon next announced to the Assembly that M. Dornès, one of its members, who was dangerously wounded in the attack of a barricade, was out of danger.

TUESDAY. At ten o'clock M. Sénard, the President, having taken the chair, informed the Assembly that the situation of Paris continued perfectly satisfactory. A few isolated cases of resistance which had been quickly overcome by the National Guards, Lyons, and Rouen were somewhat agitated, but no open acts of revolt had taken place there. Marseilles was somewhat excited, but order had been completely re-established in that city. The Executive Government had, in the meantime, adopted all the measures necessary for the maintenance of tranquillity. The 8th and 12th legions of the National Guard was followed by their disarmament, which was effected without resistance. The clubs had been closed. In a word, the authorities both watched and were followed by every measure which evinced the co-operation of the National Assembly. After the victory the first thought of the executive power had been for the victims. The Assembly having then the most painful duty to perform, that of the vanquished, in adopting them, it now believed it to adopt a resolution expressive of the public feeling and gratitude of France, and to decree becoming funeral honours to the citizens who fell in defence of the cause of the Republic. The executive power would not take that charge upon itself, and had deemed it expedient to confide it to a legislative committee, composed of nine representatives, a vice-president, and a secretary of the Assembly.

The proposition having been approved, the President drew by lot the names of the nine commissioners Messrs. Charlemagne, Lestevrie, Fournier, de Mortray, Jean Faucher, Lherbette, Oberkampf, de Strasbourg, and Emile Ritbieux. All having responded to their names, the President invited them to retire into one of the bureaux to commence labours

The President then observed, that all the departments, on hearing of the revolt, had sent their contingent of National Guards to the assistance of the capital.

The sitting was then suspended

The Assembly resumed its sitting. n the evening, when it was communicated that the Archbishop of Paris died on that day (Tuesday), at four o'clock, and that M Characteau had also died of his wounds.

M. Meaulle ascended the tribune and read the report of the Committee to which the Transportation Bill had been referred

General Cavaignac having inferred from certain expressions of M. Meaulle that he seemed him of an intention to have all the prisoners tried by court-martial, denied that he had ever entertained such an intention

M. Meaulle said that the General must have misunderstood him

After an animated discussion the various articles, as follow, were agreed to:—

1. The individuals, at present detained, who have taken part in the insurrection of the 23rd inst. and the 3rd of July, or who have committed any act of the general safety, to the transatlantic possessions of France, other than those situate in the Mediterranean.

2. The insurrection commenced before the courts martial shall follow its course, as respects those whom the instruction should designate as chiefs, promoters, or instigators of the insurrection, as having furnished or distributed money, arms, or ammunition, or provided a rendezvous, or committed any aggravating act of rebellion.

M. Lerminier suggested that the mission of the courts-martial should continue after the raising of the state of siege.—Adopted.

M. Anthony Thouret proposed to add that all liberated galley-slaves and convicts taken with arms in their hands, or implicated in the rebellion, be also tried by courts-martial. Adopted

3 A decree of the National Assembly shall fix the special regimen to which the individuals transported shall be subjected

4. The Executive power is charged with the prompt execution of the present decree.

The whole law was afterwards voted by an immense majority, about thirty or forty Montagnards rising alone against it

General Cavaignac next ascended the tribune, and said,

"Citizen Representatives, You had originally confided the executive power to a committee of five members, in consequence of the exceptional situation, you thought proper to establish an exceptional form of Government. The latter, however, cannot endure; and, to-morrow morning, I will resign into your hands the extraordinary power by which you had invested me." A general cry of dissent was interrupted by exclamations of "No, no, we will not accept it," from all parts of the Assembly. "My opinion," resumed the General, "is, that if a Republic should be jealous of its power, it is also necessary that every one should maintain it clear and precise manner, that he is not jealous to retain it."

(Prolonged acclamations.)

The Assembly afterwards adjourned at a quarter-past twelve at night.

WEDNESDAY. On the meeting of the Assembly Gen. Cavaignac rose to depose in their hands the extraordinary power with which he had been invested. He wished it to be understood, that in accepting such powers he was alone influenced by the imperious necessity of there being independent and uncontrolled action. These circumstances having ceased, he now, as he had done, returned to his former position. Considering, however, the yet agitated state of the public mind, and with a view to the restoration of order, he thought it would be necessary that for some days the state of siege be continued. The Ministry had placed their resignation in his hands, and he now laid down His authority. (Loud cheers from all sides.)

The President said that he was sure he spoke the sentiments of the Assembly and of the whole country, when he declared that they owed a debt of gratitude to General Cavaignac, and he would propose a vote of thanks to the gallant General.

The whole Assembly rose and carried the vote by acclamation, expressed in the most enthusiastic manner. As soon as the plaudits had subsided, the President said, with much warmth of manner, "I have now to declare, in the name of the National Assembly, that General Cavaignac has merited well of his country." Renewed cheering of the most enthusiastic kind, in the midst of which

General Cavaignac said, I ask you to include in this decree the brave army, the brave National Guards, and the general officers who supported me with so much ardour and energy in my endeavours to support order. The names of the leaders of the troops need not be repeated by me, for they are in all your mouths. (Loud cheers.)

The vote of thanks, as thus amended, was put from the chair, and carried by acclamation

Towards the close of the sitting, at half-past four o'clock, General Changarnier entered the Assembly and met with the warmest felicitations from all sides. It was announced that he would be named Commander-in-Chief of the National Guards of Paris. Sitting was adjourned till eight o'clock.

THURSDAY AND WEDNESDAY passed over in complete tranquillity, the state of siege continuing, but in a modified degree.

THE NEW MINISTRY.

The latest intelligence from Paris informs us that Wednesday General Cavaignac returned into the hands of the National Assembly the executive power with which he had been invested. The Assembly passed a vote of thanks to the General by acclamation, and agreed to a decree confiding to him the executive authority, with title of President of the Council, and power to appoint his Ministers which has been accordingly done as follows:

General Cavaignac, President of the Council; Bethmont, Justice; Sénard, Interior; General Lamoricière, War; Vernhuilac de St. Maur, Marine; Goudchaux, Finance; Bastide, Foreign Affairs.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

To the preceding details of the events of the several days' sanguinary struggle, we append the substance of the notes taken by our Artist, of the appearance of the localities which he visited in sketching the accompanying Illustrations, from which some estimate may be formed of the risk will be incurred by each reader; to whom also it will doubtless be satisfactory to learn that in his faithful and devotional discharge of duty, our Artist experienced no personal injury, though often drawn by curiosity into positions which nothing but a stout heart could have withstood. First, upon the front page of the present Number, —

The Great Barricade at the entrance of the Rue du Faubourg St. Antoine.—Our Artist having taken a good view of the scene from inside the barricade on the Place de la Bastile, proceeded to the entrance of the Rue du Faubourg St. Antoine. "Here," he writes, "I ascended the famous barricade: it was as high as a first floor, and more than ten feet deep; the top was covered with double rows of well-armed men. A small passage near the corners was left, through which the [illegible] Barricade, I was compelled to work like [illegible] also at removing the pavement, only to show that I sympathised with [illegible] gents. After this display of bon enfants, I was at liberty, and went up the faubourg to the fifth barricade, showing my dirty hands and muddy coat every time when called upon to assist, to prove that I had contributed my share. The aspect of the faubourg was formidable: one universal feeling pervading all the population; women, old men, children, and entire families were in the street, not at their doors, but in the very middle, mixed with the workmen." This is a fearful picture: the barricade itself bristled with armed men, the planted flag, and the windows and house-tops crowded with people, form an exciting scene. But the most characteristic feature is the board in the centre of the barricade, inscribed COMPLOT: this is one of the boards placed on omnibuses to indicate that they are full (complet): this piece of wit, as such a moment, is highly characteristic of the French people. The barricade was formed of omnibuses, heavy carts, large masses of building stone, &c. The sketch is taken from the Place de la Bastile. It will be seen by the narrative that General Negrier was shot whilst in front of this vast barricade.

The Conflict on the Rue du Faubourg St. Antoine—one of the most desperate scenes contained in the narrative.

The Interior of the Chamber shows a whole family of insurgents labouring, by various means, to assist the leading members to protect the barricade in the street beneath.

Carrying the Wounded.—This sad incident was to be witnessed at every turn.

Barricade at the corner of the Boulevard and Rue Mazagran, near the Porte St. Denis —This post was taken by the troops on Saturday afternoon, at two o'clock after a fearful conflict. The Times report says:—"A large multitude had assembled there early in the morning, and at one o'clock a number of carriages, omnibuses, and other vehicles were stopped and upset, and converted into a barricade across the Boulevard, behind which 150 persons, armed with muskets, posted themselves. The troops entered the Porte St. Martin, and at half-past eleven o'clock a third was commenced on the Boulevard, opposite the Rue Mazagran, at which the revolters had not time to finish.

General Cavaignac and Staff are from a sketch on the Military Commandant of Paris, with Lamartine, Cassaignac, and Pierre Bonaparte, and staff, proceeding to the barricades in the Faubourg St. Temple; in the fore ground is a regiment of the line, and to the left are the dragoons. Our Artist thus describes this scene which he reached after he left the great Barricade of St. Antoine:—"In his route by the Boulevard du Palais Royal Column:—"I proceeded to the Arsenal, passing round by the Tour des Tournelles, and approached the Hôtel de Ville, which I found so strongly guarded that I was obliged to descend again the Rue Vieille du Temple, through the Boulevard du Temple. There I saw Lamartine on horseback, with staff, &c., and Pierre Bonaparte. The reports in the papers are false, stating that he was hissed. I saw several bouquets thrown to him, and he was cheered by a large corps of the line du Temple. After a general survey of the troops, I, like many others, was compelled to retire. Cavaignac wore over his coat a blue barouse laced with gold, and black feathers and gold lace in his cap.

Women on the Barricade of St. Denis.—Although this scene appears too melodramatic to be true, still it is the very drama of reality. To the left waves, in grim horror, the red flag, "Le Drapeau Rouge" (Bread or Death), and mounted on the barricade are two women heroically calling upon the insurgents to follow their example of self-devotedness. The foremost was well known in the Faubourg St. Antoine, by the name of the Black Bear, and wore a light blue silk dress; her head and arms bare. She and her companion were the leaders in the attitudes indicated in the illustration. The scene reminds one of heroines of 1792.

Sketch on the Italian Boulevards Our Artist thus describes this act of strange audacity:—"About half-past seven o'clock (on last Saturday morning) the crowd was increasing near the Passage de l'Opéra, not a house was yet open, although every window was occupied. Whilst sitting on one of the benches on the trottoir, a most remarkable incident occurred. A man in a blue blouse, mounted on a superb black horse, with the Spanish hunting-whip in his hand, trotted briskly up the Boulevards, in the direction of the Rue Grange Batelière, where a bataillon of Nations. Guards were standing l'arme au pied, when all of a sudden five or six shots were heard. I first turned round and saw a volley of firing from the mass of the National Guards, and the people running and screaming in every direction, and in the most horrible confusion; and, at the same instant, the man, in the blouse came galloping by at a tremendous speed. The man, it appears, had actually discharged a pistol, which he had concealed under his blouse, at the battalion. No one had any idea of stopping him, although an immediate pursuit was organised on his escape, and he was stopped by his horse had taken fright. I have since learned that he was arrested in the Place Vendôme." The Times account says:—"He put spurs to his horse, and went at full gallop towards the Hôtel des Affaires Etrangères, of unfortunate memory, he found that his flight towards the Madeleine was impossible. He turned down the Rue Neuve des Capucins, and endeavoured to pass through the Place Vendôme, but was arrested by a mass of National Guards, made prisoner, and, I am told, shot—but this I cannot vouch for."

Cannonade in the Rue St. Jacques. This frightful scene of Friday night is sketched on the extremity of the Pont aux Changes and the Marché aux Fleurs; the Belle Jardinière, at the corner, was said to have been reduced by the shot to a heap of ruins: but this seems to be a mis-statement.

"Shut the Windows!"—This was sketched on Sunday last. In the streets, the drum was beaten, and the sentinels shouted to the inhabitants, "Fermez les fenetres!" ("Shut the windows!"); "Gardez les volets!" ("Open the shutters!") The Guards saw the order strictly obeyed, though many an inmate, as seen in the Illustration, unwillingly took a last glance at the scene in the street.

Martin, the Young Garde Mobile.—Among the incidents related of Sunday, the following is given:—The youthful Martin Hyacinthe, eighteen years of age, and a simple Garde Mobile, gallantly mounted a formidable barricade in the Faubourg du Temple, notwithstanding a shower of balls. Seizing the flag which he mounted it, he would not quit hold of it even to fight. When the battalion had returned to General Changarnier's head-quarters, at the Chamber, the young Martin was presented to the chief of the executive power, to whom he presented the flag which he had taken. General Cavaignac immediately and spontaneously detaching his cross from his breast, decorated Martin Hyacinthe with it amidst the repeated cheers of the crowd. Our Illustration shows the ovation paid to young Martin in the streets, after he had received the decoration from Gen. Cavaignac: he carries the captured flag, torn and pierced with balls. Upon his sleeve are some flowers that women have strewed on him: he is very young, and of boyish appearance, but is seen

EXTENSION OF THE SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY TO WATERLOO-BRIDGE.

THE (PRESENT) WATERLOO STATION, YORK-ROAD.

BRIDGE, CHURCH-STREET, VAUXHALL.

THE incompleteness of the South-Western Railway, by the distance of its metropolitan terminus from the heart of London, has been a subject of complaint from the first opening of the line. The inconvenience was partially remedied by omnibus, steam-boat, and regulated cab-fares; still, Vauxhall remained a suburb, approachable only by uncertain means, of consequence in this "fast" age, when railways have, indeed, taught us to "count the minutes as they roll"

The South-Western Railway Company have just completed their line by the above "extension," of no great length, it is true but very costly, for it has involved an outlay of £800,000! The work was examined on Wednesday by the Government Inspector, and being reported substantial, the line will shortly be opened to the public.

This new line was laid out in 1844, by Mr. Locke, M.P., engineer-in-chief to the company; and by Mr. Tite, F.R.S., their architect. The site pointed out by these gentlemen for the Waterloo terminus was then vacant ground, to a great extent occupied as hay-stalls and cow-yards, and by dung-heaps, and similar nuisances. This area will eventually comprise eleven acres; and here will be distinct termini, in addition to that to be used immediately; and the principal façade and entrances, in the York-road, will present a frontage 600 feet in length.

The length of the extension, from Nine Elms to Waterloo Bridge Road is two miles, and about 60 yards; and the whole, after leaving the Wandsworth-road, is upon a viaduct, at an average height of 20 feet above the level of the ground. The main bridges are six in number. That which crosses the Wandsworth-road is of iron, and 60 feet in span. Next is the south Lambeth-road bridge; and then the Vauxhall-road, a bridge of 50 feet span, in iron. Lambeth Butts, and the road leading to Lambeth Palace, are also spanned by bridges, the latter much on the skew, with the novelty of a pier in the middle of the roadway. The Westminster-road is next spanned by an oblique bridge of 70 feet, in iron—we believe the largest hitherto executed at such an angle.

The terminus is, at present, approached from the Waterloo-road, by an incline of one in twenty-five. This station, except the iron roof, is temporary; but it will be complete in permanent building in the course of a few months. There are convenient staircases to give access, in addition to the roads. In our view of the station, the building seen on the right is an extensive engine-house, with a tank in the centre to supply the engines with water. The contractors for the work are Messrs. Lee and Son, the eminent builders of Chiswell-street. Of the solidity and finish of the work we can scarcely speak too highly; the grooined brick arch near Harrington-street, must have been of very difficult construction. The several designs are by W. Tite. The assistant architect is Mr. C. Borden; the assistant engineer Mr. Ker.

HISTORY OF THE REVOLUTIONS IN EUROPE, 1848.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION OF 1848.

The French Revolution of 1848, still more than its precursors in 1789, 1792, and 1830, has startled the world. It has set Europe in convulsion, and given the signal for changes of which the beginnings are more stupendous than any other events recorded in modern history, and of which it is impossible to imagine a close. The life-time of a generation is too short a period for the working and development of such principles as have been set in operation by it throughout all the civilised countries of Europe. The due philosophical understanding of its whole scope, tendency, and probable results is as yet to be hardly expected from the most clear-sighted and intelligent minds. Besides France itself, two other great divisions of the European family have been impelled into the career of change. If France had not entered upon the path of revolution, Germany and Italy would have each pursued their own course, and set, at some future time, the example of a gradual or a violent overthrow of their respective systems of Government. The French Revolution expedited, though it did not originate, the movement in those nations. We shall endeavour, in the following succinct history of these three phases of the European Revolution, to separate carefully, not only the events which have signalised the progress of each, but to eliminate the differences of feeling, sentiment, and principles which, acting upon different races, in different localities, and under circumstances of but slight resemblance, have produced, and are now producing, the same results—the overthrow of old authority—the annihilation of time-honoured systems—and the reconstruction both of Governments and of Nations.

The Revolution of February, 1848, in Paris, is in some respects a continuation of the Revolution of July, 1830. In other respects it is totally new. The old principle combined with the new to overturn the throne of Louis Philippe, and to proclaim the Republic; but, as soon as the monarchy was abolished, the old and the new principles commenced a war against each other. This war has raged ever since with much bitterness, and has created unparalleled confusion. It will, we fear, long continue to be waged between them, to the injury of public and private happiness in France, the ruin of her trade, and the practical denial of the liberty, equality, and fraternity, in the name of which the Revolution was accomplished. The old principle includes the right of self-government, and civil and religious liberty—the principles, in fact, that were so wisely advocated by Vergniaud, Bailly, Roland, Brissot, Barbaroux, Louvet, and the other Girondins; and so unwisely and ferociously contended for by Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Marat, Robespierre, Hebert, and Chaumette; and which at a later time found illustrious advocates in Lafayette, Constant, and Lafitte. It is a political principle only, and merely attempts to realise what the American people have realised under a Republic; and what the British people, to a very large extent, have secured for themselves, by ages of efforts, under the form of a Monarchy. Louis Philippe invaded this principle, and he fell. The new principle which aided in his overthrow adopts the old principle, but goes much further. It insists not merely upon civil and religious liberty, and upon a share in Government, through the suffrage, for the whole adult male population, but upon the establishment of new social relations between wealth and labour. It is in fact Socialism, or Communism; and affirms that the State collectively can and must supply food and labour for the whole population. The one principle is purely political and philosophical: the other is social and unphilosophical. Both were active in France during the reign of Louis Philippe; both were enemies of his Government: both desired a change; the one that France might become a great Republic like the United States—the other that France might work the mighty problem of Communism, or bee-hive humanity; and show to the world by a new distribution of wealth, and by the destruction of individualism, that every man might have more than enough for his wants, and poverty and crime be altogether banished from society. The idea, though not wise or founded upon a philosophical comprehension of man's nature, was grand. It made converts among the uneducated masses, who had nothing to lose in the progress of such an experiment, and who by no possible changes of government, or of the relations between man and man, could be rendered more wretched than they were. Both of these great divisions of the French people the former including the bulk of the middle and upper the latter nearly the whole of the working classes and the paupers—either lukewarmly supported or violently opposed the cause of the Monarchy. Between the two it fell, and could not be restored, because the general impression amongst most was that Monarchy being worse than a failure could not be tried again, and that the only possible form of government left to the nation was the Republic. So far the friends of the old and the new principle agreed; but at the very next step of their progress they split. M. de Lamartine as the representative of the one, M. Louis Blanc as the representative of the other, were in power, each thinking of his own system, and of turning the Revolution to the end which each of them considered to be its proper and only legitimate object. But M de Lamartine, and those who shared his opinions, wise and eloquent and patriotic as they were in many respects, and thoroughly as they understood the true duty of the French people both to themselves and to Europe, were weak in the hour of their triumph. Alone with their principle, they never could have made the Revolution. The working men—the Communists, the Socialists, the Utopians, the dreamers of dreams, the schemers of an impossible state of society, and of an undesirable, even if a possible re-adjustment of relationship between the employers and the employed—were, in reality, the men whose strong arms overthrew the Monarchy. The two classes combined, did that which neither could have done separately. The working men were flushed with success. They were strong in the consciousness of power, and strong also in the consciousness that what they had made, they could unmake. M. de Lamartine and the friends of the old principle committed the error of flattering this mob, whose principle they either did not understand, or, understanding, must have rejected. The Communists, even before the victory of the 24th of February, hoisted the red flag, and called themselves Red Republicans. Upon that day, when their triumph was not a minute old, they endeavoured to show that they were the real founders of the Republic, and insisted upon the substitution of their emblem, for the old, and, as they considered, worn-out tricolour, which had floated over the palaces of Monarchy, and was associated in their minds with regal tyranny and corruption. M. de Lamartine resisted the innovation, at the imminent hazard of his life. He was a conservative of the flag. Imbued with the old principle, he clung to the old banner; and by dint of the most contrageous bearing and the most wonderful eloquence prevailed upon the excited Communists to abandon the drapeau rouge. This was on the 24th of February. Had he and the moderate Republicans shown the same courage on all occasions, much mischief might have been avoided. But after this display of heroism, the Moderates not only hung back, but thought it necessary to cajole the people, and make promises which were desired, without considering whether it was possible to fulfil them. This was a fatal blunder, and criminal weakness. The multitude, who complained that they had made previous revolutions without obtaining any advantages from them, were told that this time it should be otherwise. The Provisional Government made an earnest of its good intentions by distributions of money to redeem all articles pledged by the poor for sums under ten francs; instituted a commission of labour at the Luxembourg to inquire into the wants and wishes of working men; and ultimately established the ateliers nationaux, or national worshops, to employ 120,000 men in the production of articles for which there were no purchasers, because the price was higher than that obtainable for better articles supplied by private enterprise. Hence arose mutual bitterness between the adherents of the old and the new principles. The one complained that the Revolution in attempting to feed the lower classes was ruining all classes, and maintaining an army of idleness at the expense of the industrious. The other complained that the Revolution had not gone far enough—that in maintaining 120,000 workmen, it was but performing a small portion of its duty, and that it was necessary to purge the Revolution of leaders who misunderstood it or hated it, and of men who were driving it back into reaction, and estranging it from the working classes, who were its real founders.

In this conflict of opinion upon the question of Labour, or of Communism, is the resumé of all the great events that have taken place in France since the declaration of the Republic on the 24th of February last. This key unlocks them all; and the efforts of this principle to establish itself, and to overthrow its opponents, explain events otherwise inexplicable, and show us in the clearest possible manner what are and what are not the great opposing forces that have since been at feud. All other forces in France have been as nothing compared with these two. The friends of Monarchy, whether of the Orleans or the old Bourbon dynasty, and the friends of Napoleon, have, it is true, endeavoured to make themselves heard; but their voices have been mere whispers in comparison with the shouts and hubbub of the Communists and anti-Communists—of the tricolour Republicans and the Republicans of the drapeau rouge.

Without this clue to the character of the Revolution, the remark of Milton, that the wars of the Saxon Heptarchy were as unintelligible as those of crows and kites in a neighbouring wood, would apply to the proceedings of the Parisians. Almost each day, after the 24th of February, brought tidings of change in all the relations betwixt man and man. There was fighting one day, embracing the next; every rotation of the hand brought to view a wonderful and unexpected change of figures in the political kaleidoscope. Day after day, in endless succession, there were mouthings of tumid, florid, and often unintelligible speeches, and of still more unintelligible and mysterious theories for the regeneration of mankind. Every speech and newspaper article breathed only peace and goodwill towards all men, yet almost every ordinance of the Government was directed towards the organisation of armed men. There were assemblings of the people, reviews, marchings, and counter-marchings; hasty summonings at all hours; the beating of the rappel, and the sounding of the tocsin in the dead of night and the early dawn. The "Marseillaise Hymn" and the "Mourir pour la Patrie" were sung in every street, court, and alley, and were heard on the pillow of every recumbent citizen. Journalism became a power of tremendous magnitude and extent. People read leading articles by torch-light, and shouted out to the moon apostrophes to Liberty, ay, "LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY." These three talismanic words, too often devoid of meaning in the apprehension of those who shouted them with a fervour sufficient to split the ears of the groundlings. Liberty? every man doing what he deemed best, seemed to be the interpretation of the mob. Equality? every man trying to get above every other man, seemed its natural consequences. Fraternity? every man knocking down every other man who happened to be of a different way of thinking from himself, was the manner in which the men of the faubourgs seemed to construe it. Such seemed to be the epitome of the French Revolution; but it was not so. There was order amid disorder; two principles were at work; and the Revolution—so frivolous in its details, so momentous in its results; exhibiting so much talent and energy, so much vanity and folly; so much honesty and treachery, such kind feelings and such malignant passions; such planting of trees and cutting of throats; such recommendations of order, such instances of disorder; so much wisdom producing so much folly; so much goodness, mingled with so much wickedness; so much gravity, combined with so much levity; such long speeches, and such brief epigrams—was quite explainable wherever the mind was able to grasp it as a whole, and see the operation of the two great and all-pervading principles which we have mentioned.

With these few preliminary remarks, we resume from our Double Number of March 4th last our history of the Revolution, confining ourselves to brief details of facts and occurrences as they emerged from day to day.

The first acts and proclamations of the Government were looked to with great interest all over Europe. It was imagined that the policy of aggression, and the aggrandisement of France by the extension of her frontiers to the Rhine, would be adopted by the Government, with the view of gaining popularity at home. M. Lamartine, as Minister for Foreign Affairs, tranquillised the mind of Europe on the subject, by addressing a circular to all the diplomatic agents of France in foreign countries, expounding the principles on which the Republic was founded, and would conduct its policy. "The Republic," he said, "is the will of a great people. It derives its title from itself. Its policy is peace." Following shortly after this, came the announcement of the Provisional Government, that the National Assembly was convoked for the 20th of April—a date afterwards postponed to the 4th of May. It was decreed that the electoral colleges should meet on the 9th of April, and that every Frenchman, without respect to property, being of the age of twenty-one years, should have a vote, under the protection of the ballot. The Assembly, so elected, to consist of 900 members, or one member to every 40,000 of population. Each member to be twenty-five years of age, or upwards. The principle of the payment of members was affirmed; and the indemnity for each was fixed at 25f. per diem during the session.

The interment of the victims of the Revolution was the first great ceremony of the Republic. Though somewhat theatrical in its general aspect, as suited the character of the people, it was nevertheless grand and imposing, as what spectacle could fail to be with such masses of banners flying, and marching in procession to the sound of music? The official returns gave 150 killed and 500 wounded in the fighting; but it was believed that the number was really much more considerable. All the members of the Ministry were present at the ceremony of interment except M. Lamartine, whose absence was accounted for on the ground of excessive fatigue. The orators were M. Dupont (de l'Eure), the venerable President of the Council; M. Crémieux, Minister of Justice and Religion; and M. Garnier-Pagès, the Mayor of Paris.

For the first few weeks after the Revolution, the people, as distinguished from the bourgeoisie, or, in other words, the adherents of Louis Blanc, Cabet, Barbès, Blanqui—the ultra-Republicans and Communists—were kept in good humour. They had not lost faith in the Provisional Government, amongst the members of which they counted three staunch supporters—Louis Blanc himself, Albert (ouvrier), a pretended but not a real operative, and Flocon. The commission set to the Luxembourg. The people were fêted. They planted trees of liberty to amuse themselves; and marched from street to street with uprooted poplars, seeking vacant plots of ground in which to plant them. They marched in procession with banners flying, and with a priest at their head to bless the trees in the name of God, and in the cause of liberty. Paris became disfigured at last with the multiplicity of these saplings. Occupied with their amusement, and favoured with gratuitous admissions to the theatres the sovereign people did not think of mischief. So affairs went on for a time; and the Government taking a lesson from the amuse themselves; and marched from street to street with uprooted poplars, seeking vacant plots of ground in which to plant them. They marched in procession with banners flying, and with a priest at their head to bless the trees in the name of God, and in the cause of liberty. Paris became disfigured at last with the multiplicity of these saplings. Occupied with their amusement, and favoured with gratuitous admissions to the theatres the sovereign people did not think of mischief. So affairs went on for a time; and the Government taking a lesson from the history of the first Revolution, imitated its gorgeous fêtes, and brought large assemblages of the people together to inaugurate the Republic with spears, swords, and banners, the firing of artillery, and the shouting of enthusiastic multitudes. All these festivals passed off with great éclat.

POPULAR DEMONSTRATIONS.

The "People," however, were jealous at times. The first occasion upon which they thought it expedient and necessary to show their power, was upon a very ridiculous matter of uniform among the National Guards. The officers of one favourite and somewhat aristocratic division—aristocratic as far as dress was concerned, insisted upon a distinction of habiliment, which the working classes looked upon as an infringement of the principle of "equality."

Early on Friday morning (17th of March), the emissaries of the clubs proceeded to all the suburbs, to invite the labourers to rendezvous on different points, and to proceed from thence in bodies to the Hôtel de Ville. Their instructions were strictly obeyed, and about seven o'clock the labourers poured down in masses into the city, forcing all o'clock the labourers poured down in masses into the city, forcing all their comrades who were working to join them. Those who assembled in the Champs Elysées exceeded 30,000. By twelve o'clock the square was filled by one dense throng, with branches from the main body extending up the small narrow street that debouch into the Place. The Pont d'Arcole was covered.

From twelve o'clock till two the crowd remained on the Place, cheering and shouting, at intervals raising the chorus of the "Marseillaise," or beating the rappel on their drums. There was no sign of opposition to this manifestation of feeling; the guard on duty was even less numerous than usual.

Towards two o'clock, the crowd, thinking that the united effect of its numbers and its cheers had sufficiently indicated the degree and direction of popular feeling, began to disperse, though very slowly.

The demonstration was considered a fine triumph over an attempted reaction, a success gained by the mass over those who, it is said, wished to impede the progress of the Republic.

The succeeding night passed in perfect tranquillity, though the demonstration continued to a late hour. Bodies of men, marching nine and ten abreast, continued to defile along the Boulevards from four till seven o'clock. As night fell, crowds collected in different spots, but principally about the Porte St. Denis and Porte St. Martin. The inhabitants in this quarter illuminated their houses, and about eight o'clock an immense body of the people began to move slowly along the Boulevard in the direction of the Madeleine, singing and calling on the shopkeepers to light up; the citizens were taken by surprise, and whenever a delay occurred, cries of "Des lampions!" were raised: as soon as lamps were fixed to the balconies, the crowd gave a sound of applause and huzzaed on. In this way they advanced in comparative darkness, leaving a blaze of light behind them. They were in a very good humour, and not the slightest damage was done: not a single pane of glass was broken, nor did the shopkeepers exhibit any alarm, though the police nor any military were to be seen. By ten o'clock the throng neither police nor any military were to be seen. By ten o'clock the throng began to diminish, and by midnight everything was quiet again. Some of the papers speak of the illumination as if it had been a spontaneous expression of rejoicing: it was entirely compulsory.

The Minister of War addressed a circular to all the chiefs of corps, directing them to present in future for promotion none but candidates entitled to it by their military service.

After their demonstration at the Hôtel de Ville, the workmen of Paris proceeded to the Ministry of the Interior to salute M. Ledru Rollin personally, and the different trades succeeded each other without intermission from four to seven o'clock P.M. Not less than 100,000 men presented themselves at the Hotel during that interval, and M. Ledru Rollin stood constantly under the porch receiving addresses and replying to them.

This rupture between the National Guard and the bulk of the people was the first symptom of the enmity and estrangement that were afterwards destined to produce such unhappy results; the first proof that the friends of the old principle and those of the new could not act together for the safety of the Republic.

The position of the armed force of France, in relation to the people, was singular. The army, notwithstanding many reassurances, had not recovered from the disgrace inflicted by the general disarming; the public were not sufficiently reassured of its disposition to permit the introduction even of two regiments into Paris without a murmur. The National Guard was pêtri, tainted with anti-revolutionary tendencies; the Garde Mobile was imperfectly armed and quite undisciplined. The military and political systems seemed alike disorganised.

The commission of workmen held a sitting on the following Friday, in the Luxembourg, when Louis Blanc met a deputation of masters, whom he addressed on the evils of unlimited competition and the advantages of association. The proceedings were most disorderly; silence could not be kept; all was anger and confusion, in the midst of which Louis Blanc abruptly left for the Hôtel de Ville to take a share in the receptions there. He was allowed to depart with freezing indifference.

The Mint was encumbered with an enormous mass of silver plate, brought there to be coined into pieces of five francs each. A number of silversmiths, despairing of selling their second-hand articles, resorted to this expedient to render their dead stock available; others announced a reduction of 10 per cent. on their goods, in order to ensure such a sale as may keep their workmen employed.

The spirit that prevailed in the trades of the metropolis extended into the provinces. The workmen of the great iron-works of Cronzot struck for higher wages. Fears were entertained at Roanne, that in consequence of a failure in that town the extensive spinning-mills of Chaudfailles would be compelled to stop work. Rumours of discontent among other classes were rife; a Doual journal announced that a mutiny had occurred in one of the regiments of the line in garrison in that city. The mayor of the town accompanied the colonel to the barrack, and harangued the troops. Order, however, was not restored until the soldier, the instigation of the mutiny, had been released from custody.

The arming and equipment of the newly enrolled Garde Mobile was urged on with the utmost rapidity. A decree in the Moniteur authorised the Minister of War to issue from the stores of the army such clothing, &c., as could be spared without inconvenience to the service. The pupils of the military school will be required to officer the battalions. Officers and men were alike young, ardent, and anxious to enter on a career of glory. In the face of financial embarrassment, the Government was compelled to find the means of supporting an army already too large for the necessities or resources of the country. The Garde Mobile, however, was the luckiest thought of the government. It enlisted in the service of the Republic the young men of the "people," paid them at a much higher rate than the troops of the line, and bore lightly on them in the manner of discipline. They were destined hereafter, as will be seen, to form the greatest bulwarks against anarchy the government could have raised.

All able-bodied men in Paris, from 20 to 55 years of age, were invited to enrol themselves in the National Guard. The Government undertook to arm them all, and to provide clothing at the public expense for those who were not able to equip themselves. In a short time 200,000 citizens were enrolled in the National Guard of Paris and its vicinity.

A discount office, under the title of "Endowment for Small Traders," was directed to be established for their relief, by giving facilities of pecuniary accommodation.

The suppression of stamp duties on journals and other periodical publications was directed.

Another decree, dated 3rd March, ordered that the duration of effective labour in Paris, and in the suburbs, should be fixed at ten hours (per diem) for all professions. One of the first mistakes of the Republic was the great question of labour, afterwards destined to give the country so much trouble. Another decree, equally important, abolished slavery in all the French colonies and possessions.

THE ATTACK ON THE PANTHEON.

THE CONFLICT IN THE CLOS ST. LAZARE.

Some fears had existed that M. de Lamartine's circular might furnish a pretext to some of the northern powers for a hostile demonstration against France, but these fears subsided, and a calmer consideration of the document re-assured the public mind. This feeling of confidence, however, was qualified by certain occurrences. M. Goudchaux, Minister of Finance, resigned, and was succeeded by M. Garnier-Pagès.

M. Goudchaux, at whose instance the proposed abolition of the stamp duty on newspapers had been suspended, became displeased when the measure was ordered to take its course, and tendered his resignation. However, afterwards he was prevailed upon to resume his functions, and would have gone on with the business of the Finance Department, when the intelligence reached him that the banking-house of MM. Gouin and Co., formerly that of Jacques Laffitte and Co., had stopped payment: he therefore resigned office definitively. The cause of the suspension of payments by MM. Gouin and Co. was the refusal of the Bank of France to accommodate them with advances beyond the amount of 6,000,000f. to 7,000,000f. (£240,000 or £280,000), although they offered to deposit unquestionable first-class paper to the amount of 25,000,000f. (a million sterling). All these occurrences were but the beginning of evil.

DEPUTATIONS TO THE GOVERNMENT.

The French "people," or rather that portion of them who are not the bourgeoisie, and who monopolize to themselves that name, which more properly should include the whole nation, no sooner saw the Provisional Government installed at the Hôtel de Ville, than they began to manifest the hopes which they expected the Revolution to transform into realities. Every grievance, real or imaginary, was laid at the feet of Messrs. de Lamartine, Marrast, and Arago, with a view to a remedy. Carpenters, builders, shoemakers, tailors, sempstresses, purse-knitters, jewellers, flower-sellers, shoe-cleaners, grooms, waiters, cooks, nursery-maids, even the celebrated "Lorettes" of the capital, formed deputations day after day, and marched in procession through the streets to detail to the sympathising ears of the Government the hardships they suffered in their respective callings. They requested relief in every form, possible or impossible; shorter hours of labour, better wages, more frequent holidays, and fresh arrangements between the employers and the employed. All these were but a small portion of the tasks it was expected that the Government should accomplish in behalf of the "people." While most of the complaints which were made showed the presence of real suffering, most of the remedies suggested by the sufferers showed utter ignorance of the true functions of a Government, and the most childish reliance upon it for social ameliorations beyond the power of humanity. Utopia or Paradise alone seemed to be the model of society which would satisfy the "people," and the Government, continually compelled to bow the deputations out, with high-sounding words promising nothing, but leading the people to believe that something was intended, laid up for itself from these first days a stock of future unpopularity. It could not utterly destroy the hopes of the people; and so it temporised; and gave them those fair words which were sufficient to keep them in good humour for a time. It seemed that the Hôtel de Ville was the very "focus" of the world. Suffering humanity went there to unburden itself of its tale of misery, and carry away a hope. The beggar went there to dream of a better distribution of the world's wealth; the overburdened worker to revel upon a vision of leisure, unaccompanied by any diminution of the means of subsistence; the wretched for a solace; the sick for healing; the degraded for participation in the fraternity, from which none, however lowly, was to be excluded; the theoretic for encouragement and support in their theories; the practical for the practical aid of hard cash for the realisation of their schemes: all men who had anything to say upon the prospects of France, or the world, good, bad, or indifferent, wise or foolish, said their say in the vexed ears of the Government. Mingling in the throng of deputations were dwellers in the town and dwellers in the country, hand-workers and head-workers, followers of the pursuits of legal and illegal industry, those who administered to the legitimate wants of society, and those who flourished upon its vices, Frenchmen and Englishmen, Swiss, Poles, Germans, Italians, the haters of slavery, the friends of peace and progress, the benevolent, the patriotic, the enthusiastic, the Fourierist, the Owenite, the Cabetist, all ranks, classes, and degrees of men, o agreed upon the fact that the world was not so good a world as it might be, and who saw, or fancied they saw in the French Revolution a means of improving it. It was like the building of a new Babel after a new confusion of tongues. Each man, though he brought a stone to the edifice, spoke a dialect which none but himself could understand.

TREES OF LIBERTY.

The "people," while as yet no outcry about reaction had been raised, seemed as pleased with the Revolution as a child with a new plaything. What with illuminations by night and trees of liberty by day, they never lacked amusement or excitement. The planting of the trees of liberty took place usually with much pomp. First of all, the tree was decked out with gay tricolour ribbons and flags; then it was marched to the spot with drums beating, trumpets clanging, colours flying; then the clergy, with cross and holy water came and consecrated it; then Mr. Mayor, or other official, delivered a patriotic speech; then the National Guard and the people fired off muskets; then everybody shouted "Vive la République!" and then young men and young women danced around the tree until they were tired.

Soberer men shook their heads at these spectacles, and expressed a hope that French liberty would have a longer existence than the "Trees of Liberty;" for, as the trees were of several years' growth—some of them as high as houses—and as they were planted in ungenerous soil, and in unfavourable spots, a few months it was thought would assuredly see them wither. In the first Revolution the people planted several hundred "Trees of Liberty" in Paris; but of all that vast number only one exists at the present day.

The respect paid by the people to religion was noticed at this time as one of the most gratifying features in the Revolution. At the planting of the "Tree of Liberty" on the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, when the clergy were seen advancing in full canonicals, with the cross and usual religious banners, a man cried out, "Here comes M. le Curé, with his tools and his workmen!" and he set up a laugh at his own wit. Not only, however, did his jibe excite no approbation, but a brawny blacksmith, after casting an indignant glance at him, exclaimed, "Respect to the cross!" and at the same moment every head of the vast multitude was uncovered—many persons devoutly signed themselves with the sign of the cross—some fell on their knees—and, after a pause, all cried as with one voice, "Vive la Croix! Vive la Religion! Vive Jesus Christ!"

In the way of business things continued deplorable. Very little trade was doing; many establishments partially suspended business; some manufactories stopped altogether. There were many failures; money became scarce; misery increased; anxiety as regards the present, alarm as regards the future, did not diminish. Nor did the rich families who, on the breaking out of the Revolution, went from Paris, return; neither had the emigration of the few who remained ceased.

THE ELECTIONS.

The elections for the National Assembly excited, of course, very great excitement throughout all France; and there was, or appeared to be, reason to believe that in the provinces the Republic was not quite so popular as in Paris. There was a danger here which the Provisional Government deemed fit to provide against; for it was justly felt that if by any chance, or combination of circumstances, resulting either from the apathy of the Republicans, or from the superior activity of the friends of Monarchy, whether Orleanist, Legitimist, or Napoleonist, in the rural districts, removed from the ideas and feelings of the capital, an assembly should be elected containing a majority of anti-Republicans, that a state of anarchy and bloodshed would most probably be the consequence. The Republicans, if proved to be in a minority, would show themselves a minority that would be a continual source of alarm and mischief—a minority that never would submit—a minority that would change itself into a majority, by dint of its zeal, energy, and strength of conviction. To prevent this renewal of a struggle, of which the only possible result could be the triumph, at a somewhat later period, of republican principles, M. Ledru-Rollin and M. Carnot issued circulars to their agents, which excited much indignant remark. That of M. Ledru Rollin was the most boldly worded, and excited the greatest blame. It expressly declared that the agents of the government should use all means at their command to secure or forward the return of Republican candidates. The circular of M. Carnot took the same ground, and insisted that it was better to choose an uneducated Republican from the ranks of the peasantry or the workmen, than an educated Royalist, however great his reputation, or pure his character. The object of this proclamation was somewhat misunderstood, as meaning, which was far from M. Carnot's intention, that in all cases an uneducated was better than an educated representative. This, however, he never stated; but, on the contrary, appealed to the teachers in the public schools throughout the country to offer themselves as candidates, showing them the career that was opened to talent and learning by the Republic, and merely insisting that Republicanism was the first requisite for a seat in the Assembly. Republicanism with education, if possible—but on no account education without Republicanism. This was his meaning; and, after the first hubbub had subsided, his advice was generally acted upon. Candidates were found in sufficient numbers combining both requisites, and by which the Assembly was saved from the scandal that would most undoubtedly have resulted had men been elected with the one qualification only. As these proclamations were much discussed, M. de Lamartine, in answer to an address from the Republican Club, took occasion to tranquilise the public mind upon the subject. He disavowed the interpretations which had been put upon them, and affirmed that the members of the Government who had issued them had spoken as individuals only, and that the Government itself would scrupulously refrain from any interference.

The number of operatives out of employment increased at such a rapid and alarming rate, that they were expected to amount at the close of the month to 75,000. It was impossible for the Government to provide funds to pay such a force, as the expense at 1f. 50c. would amount to 112,500f. (£4500) a day, or 3,375,000f. (£135,000) per month. Even Louis Blanc himself admitted that it would be impossible for the Government to continue such an outlay, unless the labour performed should become really useful and productive. It began to be seen that the "social" Revolution was not quite possible. The "political" Revolution was evident enough. The premonitory symptoms of the inevitable struggle began to alarm all classes.

COMMUNIST DEMONSTRATION.

On Sunday, the 16th of April, the first outbreak occurred. The "new" principle of Communism, had begun to despair of the men at the head of the Revolution; had begun to mistrust more vehemently than ever the bourgeoisie the middle and upper classes throughout France, and all the adherents of the "old" principle of Republicanism. On Saturday the various Communist clubs, whose organisation was complete and extensive, gave the word of order to the working classes for a grand demonstration upon the following day. Accordingly, from an early hour in the morning, groups of workmen assembled in the Champ de Mars, where it had been fixed that the elections of the Captains of the Staff of the National Guard, destined to represent the Captains of the Battalions of the National Guard, destined to represent the workmen, were to be held. These elections passed off quietly enough; but it soon became known that the party of Blanqui, the Communist, and other men of extreme opinions, were anxious to induce the workmen to make a demonstration in their favour. This caused the greatest alarm among the middle classes, and it led to the most extravagant reports; it being said, among other things, that an attempt was about to be made to overthrow the Provisional Government, that the Communists intended to make a general pillage throughout the city, &c. Though these reports were not believed by reasonable people, it was deemed prudent that the National Guard should be called out. Accordingly, the rappel was beaten in every quarter; and, in a few minutes after, shops were closed, and the National Guard might be seen, some in uniform, some not, hurrying to the different places of rendezvous of their respective companies. For some time the town presented the appearance of the memorable day of the 24th of February: houses were closed, women and children stood at the doors in anxious discussion, armed men hurried to and fro, anxiety depicted on every countenance; but there was one great difference between that day and that of the Revolution—there were no barricades.

Meanwhile the crowd on the Champ de Mars continued to increase, and it soon amounted, according to most calculations, to one hundred thousand men, whilst the multitude looking on was nearly as great. After the workmen of the different trades had elected their respective officers, they made a collection among themselves, which they destined as a patriotic gift to the Government. This done, they set out in procession to the Hôtel de Ville. Whether all that were assembled in the Champ de Mars went up to the Hôtel is not known; but the number that did so was immense. The different trades bore banners on which were inscriptions, "Organisation of Labour by Association," and others of a like kind. The men proceeded with the greatest order: there was no shouting—no singing.

All the afternoon the National Guards and the Garde Mobile were under arms, and occupied all the principal places—the Place de la Bourse, the Place du Carrousel, the Place de la Concorde, &c. Patrols of them also traversed the streets.

The manner in which the National Guard acted excited unbounded admiration among the middle and respectable classes of society, and struck the Communist parties with dismay. The demonstration of the National Guard also greatly strengthened the moderate section of the Provisional Government. This section, though forming the majority, was continually kept in check by the dread of the immense physical power which it was supposed that the minority—Ledru Rollin, Flocon, Albert, and Louis Blanc—had at their command; but this demonstration proved that the real physical power of Paris, consisting of the National Guard, the Garde Nationale Mobile, and other forces, were not only in favour of the moderate party, but ready and even anxious to crush their enemies, who were also the enemies of law and order. To the National and Mobile Guards the moderate section of the Government could have added from 20,000 to 30,000 regular troops, who were stationed within easy reach of Paris.

The demonstration of the Communists,—the enmity between the friends of the merely political and those of the social revolution, were not, however, at an end.

On Tuesday morning, the 18th, at six o'clock, the rappel for the assembling of the National Guards was beaten in all quarters of Paris. This summons was the consequence of information brought to the Government that the Communists and most violent of the clubs had determined on another attempt to upset the Provisional Government, and to establish "a committee of public safety," and that they intended to attack the Hôtel de Ville. During the night a great number of the Communists assembled in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel de Ville and the Tuileries, uttering seditious cries and threats against the moderate members of the Provisional Government.

THE FESTIVAL OF FRATERNITY.

The intentions of the "people" being made somewhat clear by these events; and the danger to society being somewhat more manifest than before, the Government became anxious to discover whether it could with safety resort to a step so bold as the re-introduction of the troops of the line to Paris. The National Guard was worn out and harassed, and would hail the return of the troops as the greatest boon that could be offered them. But the working classes and Communists might be mistrustful. To enquiries, made both openly and secretly by the commissaries or employés of the Government, a satisfactory reply was obtained, and it was at length decided that the troops should be recalled. It was not wise, however, to allow the real secret of their recall to be promulgated; and a scheme was adopted to throw the people off their guard, and flatter their national and proverbial love of grand spectacles, by one which should cast into the shade by its magnificence all the previous spectacles of the Revolution. The Grand Festival of FRATERNITY was devised, and passed off in the most brilliant manner. As early as five o'clock on the morning of the 20th of April the drums were beat for the assembling of the different legions of the National Guards; by eight, all Paris seemed to have poured down into the street. The day was dull, drizzly, and dreary, with gray dripping skies above, and an ocean of mud below; but the ardour neither of the actors in the mighty show, nor of the crowds of spectators, was to be damped. The countless throngs that poured along the Champs Elysées to the chief point of interest bewildered the imagination. The immense estrade erected beneath and before the Arch of Triumph, with its ascending galleries and tribunes, and decorations of Roman and Grecian attributes, was not without a certain grandeur of effect. Upon this estrade were assembled in the course of the day the generals, the courts, and the tribunals, the wounded of the days of February, a variety of délégués politiques, delegates from the clubs, the commissions and associations of the working classes, and, finally, from the clubs. On either side, and in the climbing galleries behind, was a crowd of privileged spectators and ladies, admitted by tickets.

The ceremonies were announced to commence at nine o'clock; at eight already the tribunes had been filled, but it was nearly half-past ten before the main body of the members of the Provisional Government made their appearance: until that hour, excepting M. Crémieux, M. Ledru Rollin had alone appeared upon the estrade. Spite of the falling rain and the bared heads, the crowd, although it pushed and waved hither and thither, was a good-tempered one. When the other members of the Government were at last assembled, the ceremonies of the day began forthwith. Lamartine looked, as he stood at one of the further extremities of the line, pale, wearied, and careworn, but erect and noble as ever. M. Dupont de l'Eure seemed sadly bowed down by the weight of his obligations as well as his years. An address to the armed force was read by Arago, as Minister at War. Then came the distribution of the banners to the colonels of the different legions and regiments, as they mounted one after the other the steps of the estrade. As each colonel advanced to receive the colours, he was addressed in a short speech by a member of the Government, who then saluted him with an embrace and presented him with the banner intended for his regiment.

About eleven o'clock began the revue manière. Nothing could be more really imposing than the immense flood of bayonets as it poured up the long avenue of the Champs Elysées, and mounted, like an inundating torrent, towards the Arch of Triumph. The different troops were mixed in the order of their approach—now it was a legion of the Garde Mobile, now a regiment of the line, now a legion of the National Guards, now the schools, now the artisans, now cavalry, now infantry. The flood poured on, and on, and on, until the brain was distracted with the sight. Once or twice a regiment of the line and a legion of the Garde Mobile had joined, and came up together, side by side, like two distinct streams flowing side by side amidst cries of "Vive la Ligne!" "Vive la Garde Mobile!" and "Vive la Garde Nationale!" Of the streams flowing side by side, the poor Gardes Mobiles, with their ragged attire, formed the muddy one by the side of the more brightly-coloured uniforms; but there was a martial spirit and a discipline in the former among these volunteers, who are chiefly from the dregs of the people, that showed how easily the French can adapt themselves to acting new parts. The effect of the ever-advancing battalions was frequently curious enough; some had placed green branches in their caps, others had, like Birnam wood; others had nosegays and branches of lilac in theirs, and looked like moving flower-beds; others, again, had attached to their bayonets small tricoloured banners, that fluttered along like a flight of summer flies. The less agreeable part of the effect arose from the discordant howlings and screamings of large masses of men. One concordant howlings and screamings of large masses of men. One concordant howlings and screamings of large masses of men. One conc and arrange a tabouret, or footstool, on which to raise himself high enough to be seen. The voice that came from this small form was firm, clear, and loud; and he, instead of reading, delivered an extempore oration in favour of his Organisation du Travail, to which he said the Government stood committed by its promises to the people assembled before the Hôtel de Ville the day after the Revolution. The Assembly received his oration with a coldness which augured ill.

M. Carnot, the Minister of Public Instruction, was afterwards heard; and was succeeded by

M. Bethmont, the Minister of Commerce, deposited on the table the exposé of the state of his department.

M. Garnier-Pagès, Minister of Finance, concluded his report on the financial condition of the country.

M. Arago, the Minister of War and Marine, and M. Marie, the Minister of Public Works, next presented the situation of their departments; and were succeeded by M. Lamartine, Minister for Foreign Affairs, who took a short review of the aspect of affairs throughout Europe. The general tone of his remarks was pacific, and in accordance with the principles of his address some time before to the diplomatic agents of France.

In the course of the sitting, a note from Béranger, the poet, resigning his seat for Paris, was read; but the Assembly unanimously refused to accept the resignation.

A stormy discussion then arose on the motion of M. Dornès, offering the thanks of the Assembly to the Provisional Government for their conduct in the administration of affairs, and nominating a committee of five to act as a Government ad interim, until the permanent Government of the country had been constituted. Subsequently, after fearful uproar, the motion was modified by the withdrawal of the latter part of it, and the Assembly voted that the Provisional Government had deserved well of the country. The vote was almost unanimous, M. Barbès, M. Durrieu, and another rising alone against it.

On Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, M. Buchez, the President, took the chair.

Some apprehensions were entertained that the result of this sitting would occasion disturbances. The workmen met in several quarters of Paris, and in the Wood of Boulogne, and were understood to have declared that if M. Ledru Rollin was excluded from the Government, they would take arms. Extraordinary precautions had accordingly been adopted around the hall. A large force was stationed in the adjoining garden, and invitations had been sent to the National Guards to hold themselves in readiness to march at the first signal.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

On the following Wednesday, the appointment of an Executive Committee, in lieu of the Provisional Government, was announced. The result of the ballot was—

Those five members having obtained the required majority, were proclaimed members of the Executive Committee. M. Louis Blanc, M. Albert, and M. Flocon were entirely excluded — a fact which the "people" and the "Communists" cherished in vindictive remembrance. M. Ledru Rollin, whose violence had alarmed the majority, though not excluded, was at the bottom of the list; and M. de Lamartine, who had lent his high name and great popularity to support M. Ledru Rollin, was placed next lowest — all of them being most significant facts to show the spirit of the Assembly, and the probable policy to be hereafter expected from it.

DISTURBANCES AT ROUEN.

While these scenes had been taking place at Paris, the working classes in Rouen, Elbœuf, and other manufacturing towns, alarmed that the Revolution would not take up the questions of Socialism and Communism, and decree that impossibility, labour and food to every man — whether idle or industrious, skilled or unskilled — had been in considerable agitation. In consequence of a report in Rouen, that M. Deschamps, the Communist candidate, would not poll the number of votes necessary to secure his election, groups of workmen were formed, who cried, "Down with the National Assembly!" and "Down with the aristocrats!" They were, however, dispersed by the dragoons. The night passed over without further violence, but the disorder was next day renewed, and assumed a very serious character. Several skirmishes took place between the armed force and the people, who threw up barricades. After nightfall the rioters became emboldened, and attacked the National Guard and troops with volleys of stones. The troops at length fired upon the rioters and charged them. Ten or twelve persons were killed. Ultimately the rioters fled. On Friday the riots were renewed, and more blood shed, but the soldiery having been reinforced by the Garde Mobile of Paris, order was at length restored on Saturday morning. There were twenty-two lives sacrificed in these conflicts. At Elbœuf, near Rouen, some of the discomfited rioters of the latter place raised the standard of revolt, but they were quickly put down by the troops and the National Guards. In some other localities of the departments, also, as, for instance, at Limoges, Nismes, Rochfort, &c., the partizans of M. Ledru Rollin and the ultras displayed great violence, which led to breaches of the peace. The cry raised by those incendiaries was that the tendency of things was réactionnaire in the new Republic. The ultra clubs and communist journals of Paris laboured hard during the week to turn the occurrences at Rouen to the advantage of their views and party, and succeeded but too well in their attempt.

The nomination of the executive committee took place upon the Wednesday. Upon the Monday following, the long-dreaded collision of the new or socialist Republicans was made against the Moderates.

THE COMMUNIST INSURRECTION -ATTACK UPON THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

On Monday, the 15th of May, Paris was the scene of another revolutionary scene, no' so momentous or prolonged a one as that on the 24th February, but sufficient to show the insecure and dangerous nature of the ground on which the Republic was erected. The pretext for this outburst was a manifestation in favour of the Poles. The clubs had matured their plans of insurrection; the ultra-democratic portion of the Government had connived at them; and on the last-mentioned date the National Assembly was surrounded and entered by thousands of the population, led by Barbès, Blanqui, Hubert, and others, who drove the Deputies from their seats, and, amid a scene of indescribable tumult, assumed the functions of Government. General Courtais, Commander of the National Guard, had treasonably opened the gates of the Assembly to the mob, and the Prefect of Police, M. Caussedière, was supposed to be another of the conspirators. Louis Blanc was also implicated in the conspiracy, and thus organised and supported, the insurrection manifested itself. Having forced their way into the National Assembly, the conspirators were not slow to announce their objects and intentions. With a drawn sword in his hand, Barbès addressed the Assembly, and proclaimed that a contribution of a thousand millions of francs should be levied on the rich for the benefit of the poor — that a tax of another thousand millions should be paid by the rich for the aid of Ireland — that another thousand millions should be disposed of in the aid of Poland — that the National Assembly should be dissolved, and an Executive Government, composed of Barbès, Albert, Louis Blanc, Flocon, Banqui, Raspail, and Cabet, be immediately appointed. He concluded this proposals by demanding the re-establishment of the guillotine! The members of the Assembly withdrew, leaving the hall in possession of the mob

As soon as the fact of the crime committed against the National Assembly was known in Paris, about four o'clock, the rappel was beaten in all the legions. The National Guard immediately assembled with admirable ardour, to cries of "Vive l'Assemblée Nationale!" The 1st and 3rd legions were towards the National Assembly to protect it. Several representatives joined their ranks, asking for arms. The other legions, au grand complet, detachments of the Garde Mobile, detachments of infantry and cavalry, and a battery of artillery, went to the Hôtel de Ville, to possess themselves of the two or three Provisional Governments who had installed themselves therein. M. de Lamartine and M. Ledru Rollin were on horseback, side by side, in the ranks of the 2nd legion. Everywhere on their passage they were received with acclamation, and by the cry of "Vive l'Assemblée Nationale!" On arriving at the Hôtel de Ville, they entered it without resistance. They found about a hundred individuals assembled, the greatest number of whom were arrested, the rest escaping. No act of violence had to be deplored. M. de Lamartine and M. Ledru Rollin left the Hôtel de Ville at 7 o'clock (they were both on horseback), and proceeded to the National Assembly. The immense and compact crowd scarcely allowed their horses to advance; they were almost borne by thousands of arms. Unanimous cries broke out on their passage. M. de Lamartine, with his arms extended, and shaking hands with thousands, saluted, and, with tears in his eyes, addressed thanks to the multitude of devoted citizens. This demonstration accompanied him to the Palace of the National Assembly. Between six and seven o'clock the legions of the banlieue entered Paris, by all the barriers, to offer their support to the National Assembly, and their co-operation to the executive commission.

The house occupied by M. Sobrier, Rue de Rivoli, was the theatre of the most animated scenes. A considerable number of National Guards entered his residence by force, and arrested the guards whom M. Sobrier had in his service. One of them having been seized with a paper in his hand, thrust the paper into his mouth, and tried to swallow it; but being seized by the throat, he was obliged to give it up, and it turned out to be a list of conspirators.

At six o'clock Barbès was at the Hôtel de Ville, drawing up a proclamation, which was to be printed, and by which the different administrations were distributed among his friends, when two captains, and about ten National Guards of the 3rd and 6th legions, entered the salle. "Barbès! Where is Barbès? We must have him!" was their first cry. "No, no! To arms!" cried some men with red belts. "You shall march over our dead bodies ere you shall have him!" A greater number of National Guards then entered, and endeavoured to go into the salle occupied by three members of the Provisional Government. The sentinels posted by Barbès offered great resistance. A deputy-mayor of Paris then came up. There were cries of "Vive Lamartine!" Lamartine having then arrived; and he was borne in triumph in the Hôtel de Ville. M. Lamartine could only say a few words, which were received with noisy acclamations. M. Thomas, colonel of the 2nd legion, was wounded in the hand, by the breaking of the glass door of the room in which Barbès was. The 5th and 7th batteries of artillery of the National Guard, headed by their chef d'escadron, made a line in the passage leading to the place occupied by Barbès, Albert, Raspail, and others.

Shortly after seven o'clock the following was issued:—

"The Hôtel de Ville is delivered. The Provisional Government is leaving it amidst the acclamations of the people. The conspirators have been arrested. Citizen Bras Leconte, bearer of the present proclamation, is charged to read and cause it to be placarded, in all the mairies of Paris. FLOCON.

Secretary-General of the Mairie of Paris.

May 15 — Seven o'clock in the evening.

At eight o'clock the following proclamation was issued from the Hôtel de Ville:—

LIBERTY. EQUALITY. FRATERNITY.
REPUBLIQUE FRANÇAISE.

The National Assembly is not dissolved. The President, yielding to last night, declared the sitting at an end. The brave citizens of Paris are called out to maintain the respect due to the National Assembly, which was elected by universal suffrage. To attack the National Assembly, is to attack the Republic conquered by February, and proclaimed by the Assembly. ARMAND MARRAST, Representative of the People, Mayor of Paris.

Thus the fidelity of the Guards, and the firmness of the Government, averted the crisis. The plot was widely ramified, and parties high in office were implicated. The Government did not deem it prudent to proceed against all the delinquents, but most of the leading desperadoes were committed prisoners to the Castle of Vincennes, among whom were M. Barbès, a man of fortune, and highly educated; M. Raspail, a distinguished chemist; and M. Blanqui, a gentleman of ancient family, and of first-rate acquirements and talents.

THE FESTIVAL OF CONCORD.

Paris had scarcely subsided into quiet after these terrible commotions and alarms, when the inhabitants were summoned by the Government to a great National Fête of Concord, which took place on Sunday, the 21st of May. A procession was formed from the Place de la Concorde to the Champ de Mars. At the head of the procession were the members of the Provisional Government, then the representatives of the people in the National Assembly, followed by the Mayor and Municipality of Paris, wearing their tricoloured scarfs; then the delegates of the different departments from Calais to the Pyrenees, each with its appropriate banner; and the delegates of the emancipated blacks, and of the Germans, Italians, Belgians, and Irish. After the delegates came the various trade corporations, with specimens of their respective occupations, and occupying triumphal cars or other vehicles, each drawn by four horses. Then followed the wounded of February, succeeded by judges and members of the courts of law, in their robes of office. Next was the colossal statue of the Republic, surrounded by flags, and placed on a truck drawn by four horses. Then several bands of choristers, chanting the national patriotic songs and hymns. Among these bands was a bevy of five hundred young females, dressed in roses of white muslin, and wearing tricoloured ribbons on their shoulders, and wreaths of flowers on their heads. Then there were old soldiers and young soldiers, on foot and on horseback; and then the civil military schools; and cars emblematic of agriculture, and other arts, sciences, and professions; and an endless variety of gorgeous spectacles of every denomination, moving amid the sound of music, the booming of cannon, and the shouts of the populace. In the evening all Paris was brilliantly illuminated. The Champ de Mars, Champs Elysées, and the Tuileries were lighted up by half a million of coloured lamps, aided by ten thousand Chinese lanterns. The weather throughout was brilliantly clear, the al fresco restaurateur establishments crowded with hungry and thirsty customers. The most perfect order was everywhere observed, and no accident occurred to disturb the general festivity outwardly. It was calculated that 1,200,000 persons participated in the fête, and that more than ten millions of francs were distributed among the small venders of refreshments. Even the lighting up was estimated at a cost of upwards of two hundred thousand francs. Such are the financial statistics of a Parisian fête; but who can count the loss of labour?

But the outward festivity was the mere delusion of a dream—

> For grief was heavy at the heart, tho' tears were not (allow'd) to flow.

There was an almost total absence of that light laughing gaiety which generally gave such a charm to Parisian rejoicings. There was a gloom and a feeling that the fête was ill-timed, coming so soon—only six day—after the attempted revolution of the 15th of May, and at a time when many of the people's leaders and of those they think their friends were pining in prison. All was hollow and unreal in the outward manifestation of hilarity. The fête was regarded as an inauguration of better days, and to prevent the utter extinction of hope in the people.

Immediately after the Fête de la Concorde, the National Assembly resumed its labours of legislation and oratory. There was no want of either. On the 22nd of May, the Orleans Family Banishment Bill, which had been referred to a committee, and unanimously approved of by them, was brought up. Letters of protest were read from the Duke d'Aumale, Prince de Joinville, and the Duke de Nemours (denominated in the proceedings as François, Henry, and Louis d'Orléans) against the decree of banishment. A declaration was unanimously adopted by the Assembly, as an instruction to the Executive Government, to this effect:—"A fraternal compact with Germany; the reconstruction of an independent and free Poland; and the emancipation of Italy."

THE NAPOLEONIST EMEUTE.

The Fête of Concord, brilliant as it was, deceived but few into the belief that concord really existed, or that the Communist faction would not make another attempt in due time, somewhat better considered than that which failed on the 15th of May. By the month of May the chief leaders of the party were safely lodged in the dungeons of Vincennes. Albert, Barbès, Blanqui, Raspail, and Sobrier were there, and Louis Blanc had a narrow escape of being sent to join them. But still there were vigorous and zealous men at large in uncontrolled possession of the popular ear, and but too anxious to foment, and profit by, a new insurrection.

On the 24th of May decrees were signed by the Executive Commission dissolving the clubs of which Barbès and Blanqui were presidents.

An unusual display of military precaution was manifested around the Chamber. The entire line of the quays on the south bank, adjoining the Chamber, was occupied by bodies of troops (horse and foot). The quays on the opposite side, extending from the bridge in either direction, were occupied by battalions of the Garde Mobile. The precincts of the legislative palace literally swarmed with soldiers, consisting of infantry of the line, cavalry, and artillery. Artillery-men stood ready mounted on the horses harnessed to the ammunition-waggons in the court. Every room, hall, and passage in the palace, except the hall of the Chamber itself and the committee-rooms, were crammed with soldiers. These important preparations were taken on account of the debate appointed for Italy and Poland, the topics which had served as a pretext for the outrage of the 15th.

The reports which were circulated of another popular manifestation determined the President of the Assembly to transfer to General Cavaignac, the Minister of War, the full command of all the troops, as well within as without the palace of the Assembly.

For the whole week Paris continued in a state of alarm. It was found absolutely necessary, from the condition of the public finances, to put a stop to employing labourers at the public expense, and the measures necessary to that end, alarmed the workmen, and excited them against the government. To abolish at once the atelier s nationaux was thought impossible and inhuman; but all parties proclaimed the necessity of stopping the evil.

The Minister of Public Works published a proclamation, in which a distinctly stated that the government was occupied in preparing for the reorganization of the ateliers nationaux. It appeared that errors alike injurious to the state and to real labourers had been committed in the midst of the precipitation with which the first enrolments were made It resulted that men who had private resources had been admitted to the benefit of the inscription, and others had inscribed themselves several times under false names, and had thus been paid several times over. The place due to deserving workmen was thus filled without right, and frequently by fraudulent means.

In fact, every sort of roguery was attempted, and often but too successfully. M. Emile Thomas, a young man, the Chief Director of the National Workshops, was arrested by the government, under circumstances even yet enveloped in much mystery. He was sent away under an escort of the police to Bordeaux, none said on a criminal charge, but on a mission of urgent importance; while he himself, in a letter to his mother, afterwards published in the journals, asserted that he had been forcibly carried away, and that he knew not the crime alleged against him. This circumstance created much ill-will among the workmen. At an early hour of Monday, the 22nd, the rappel was beaten in five or six arrondissements, and great numbers of the National Guard immediately turned out in arms. By eight o'clock several thousand of them were assembled at the different rendezvous. They were then marched to the National Assembly, the Garden of the Tuileries, the Luxembourg, the Hôtel de Ville, and other places. The different ministries were also strongly guarded. At the National Assembly the force was immense, not only of National Guards, but of troops of the Line. The quays, the Pont de la Concorde, and, in fact, all the approaches to the Assembly, were strongly guarded. The occasion of this overwhelming display of bayonets, was a dread that the men of the ateliers nationaux, irritated at the manner in which M. Emile Thomas, their director, had been treated, intended to make a threatening demonstration against the Assembly and the Executive Government. Groups of them, some consisting of several hundreds, assembled during the day in different parts of the town, especially on the Boulevards, near the Porte St. Martin and the Porte St. Denis.

Affairs continued in this unsatisfactory state for many days, when the election of Prince Louis Napoleon, as representative of Paris, for one of the vacancies caused by the double returns of the original elections, led to a demonstration of a more serious kind. Unsupported by the press, and personally almost unknown to the people, his name sufficed to procure his return, although it was said at the time that money was not wanting to bring about the result. This, however, is not probable. His popularity, so far as street-shouting may be an evidence of it, was great, and he was not only elected for Paris, but simultaneously for three departments, wherein vacancies had also occurred in consequence of double returns. On the following Sunday—always a great day in Paris for political excitement—the name of the Prince was to be heard in all the assemblies of holiday people of the lower class who spend the Sundays and fête days in the cabarets outside the barriers of Paris.

On Monday morning, a new journal, Le Napoléonien, appeared. It was, as its title indicated, the advocate of the Prince, and its first number displayed ability. Crowds collected in the quarters leading to the National Assembly; the générale and the rappel were beaten, troops and National Guards were called out, and all the excitement and commotion of a Paris mob were brought into full development, and all because Prince Louis Napoleon Buonaparte was expected to take his seat in the National Assembly. So early as twelve o'clock, crowds began to form in the vicinity of the Palace of the Assembly. The fear of the law against attroupements prevented their remaining long on the same spot; but they did not assemble the object of their curiosity. Some came simply to see and to applaud the new hero of their caprice, for it was reported that he would be at hand to enter the Chamber the moment that his election was recognised. It was in vain that persons professing to be friends of the Prince told them that he would not be there till the day that his uncle Jerome ex-King of Westphalia, had a letter from him, dated Saturday, stating that he would not be in Paris before Tuesday—the people would remain "off and on" to catch a glimpse of him.

During the day a placard appeared, bearing an address of General Piat, Colonel of the Fourth Legion of National Guards of the banlieue (he who had taken possession of the Hôtel de Ville on the 24th February), in which he, as an avowed friend of Prince Louis Napoleon, declared for him any ambitious project. Other friends of the Prince, in the country, were not, however, equally discreet. They carried their ballot in front of their hats, on which was inscribed, in large characters, "Louis Napoleon! Vive l'Empereur! A bas la République!"

About five o'clock in the evening, the Government ordered strong measures against the crowds assembled in the Place de la Révolution. Regiments of infantry and cavalry, and large bodies of National Guards (sédentaires and mobiles), immediately crossed the bridge in front of the Palace of the Assembly, and forming a junction with those already on the Place, cleared it at the point of the bayonet of the immense assemblage that had occupied it. The measure was so peremptorily and so rapidly executed, that the Place (the largest in Europe) was swept clean in five minutes. Complaints were made of unnecessary violence on the part of the armed force in carrying out this order of the Government, conveyed through the Minister of War, under whose eye the service was performed; but, as matters had come to something like a crisis, no hesitation was allowed when the command "Withdraw" was issued.

Having cleared the Place, a column of at least 3000 Gardes Mobiles wheeled round to the Rue Royale, and moved rapidly ahead. The order was given to march. The drums beat a charge, and the column moved at double quick time along the Rue de Rivoli, and through the Rues Castiglione and La Paix. Having reached the Boulevard, they proceeded in the same order and at the same pace to the Hotel of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and there halted. In the meanwhile, the dragoons advanced from the Place de la Révolution, by the Rue Royale, driving the people before them, who did not comply silently, for cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" "Vive Louis Napoleon!" were uttered by them vigorously. The Boulevard cleared, the dragoons remained in position. The whole of the Rue Royale was filled with National Guards. Access to the Place de la Révolution was refused to everybody. This continued for an hour or two; ultimately, the people retired, after meeting their dispersion in shouting. Later in the evening, other assemblages that took place were dispersed without much trouble. In the Assembly itself the greatest excitement prevailed.

M. de Lamartine took advantage of the panic—asserted that shots had been fired—that blood had been shed—and proposed that the laws of 1816 and 1832, forbidding the entry of the Buonaparte family into France, should be enforced against the pretender. The motion was received amid deafening shouts of "Vive la République!"

It was afterwards made tolerably clear that there was in reality no Buonapartist insurrection at all; that the Executive Committee, feeling its own weakness, took advantage of the election of M. Louis Napoleon, and of a few stray cries by a portion of the capricious and insensate mob in his favour, to make this show of strength, and thus endeavour to re-establish its position in the Assembly—a position which its own dissensions, vacillations, and incompetency had been daily impairing since its first establishment.

We have thus traced the principal events of the Revolution, and have arrived at that tremendous struggle, which began on the 24th of June, between the rival parties who from the first undertook to govern it. Notwithstanding the absence of any result from the Buonapartist manifestation, it was evident to the French themselves, as well as to foreigners, and indeed to all who took an interest in the affairs of the Republic, that these parties—the moderate Republicans and the Communists—were the real belligerents, and that, sooner or later, a desperate struggle would arise between them. Our journal of last week contained full particulars of the awful civil war of the "red republicans," which lasted four days, and cost from 10,000 to 20,000 people their lives. We this week continue the unhappy record in another part of our paper. We can scarcely hope that even yet the fearful struggle is at an end. The Communists, it should be remembered, are the men who, throughout the reign of Louis Philippe, maintained at enormous disadvantage, and in the face of difficulty and peril, the principles of Republicanism. It was they who made the Revolution of 1848. They cling to their principles with the zealous fervour of religious enthusiasm. To them, their politics are a gospel. They look upon themselves as the regenerators of humanity. They may lack sense; but they are brimful of their conviction. It nerves their arms and inspires their hearts. They are coerced at present. They have made a great attempt, and they have failed; but, from all we know of themselves as individuals, and from all that history teaches us of the strength of a principle, believed by earnest men to be true although it may be false, we may be certain that, though defeated, they are not extinguished, and that again and again they will make themselves heard. It cannot be denied that the question of Labour is a great and urgent one, in the circumstances of every country in Europe. Let us pray that the wisdom of the age may be directed towards it, and that a solution less sanguinary may be found for it than the events of Paris might lead us to anticipate.

RACHEL AND THE "MARSEILLAISE."

One of the most striking episodes of the early part of the Revolution was the first performance of Ponsard's tragedy of "Lucrèce" at the Théâtre de la République, formerly the Théâtre Français. The subject of the piece—the fall of the Tarquins and the revolution of Rome—naturally gave the representation a peculiar interest, and, accordingly, the theatre was crammed with an audience ready to manifest their feelings at all passages bearing upon passing events. The whole aspect of the salle, indeed, presented a pregnant commentary upon the stirring times. The box of the ex-Royal family, being now thrown open to location, like any other part of the theatre, was tenanted by a quiet bourgeoise, nowise remarkable in appearance, yet who, from their occupying that place, so lately the "cynosure of neighbouring eyes," were a point of observation for all the knuckles of the assembly during the night. But far more special objects of attention occupied the box immediately opposite, formerly appertaining to the department of the Interior, and still retained by the new Government. There sat Messrs. Ledru Rollin, Crémieux, Marrast, Pagnerre, Albert, Flocon, and other gentlemen not visible from the front; in fine, with a few exceptions, the whole of the Provisional Government. At particular passages of the play, having a bearing upon politics, a thousand eyes were turned towards them, and none were louder in their applause of those parts which told in favour of a Republic. One passage in a speech of Brutus was particularly applauded, in which he says, "It is easier to destroy than to restore." This line was vehemently cheered and encored by the audience, and every eye was turned towards the Government loge. M. Ledru Rollin looked at M. Crémieux and smiled, the whole party joining in the tumult of applause. As a mark of the good taste as well as good feeling of the spectators, it was observed that several passages which might have been applied by a less generous assembly as bearing against the ex-King and his family, passed without eliciting the least approbation, though the enthusiasm in favour of a Republic was most ardently expressed on every occasion that offered. It was not, however, until the close of the tragedy, when Mdlle. Rachel, who had performed Lucrèce, appeared to sing the "Marseillaise," that the excited temperament of the public was raised to its highest pitch. Her singing—or rather her acting—of this national hymn was on this occasion sublime. Her chant was solemn and inspired as a sibylline priestess; and as she knelt and pressed the tricoloured flag to her heart, the entire theatre broke out into a long loud, and enthusiastic burst of transport. The actress was recalled at the close of the last strophe, and the entire body of the auditory stood up to receive her, and to renew their thanks. Among the most fervent of her applauders were the members of the Government. It was said that M. Ledru Rollin imagined this scene; and that it was by his solicitations that Mdlle. Rachel—a still more ardent and enthusiastic republican than himself, if such were possible—undertook to rouse, by this hymn, the zeal and ardour of the more educated classes of French society. Her manner of rendering it was grand, but it was the grandeur of hatred and revenge, not of patriotism. She seemed to be not the genius of Liberty, but the sanguinary Nemesis; not the utterer of a hymn of liberty, but of an awful, abominable, and yet beautiful chant of vengeance and execration. It produced its effect, however. Its power and genius were unquestionable, and long haunted the memory of those who heard it.

THE REVOLUTIONS OF ITALY.

AMONGST Italians the enfranchisement of Italy is no new idea. Five hundred years ago it awakened the eloquence of Rienzi and the poetry of Petrarch. "The deliverance of his country," says Gibbon, "inspired Rienzi with the vast, and perhaps visionary, idea of uniting Italy in a great Federative Republic, of which Rome should be the ancient and lawful head, and the free cities and Princes the members and associates. Could passion have listened to reason, could private interest have yielded to the public welfare, the supreme tribunal and confederate union of the Italian Republic might have healed their intestine discord, and closed the Alps against the barbarians of the North." Rienzi's celebrated citation of Louis, Duke of Bavaria; Charles, King of Bohemia; and all the Electors of Germany, to prove at Rome their right to the empire of Italy, was the first assertion of the claim of ITALY FOR THE ITALIANS. Even then, amidst the darkness of ignorance and the rapacious rule of factions, the justice of the claim was felt. The idea ennobled for a time the whole people. There was too much corruption, envy, and dissension amongst the powerful few, and too much debasement and ignorance amongst the many, to realise the idea, but it never quite died out Through all the darkness that followed Rienzi's glorious vision of Italy emancipated and united, there were found some to keep alive the theme, though at any time in those 500 years the emancipation, and, above all, the union of Italy, seemed impossible. There were too many opposing foreign and home forces to be overcome—too many hostile interests to be reconciled, and, in short, the difficulties were so complicated that the idea of Italy for the Italians seemed the wildest dream of enthusiasm. It had to be learned that all the hostile interests were in opposition to common sense and common justice—a mere tangled net in which the people were caught, crippled, and plundered.

Of all Italy, the case of Rome and the States of the Church seemed most hopeless. The Roman system placed the entire powers of the State in the hands of the hierarchy. Every Minister was a Cardinal, and all the offices were filled by priests; justice was perverted; everything was weak, venal, and corrupt. Rome was leagued with Austria: Austria governed better, but kept Rome in its condition of debasement; and both prevented any advance toward liberty in the nominally independent states. Yet in Rome the liberties of Italy were first acknowledged. PIUS THE NINTH accomplished the first of the Italian Revolutions, and gave the impulse from which all the rest have sprung!

Austria would take no reform from Pius IX. He thought more of the Italians than of Metternich or Ferdinand, to whom Italy was a "geographical expression," and the Italians a nonentity. An attempt was made to overawe the Pope, and stop the progress of his reforms. The treaty of Vienna conceited the maintenance of an Austrian garrison in Ferrara, in the Papal dominions. Scarce had the new constitution been proclaimed, when Austria marched reinforcements thither, with the most unmistakable indications of hostility to the Pope. Within a few weeks—though there was no outbreak, no violence, no open display of force—the whole aspect of Italy was so changed, that the Papal Nuncio at Vienna was enabled, in the name not merely of the Papal States, but of all Italy, to demand the withdrawal of the troops; and even Austria was compelled to bow before the resolution of Italy against all foreign interference. The Austrian troops were marched from Ferrara on the 23d of December, and thus, for the first time, the Italians (united) triumphed, and the right of all the states of Italy not under Austria to choose their own forms of government, was established.

The constitutional reform of the Papal States was followed by the publication of a convention between the Pope, the Grand Duke of Tuscany and Lucca, and the King of Sardinia, founded on the scheme first proposed about six years since by Cæsar Balbo, in his work on the hopes of Italy, and setting forth "that these states, animated by the desire to contribute by union to the increase of the dignity and prosperity of Italy, and being persuaded that the true and essential basis of the union of Italy consists in the fusion of the material interests of the population of their respective dominions, have agreed to form an association on the principle of the German Commercial League,' the tariff to be drawn up with the utmost amount of commercial freedom compatible with the respective interests of the contracting powers—following, in short, the example of England rather than of the Zollverein. The news of this convention was received throughout Italy with enthusiasm. It also was a revolution, a return to the liberal system of trade policy of Italy, and it brought with it hopes of the restoration of commerce, and the revival of trade and industry.

Throughout Austrian Italy, the impulse was felt; it made the trade-repression rule of the foreign power more irksome. Italy for the Italians then came to mean liberty to the country—freedom to the trade of Italy. Austria sought to crush this spreading commercial spirit, and thought only of strengthening the army in Italy, and keeping down the people.

At the close of last year the Austrian Cabinet resolved to reinforce the army in Italy, so as to have 40,000 men at command without lessening the strength of the several garrisons. The measure was notified to the great powers as being intended solely for the better security of the Austrian possessions in Italy.

In the face of this increase of armed force, the spirit of resistance to Austrian misrule began to show itself in Lombardy. On the 19th of December, M. Nazari, deputy of the city of Bergamo, in the central congregation of the kingdom, moved a resolution that a committee be appointed to lay before the Emperor of Austria a project of reform for the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. The motion was founded on the universal discontent of the country. It was opposed by the Governor of Milan, President of the congregation, who declared that the Viceroy himself was engaged in preparing a project of reform; nevertheless the resolution was passed unanimously by the Assembly; the committee was appointed, and the inhabitants of Milan crowded to the residence of Nazari to inscribe their names as an expression of approbation and respect.

The committee consisted of deputies from Como, Milan, Cremona, Lodi, Brescia, Bergamo, Mantua. But neither in answer to the committee, nor as the invention of the viceroy, was any reform promulgated or even promised; instead troops continued to arrive; and the directors of the imperial iron foundry at Mariazelle, in Austria, announced publicly that for six months they could not execute any private orders, as night and day the entire of the works would be employed in casting cannons and millions of projectiles.

Whilst this force against reform was in full preparation, an anonymous notice was circulated amongst all classes in Milan, urging a total abstinence from tobacco and snuff, to cripple the finances, as the most effectual mode of obtaining reform from the Austrian Government, which derives a very large revenue from these monopolies. The plan was adopted universally; and for some weeks the people were allowed undisturbed to pursue their self-denying course of peaceful passive resistance.

On the 2nd of Jan. an Austrian captain and an American appeared on the Corso smoking. The captain received a blow on the cheek, and the American had the cigar knocked out of his mouth. At midnight of the same day many thousands of cigars were sent to the barracks, with an order to the soldiers to smoke them in the town next day, and if they were interfered with to use their arms. In obedience to the order, which there can be no doubt was given with the express intention of provoking a collision, the soldiers sallied through the town in smoking parties of from 100 to 200, jeering the people, who for a time endured the insult patiently, but at length hissed the soldiers, who, half-drunk, used their arms. The contest lasted from six in the evening until midnight; several were killed; 150 wounded were taken to the hospitals, and a large number to their own homes. The people, exasperated, armed themselves, and agreed not only to discontinue the use of tobacco, but not to put into the lottery, which would be a further heavy loss to the revenue.

At Pavia the university was provisionally closed; a fight took place between the students and Austrians; six or seven persons were killed, and thirty wounded.

At Turin, on the 14th, a grand funeral service was celebrated in the church of La Gran Madre de Dio, in commemoration of the patriots murdered at Milan and Pavia. The rector of the church, all the inhabitants, all dressed in deep mourning, assisted at the ceremony. A similar funeral ceremony was celebrated in the church of the Lombards at Rome, the Pope permitting the demonstration which the Austrian Ambassador had had vainly endeavoured to prevent. The young men belonging to the Lombardo-Venetian Guard, instituted in 1838, at the coronation of the Emperor at Milan, all tendered their resignations; the theatres were deserted, and the expression of hatred to Austria, and condemnation of the conduct of the police, military, and Government, were universal.

At Venice, notwithstanding the prohibition of the police, ladies made a collection for the wounded of Milan, and 8000 francs were forwarded, with a letter of sympathy from the Venetians. The Mayor of Vincenzia forwarded 2000 francs from the inhabitants. At Verona, 1600 francs were subscribed in eight hours, when the subscription was stopped by the police. There was no mistaking the evidences that the Austrian rule in Italy must either keep pace with the progress of reforms at Rome—agree to an Italian commercial league, a free press, a representative Government, and independent municipal institutions—or must be annihilated; or maintain the old system of tyranny by force and fraud, and at the last cost of the blood of the people. It was equally clear that Austria would cling to the old abuses and the old principle of crushing the popular spirit, the attempt was to be made again to erect the palisades to empale men and demonstrators, to be met by armed arrests and conspiracies. Once more the news from Milan orders were despatched from Vienna, and announced by the arrest of the Marquis Rosales, President of the Municipal Council, Count Casati Battaglia, the young Marquis Sanvitale Stampa; the Marquis Filippo Villani, Count Pertusati, and Count Ercole Durini. Count Castiglioni, author of a Universal History, and Count Arrivabene have also been arrested, but escaped. In addition to these, the houses were then distinguished, upon which doors and windows were ordered to be nailed up, amongst and most noticed were those of the Princess Belgiojoso, the Duke of Litta, and the Germanophile, Count Giulini. Count Arrivabene, with other Italians, were transported to Libreria and Mantua to work as galley slaves. Fresh troops were quartered in Milan, 10,000 in Verona; and the Regiment of Gradisca, of disgraceful notoriety in the massacre of Galicia, was quartered at Pavia.

The Emperor wrote to the Archduke Rainer, Viceroy of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom:—"I have duly examined the events which occurred at Milan on the 2nd and 3rd instant. It is evident to me that a faction desirous to destroy public order and tranquillity exists in the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. All that you deemed necessary to satisfy the wants and wishes of the different provinces, I have already done for the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. I am not disposed to grant further concessions. Your Highness will make known my sentiments to the public. The attitude of the majority of the population of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, however, induces a hope that similar distressing scenes shall not again occur. At all events, I rely on the loyalty and courage of my troops." (Signed Ferdinand I.)

This letter, of itself sufficient to rouse whatever of independent spirit the might be in Italy, and unite it for the expulsion of Austria, was interpreted by General Radetzsky in an order of the day issued to the troops under his command, in terms the most outrageous and offensive.

The letters of the Emperor and his general had some effect. On the 21st of June three hundred of the most respectable inhabitants of Milan applied to the police for their passports; every body dreaded a second Galicia, and was eager to leave the country before the fury of Austria might break forth in pillage and massacre.

During the course of these events in Venetian Lombardy, the subjects of Ferdinand of Sicily also demanded extensive reforms.

In 1812 the constitution of Sicily, some centuries old, was modified under the advice, and with the assistance, of Lord Bentinck, and guaranteed by the English Government.

In 1816, on the triumph of absolutism in Europe, the Court of Naples endeavoured to bring the Sicilian Parliament to abolish the constitution, but did not succeed; subsequently the Neapolitan Government, with the view of making the constitution unpopular, imposed various unjust taxes, and took arbitrary measures to put down the liberty of the press. It abolished the national flag of Sicily, and caused the judges to prosecute with the utmost rigour the defenders of the national institutions.

A decree of August 16, 1816, ordered taxes to be levied without the interference of Parliament. In the December of the same year, the famous decree was published by which Ferdinand re-organised his whole kingdom, and so got rid of the Sicilian constitution, which he had sworn to maintain. He published, at the same time, a decree declaring that the amount of taxes should be fixed every year by the King; but must not in any year exceed 1,847,687 ounces, unless by sanction of a Parliament; nevertheless, without a Parliament, that impost was afterwards increased three-fold.

Another decree promised that public offices in Sicily should be filled by Sicilians; but, like all the previous promises, it was openly broken. And, that the people might have no chance of speaking out against these violations of public faith, the liberty of the press was abolished; and, still further to repress the spirit of inquiry and progress, all foreign newspapers, even those of absolute Governments, were prohibited. This state of things could not last. Again and again the people petitioned for reforms, and were put off with promises. At the commencement of the present year it became evident that the Sicilians could no longer be trifled with. Ferdinand of Naples became active, presided daily at councils, at which the state of the country, the deficit in the finances, the need for immediate abandonment of the old worn-out and hat-ful political forms, were eagerly discussed.

It was argued, also, that the army should be diminished. Ferdinand instead would increase it, and could not make up his mind what else to do. He felt it no easy matter to let go absolute power, to abandon the potion so long lived up to—that the people of Sicily were especially born to obey him and pay him taxes. It was hateful to contemplate the idea of these same people to any extent governing themselves and setting what taxes were needful to be paid. Their demands were, therefore, from day to day adjourned, until their patience could endure no longer, and the popular dissatisfaction broke out into open rebellion. There was some hope in Sicily and Naples that on the King's birthday the new and repeatedly promised constitution would be declared. The results of the final extinction of these expectations was the outburst of rebellion in Palermo. Never was outbreak more sudden, unanimous, or universal; nobles, students, women, priests, the whole populace, determined to be trifled with no longer, turned out and fought. The garrison took refuge in the Palace and small forts about the city. These forts were attacked, and the whole of Palermo, and, it might be said, all Sicily, fell into the hands of the insurgents. The news threw Ferdinand into a fever of rage and fury; a reinforcement of 4500 men were ordered to embark immediately; and, under the command of the Count d'Aquila, the King's brother, landed at Palermo, on the 15th; but the Count did not dare to risk a battle with the people. The troops remained in the forts, and, during forty-eight hours, continued to fire upon and bombard the city. The people, however, were not to be conquered. They attacked, and, by fierce fightings took, the fort of Castellamare. The whole populace were on the point of rising. The King's brother returned to Naples; his report convinced even the King that immediate concessions must be made. The Palermitans would take no promises, no mere securities; they demanded and obtained the proclamation of the constitution of 1812, which of right had belonged to them ever since that date. On the 29th the constitution was announced at Messina; on the 30th, at Palermo; and, on the same day, steamers were sent to bring back the troops.

At Naples, meanwhile, popular excitement, roused by the events in Sicily, had reached such a height that there was no course of safety but there, also, to grant a constitution, which was accordingly published on the 28th. On the 8th of February a constitution was proclaimed for Sardinia.

Throughout Italy the progress of these events was watched eagerly, and the accounts welcomed with the utmost enthusiasm. At Genoa there was a popular rejoicing, and the news of the people, heard in all directions, was "A Constitution for Piedmont!" At Rome the people crowded out for miles to meet the couriers on the Via Appia, and extraordinary supplements were issued hourly by the newspapers. A fête was held to celebrate the triumph of the Liberals. There was a similar fête at Florence, and at nearly all the other great towns of Italy.

In Lombardy, the people, beset by 100,000 soldiers, scarcely dared to rejoice. Austria was doggedly marching more troops upon them. The little army of the Duke of Modena had been incorporated with the Grand Duchy, and placed under the command of Radetzky. On the 29th, 30th, and 31st of January the railroad from Treviglio to Milan was closed to the public, being exclusively occupied with the conveyance of troops from Lombardy. The army was to keep back the tide of opinion rising throughout Italy; there was no chance of peace but in submission; no hope of reform under Metternich and Ferdinand. But this gathering army and the gloomy adherence to relentless tyranny increased the hatred of Austrian rule, enlisted universal sympathy for its victims, and fixed with sterner intensity the one idea of Italy for the Italians. At the fête to celebrate the proclamation of the Neapolitan constitution, the popular cry was "Live the Constitution!" "Death to the Austrians!" "Let us march to Lombardy to assist our brethren!"

But the case of Lombardy seemed hopeless—the army had been increased to 110,000, with 700 cannon. Arrests were incessant; the prison of Milan was crowded; numbers were sent to the House of Correction at Porta Nuova. The Austrians were everywhere insulted; it was evident that the storm of popular indignation must burst forth soon; that the struggle would be a fierce one, though it was scarcely possible to believe the Italians could be successful. The outbreak was hastened, and help came to them, from a quarter altogether unexpected.

Austria was the first to feel the revolutionary impulse given by France; the whole policy of Metternich had been to keep himself and to escape in disguise from amongst a people to whom he had so long been a source of terror. With his fall absolutism perished, and the will of the people was acknowledged. A constitutional Government was declared at Vienna, but it was too late to save the dominions in Lombardy by any Austrian form of Government. Italy for the Italians had become a master passion, and irrepressible.

On the 17th of March the Austrian Viceroy left Milan, and met on the road the courier with the intelligence of the popular triumph at Vienna. On the 18th the Milanese seized the post at the palace of Marino, the city governor, and began the construction of barricades; carriages were seized upon and overturned—the first was that of the vice-president of the Government, General O'Donnell; the pavement was torn up; not a soldier was to be seen; the barricades were finished during the night.

On the morning of the 18th the fighting commenced. The fire of cannon and musketry was kept up all day. The artillery planted in front of the cathedral and palace were seized by the people. Six pieces of cannon were taken at Binasco from a party of Austrian cavalry and Hungarian artillerymen, on the way from Pavia to Milan. On the Piazza del Duomo the populace captured six guns. A Provisional Government was formed, and the fighting continued on the 20th, with doubtful success to the people, who, notwithstanding the support of a body of Swiss who had forced the Porta Comasina, and brought ammunition and provisions, were driven from the Broletto—the centre of their movement.

On the morning of the 21st they regained their position, took possession of the powder-magazine, and planted a cannon on the tower of S. a Celso. General Radetzsky offered to treat with the Provisional Government, but was refused, unless on terms of unconditional surrender.

A deputation was despatched to Turin, demanding assistance, which was at once granted, and the Piedmontese force, under the command of the Duke of Genoa, and the Prince of Savoy, advanced on Milan on the 22d. The Austrians retired before it, and left the city garrisoned by its own citizens, and the auxiliary forces of Piedmont. The freedom of Milan was accomplished.

On the 19th the people of Parma rose suddenly and took possession of the chief posts in the city. On the 20th, after some fighting, the Duke issued a proclamation, declaring the appointment of a council, with supreme authority to give such instructions and adopt such measures as the circumstances might require, whilst he and his royal family quitted the states. On the same day the Duke of Modena was deposed and imprisoned, and the Austrians were driven out of Pavia.

On the 19th, Venice, Treiste, and Padua were in open insurrection; rebellion also spread through Vicenza, Treviso, and the whole of the Venetian territory, as far as Verona. On the 22nd General Count Zicler capitulated with the Provisional Government of Venice, and set it free from the domination of Austria. The King of Sardinia, Charles Albert, issued a proclamation, taking Lombardy under his protection, marched an army to join his forces at Milan, took the field boldly to drive Austria beyond the Alps, and virtually proclaimed himself the liberator of Italy. So far his campaign has been brilliant and victorious. The Austrians have been driven beyond the Mincio at Goito, and compelled to surrender Peschiera.

On the 1st of March an insurrectionary movement took place at Rome, in consequence of its being understood that the Pope, influenced by an intrigue amongst the Cardinals, had refused to declare war against Austria. The people had allowed him the previous day to form his resolution; and at five o'clock in the morning the whole city was on foot in eager impatience. The answer was that war would be formally declared; and (as the people had also demanded a complete separation of temporal and spiritual affairs) that no priest should be appointed to fill any public employment; that Pius the Ninth was the head of the Government; that a daily official bulletin would be published of the events of the great war, and encouragement given to the Roman youth to arm and drive the barbarians from Italy. This satisfied the people; the ferment was calmed, and all classes were united.

On the 13th of April the Sicilian Parliament passed by acclamation a decree—"That Ferdinand Bourbon and his dynasty were for ever fallen from the throne of Sicily. Sicily should govern herself constitutionally and call to the throne an Italian Prince, as soon as she shall have reformed her statute." The list of candidates for the throne has since been published. They are, a son of the King of Sardinia, the son of the Duke of Tuscany, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte (son of Lucien Bonaparte), and the Prince de Beauharnais. Enraged at this boldness, the King of Naples declared war against Sicily.

From first to last the conduct of Ferdinand has been false and treacherous: good faith has been disregarded, not a single promise has been kept, and every opportunity has been seized upon to cripple or retract the liberal measures he has been forced to yield. In no instance was this reactionary policy more determinedly carried out, than with regard to the election of Peers by the people of Naples.

The Commons had been returned; but no Peers had been elected by the people: in most instances, the forms requesting the nomination of that body were filled up with a request that the Commons should decide if it were advisable that a house of such a nature should have any voice in the legislature. On the 15th the houses were to meet. No Peers had been named up to the 13th, but, on the 14th, a proclamation appeared, emanating from the King (since the Minister had nearly all resigned), nominating fifty members for the House of Peers. Immediately on the publication of this document the Commons met privately, and agreed to address the National Guard on this encroachment of royal authority. Both houses were to meet and be sworn in on the 15th, at the Church of St. Lorenzo.

On Saturday, the 13th of May, the deputies were assembled in the Salle de Marto Olivetto, in preparatory session, to modify the form of oath to be taken at the opening of Parliament. The oath was, "I swear fidelity to the King and the constitution of the 29th of January." The deputies refused this form, as not being in accordance with the concessions of the 3rd of April, the National Guard, numbering 15,000, objected, and Saturday and Sunday were passed in negotiations. At eleven o'clock on Sunday night it was announced that the King would not modify the form. Eight deputies met, declared the sitting permanent, and sent a deputation to treat with the King, but without success. Another deputation was sent at twelve; the King asked time to consider, and at length pretended to accept a modification of the oath, reserving the rights of the 3rd of April. It was, however, mere pretence. Meanwhile, the troops had been ordered out. Soon after midnight the National Guards began raising barricades; at half-past one the générale was beaten, and at two the troops, cavalry, infantry, and artillery, occupied the spaces round the palace, castle, and market-place.

On Monday it was informed that barricades had been thrown up, the King ordered the withdrawal of the troops, and promised that the Parliament should be opened without any oath. But he was not to be believed; it might be a trick to get the popular leaders into his power; and the National Guards refused to lower the barricades unless the Chamber of Peers were abolished, the fortresses surrendered, and the troops removed from the metropolis. Instead, the soldiers were called out again, and at nine o'clock the Swiss guards were drawn up round the castle. A musket was discharged by accident; the National Guard commenced firing, the Swiss and artillery opened a murderous fire upon the people, and the battle raged in all directions. At San Fernando and San Bridgida the National Guard maintained their ground for three hours under an incessant fire of musketry and artillery. But the bloodshed of open battle was not enough for Ferdinand. The town was given up to pillage and massacre by the lazzaroni. Three guns were fired from the fort, and the red flag raised; and, at the preconcerted signal, with the shout of "Viva il Re!" the lazzaroni and troops burst with the fury of wild beasts into house after house, slaughtered the inhabitants without regard to age or sex, and dashed the bodies from the windows. Unheard of atrocities were committed. In one house a father, mother, and four children were shot. Some were dragged alive through the streets, to be butchered—struck at as they went along, and insulted by the agents of the police and the soldiers, who forced them to cry "Viva il Re!" when they refused, stabbed them in the face with their bayonets. The Royal Guard murdered two sons of the Marquis Vasatori in his own palace: the father went stark mad: the palace was sacked—so were all the palaces in Toledo. Next day 5000 lazzaroni, fresh from the plunder, with the clotted blood of those fierce butcheries upon them, were before the King's palace, to congratulate the King Ferdinand that his commands were so widely and remorselessly obeyed, his work so bravely done: but it did not answer; the people were not conquered. The last accounts state that the insurgent provinces had gained some advantages; the people refused to lay down their arms: the situation of the King was so beset with difficulties, that he spoke of abdication in favour of his son; but this discovery of his own unfitness comes too late, the Neapolitans have had enough of the butchery and robbery of Bourbons—their desire is to join the league with Lombardy-Piedmont, as Piacenza, Parma, Gustalla, Modena, and Reggio have already done, for the common interests of all, the protection and advancement of all, and the firm establishment of Italy for the Italians. The old Absolutism, the derided dream, is now a reality; and it seems all but impossible that Austria should ever again gain a footing in Italy.

THE REVOLUTIONS OF GERMANY.

THE large number of independent states of which the nfederated confederation of Germany is formed, renders a condensed account of the great events that have taken place in them since March a matter of some difficulty. These states are no less than 37 in number, many of them being very small, one or two smaller than our small county of Rutland; but each possessing an independent government, and only liable to be called upon to furnish a proportionate contingent to the army of the Confederation, in case of danger. For hundreds of years the desire of the union of Germany into one great federal empire, has existed in the minds and hearts of many patriotic men in Germany; and the establishment of the Great Zollverein, or Customs Union, was hailed with joy, as one of the means by which this object might be accomplished. With the exception of Austria, Hanover, Hamburg, and Mecklenburg-Schwerin, all the states of the Confederation immediately joined the union. Since the establishment for the customs union, the desire of the union of Germany has visibly increased, and, during the recent turmoil of events, has reached its height. From the severe censorship of the press formerly exercised in all the states of Germany, but very little of the truth, and that very much distorted, was known in other countries of the real feelings and wishes of the German nations. Their kings and princes were better known; but it is quite certain that, for many years past, the people of Germany have been desirous of political and social change, as, indeed, may be seen from the mock constitution granted by the King of Prussia in 1847, after so many broken promises. In the west and north of Germany poverty had been making alarming inroads since 1840, notwithstanding the employment afforded by the artificial birth and protection of factories and mills. The still more rapidly-increasing population, with its increasing intelligence, forced men to think on these matters; and very soon did they arrive at a conclusion not very far from the truth. Their Governments they felt, incensed the evils which man is heir to, without attempting to alleviate them. Their sight became still clearer, and they recognised the open despotism of Austria, whose Emperor was a child in the hands of Metternich; they saw through the flimsy pretexts of constitutional liberty with which Frederick William of Prussia sought to hide the despotic tendencies of his mind; they learned to contemn the disgraceful profligacy of the foolish King Ludwig of Bavaria; they discovered the petty tyrannies practised by the smaller Princes and Electors of Germany; and their minds awakened to a just sense of their rights and privileges as men as well as subjects. Silently were these impressions circulated through out the different states. Where voices were raised, their owners were banished or imprisoned, but nevertheless did these opinions gain ground. In Baden, MM. Welcker and Bassermann op nly called for constitutional government and freedom of the press. The first section was approaching; men understood that it was necessary, and were beginning to measure their strength, when suddenly the blaze of the French Revolution inflamed all Europe; its sparks flying in all directions, kindled the train in preparation in all Germany, and immediately the whole country was in one great blaze.

The first accounts of the French Revolution awakened in the minds of the inhabitants of the Rhine Provinces their ancient jealousy of the French, on account of the left bank of the Rhine, and caused great uneasiness in the Prussian Government. Cabinet councils were held very frequently, and it was determined to oppose every attempt at aggression on the part of the French. Large bodies of troops were advanced towards the Rhine, and the inhabitants of the Prussian p vinces, while asserting the independence of Prussia, agreed with their neighbours that it was their first and bounden duty to lay down their lives in defence of their country. In a few days, however, the bugbear of French invasion dropped almost out of sight. On the 29th of Feb., at Carlsruhe, in Baden, deputations from every town in the Grand Duchy besieged the Grand Duke, demanding liberty of the press, trial by jury, extended suffrage, constitutional Government, institution of a burgher guard, right of public meeting, and amended representation of the German nations in the Diet at Frankfort. On the 2nd March the Grand Duke succumbed to the demands of his people, dismissed his obnoxious ministers, and called to his council M. Welcker, a well-known friend of liberty and national progress, and for many years the firm and consistent opponent of all the despotic proceedings of the Government. Simultaneously, almost, great popular demonstrations were made in favour of the like concessions at Mayence, in Hesse Darmstadt; Hanau, in Hesse Cassel; Wiesbaden, in Nassau; Stuttgardt, in Wirtemburg; and many smaller towns in those neighbourhoods.

On the 3rd of March, at Cologne, the people proceeded en masse to the town-house, where the Council were sitting, and required of the Prussian authorities their sanction to similar petitions. A riot ensued, the town-house was stormed, and the authorities made prisoners. The intervention of the military released them, and the Governor of the Rhine Provinces promised to forward the petitions of the inhabitants to Berlin. On the same day the inhabitants of Frankfort met together, and added their voices to the almost universal shout for reform, expressing their discontent with the meagre concessions which the Diet had that day made. The Diet had abandoned the idea of a universal law of the press for all Germany, and resolved to allow each state to exercise its own judgment in the matter, subject to certain guarantees. The 4th of the month witnessed the bloodless revolution of Munich. On that day the people of Munich, barely recovered from the excitement of the Lola Montes affair, assembled together in large numbers in the streets in the neighbourhood of the palace, and demanded reform; their feelings were easily roused, and in the excitement of the moment they stormed the arsenal, possessed themselves of the arms it contained, and thus equipped, unchecked by the military, they proceeded to the palace, and wrenched from King Ludwig those concessions which he had refused to make. A week had thus elapsed since the occurrences at Paris, and we find that at its close the demands of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Bavaria, the dukedom of Baden, the kingdom of Wirtemburg, the dukedom of Nassau, and the electorate of Hesse Darmstadt, had been conceded by the ruling powers. At Hanau, in Hesse Cassel, a bloody insurrection, with barricades, and conflicts between a portion of the people and the soldiery, was needed before the Elector would give way. Eventually, on the 4th, he was constrained in the most humiliating manner to do as his people desired. One of the chief articles of these demands was that their rulers ought to cease to be alone represented at the Diet, and demanded that the people should have their representatives at its sittings. In addition to this application for the amendment of the constitution of the Diet, much was said and written concerning the advantages of the union of the whole of Germany into one federal empire. The very favourable reception accorded to this idea throughout the Rhine Provinces led to a meeting of philosophers and statesmen, to whom the question belongs will be the ground of the utmost importance. On the 5th of March fifty-one representatives of different countries of Prussia, Bavaria, Wirtemburg, Baden, Hesse Cassel, Nassau, and Hesse Darmstadt, met together at Heidelberg to consult on the state of Germany, and the steps necessary to be adopted in such a crisis. They unanimously adopted a series of resolutions, embodying the following plan: — That no war of intervention should be made against the new order of things; that no attempts should be made to deprive other nations of the liberty and independence which they had earned as a right; that a representative assembly should be convened for all German states, to avert internal and external dangers, and to develop the energy and prosperity of the country; that a body of volunteer representatives should be organised to offer their assistance to Government in this matter; and that all Germany should unite to defend the country against foreign aggression. Very much to its credit, the Diet then sitting at Frankfort, on the following day, declared its conviction of the necessity of reforming the Federal Diet, and invoked the different German states to send immediately to Frankfort persons enjoying the confidence of their countrymen, to assist in the deliberations necessary for a new constitution of the Diet. During this first week of March matters remained tranquil in the north and south of Germany, though the uneasiness felt by the people was shared by councillors had very much increased. The agitation of the sturdy inhabitants of the Rhine provinces, slight symptoms of the same near the capital, and occasional gentle reminders of broken promises, induced Prince Frederick William of Prussia, on the 6th, to promise that he would grant to the assembled States the right conferred by the law of the 17th of February on the assembled Committees of the States, to meet periodically, at fixed times; and he promised to confirm the privileges of the Committees in a corresponding manner. No time, however, was fixed. On the same day the Prince of Prussia was appointed Governor-General of the Rhine Provinces. He did not, however, leave Berlin. Large bodies of troops were moving all this time from the eastern provinces of Prussia to the neighbourhood of the Rhine. On the 10th of the month the King of Prussia issued a decree declaring himself dissatisfied with the resolutions of the Diet with respect to the freedom of the press, and announced that, unless the Diet granted substantively the freedom of the press for the whole Confederation, he would take the initiative for the Prussian kingdom at the next meeting. We may here state that on the 15th he issued another decree, announcing that, in consequence of the resolutions of the Diet on the 9th, he promised that he would grant to the assembled States the right conferred by the law of the 17th of February on the assembled Committees of the States, to meet periodically, at fixed times; and he promised to confirm the privileges of the Committees in a corresponding manner. No time, however, was fixed. On the same day the Prince of Prussia was appointed Governor-General of the Rhine Provinces. He did not, however, leave Berlin. Large bodies of troops were moving all this time from the eastern provinces of Prussia to the neighbourhood of the Rhine. On the 10th of the month the King of Prussia issued a decree declaring himself dissatisfied with the resolutions of the Diet with respect to the freedom of the press, and announced that, unless the Diet granted substantively the freedom of the press for the whole Confederation, he would take the initiative for the Prussian kingdom at the next meeting. We may here state that on the 15th he issued another decree, announcing that, in consequence of the resolutions of the Diet on the 9th, he had accepted the invitation of the Diet to send deputies to Frankfort, for the purpose of deliberating on the re-construction of the Federal Diet on a more extended basis, and in order that, fundamentally united by strengthened free institutions, Germany might once more become one great country, and reassume its ancient grandeur and power, sunk in Europe.

While King Frederick William was thus engaged in Prussia, his ally in Saxony was undergoing the process of compulsory concession. Dresden and Leipsic pronounced in favour of the universal progress, and compelled the King to grant their request. King Ernest Augustus of Hanover was being roused also, and after much temporising and great delays, which, if prolonged another day, might have cost him his throne, was compelled on the 16th to grant the demands of the Hanoverians. Having travelled a little out of the order of dates in order to show the progress of the revolution in the north of Germany, and in order that the influence of the revolution in Vienna might be more particularly shown in the subsequent events at Berlin, we will now turn our attention to the capital of the Austrian dominions. Long held to be the most politically careless race in Germany, their city, one of the most pleasant in Europe for the resort of foreigners, renowned for its varied attractions, musical, theatrical, and scientific, but regarded as dead to all else, the Viennese nevertheless preceded Berlin in the attainment of the Constitutional Government.

On the 13th March the session of the Diet of Lower Austria was opened. An immense concourse of the inhabitants assembled in the neighbourhood of the church, headed by the students. They drew up a petition in favour of constitutional Government, freedom of the press, national armament, trial by jury, and religious freedom. Having possessed themselves of the Hall of Assembly, Archduke Albert addressed them, assuring the students that their demands should be granted. Notwithstanding this assurance of the Archduke, nothing was done; a decree promulgating freedom of the press was issued, but withdrawn within half an hour, and their demands were then refused. Angry and excited, the populace and the students rushed upon the arsenal, obtained arms, and advancing to meet the soldiers, who were ordered to suppress the riot. In various parts of the town barricades were built, and conflicts occurred on the night of the 13th, and morning of the 14th. The military made no impression on the rioters; and the Government finding the neighbouring countrymen were flocking into the town to assist the insurrectionists, and that portions of the soldiery were also leaving the ranks, felt themselves compelled to succumb; Metternich resigned, the unpopular Archdukes Albert, Ludwig, and William retired, the demands of the people were granted, a popular ministry installed, and Austria became a constitutional empire on the 15th of March. Metternich fled in disguise, and his palace was burnt. The accounts of the number of slain during these two days vary very much; 160 will be found to be near the real result. The emperor is represented to have behaved with perfect calmness. One of the results of the change was that Hungary obtained a national government. The Hungarian Chamber had previously remonstrated very strongly against the policy pursued by Metternich, and had demanded the recal of the Austrian authorities, and the substitution of Hungarians in their places.

Prussia, and Berlin more especially, now demand our attention; and we must return to the 13th of March. On that day a monster meeting was held in Berlin to petition the King for the reforms granted in other countries. The meeting, which was rather tumultuous, was dispersed by the soldiery: blood was shed, and several lives were lost. On the 14th and 15th similar meetings took place, which were put down in the same way. On the following day the students of Berlin, united with those of Halle, joined the people in their petitions, and threatened to arm unless their petitions were granted. On the 17th the Revolution at Vienna became known at Berlin, and, on the morning of the 18th, the King issued that most remarkable decree in which he demands the union of the whole German Empire, the re-organisation of its confederation, the institution of a common Government, a common army, and a common customs union, and very plainly intimates his willingness to accept the Imperial throne, acknowledging, as he did, that, in the adoption of this course of proceeding, he had been very materially hastened by the events at Vienna. Though the last German Sovereign to grant the demands of his people, he was perfectly ready, now that popularity was necessary to the attainment of his objects, to grant some, at least, of the required concessions. He granted liberty of the press, subject to the penal laws for libel, &c., and convoked the Diet for the 2d of April. Slight as were these concessions, the great aspirations of his Majesty were very popular apparently; and in the afternoon of the same day the people assembled in the square in front of the palace, to thank the King and cheer him, when, by an unaccountable accident, suddenly two shots were fired, and the people were immediately charged by the infantry and cavalry, with whom the palace and its courts were filled, many lives were lost, and the people fled in all directions. Barricades were erected, the gun-shops sacked, and the people armed. All that afternoon and the following night did the battle rage with the utmost vehemence. In the morning, though apparently successful, the troops were completely worn out with fatigue; and their general being in the hands of the people, a prisoner, the King capitulated, ordered all the troops to leave the town, permitted the establishment of the burgher guard, granted universal suffrage, dismissed his hated ministers (Bodelschwingh, Thile, and Eichorn), and nominated Count Arnim President of the Council, with Count Schwerin and M. Auerswald (all Liberals) as his assistants. On the morning of the 19th a royal proclamation appeared, declaring that the revolution had been caused by evil-minded foreigners, and that his troops did not use their weapons until they were forced to appear in the balcony, to see thirty-seven dead bodies, the victims either of an unlucky blunder or an equally unfortunate treachery. Of the people, nearly two hundred and forty fell during the fight; the number of soldiers killed is not known, but it is conjectured to be near seven or eight hundred. Of course, very many died of their wounds subsequently. On the 20th a political amnesty was declared, and M. Camphausen summoned to assist in the ministry. During the conflict, the Prince of Prussia, who was very obnoxious to the people remained hidden in the palace. He subsequently left Berlin disguised, and fled to this country, whither he was declared to have been sent by his brother on a secret mission. What that mission really was, still remains a secret; but its results the future history of Germany will show. On the 21st, King Frederick William announced the kingdom of Prussia in a proclamation, and declared his intention of once more uniting Germany, and taking it under his guidance in these moments of peril and anarchy. Prussia was to be merged into Germany, constitutional government, equal political and civil rights, popular and liberal administrations, were the order of the day. This proclamation was received with enthusiasm, and on the following day the King rode through Berlin, wearing the German national colours, escorted by half the population, cheering him to the skies, the blood of the slain subjects hardly dried in the streets, and their bodies lying in state in all the churches. On that occasion, his Majesty swore that he did not intend to dethrone any one German Prince—that he did not wish for the Imperial Crown, and only wanted liberty, union, and good order in Germany. To assist in the ministerial deliberations on the new constitution, Professor Jordan, the well-known historian and tried friend of liberty, was summoned to Berlin.

While matters were proceeding thus in the capital of Prussia, King Ludwig of Bavaria, distracted by the turmoil in his kingdom, and hankering after the dismissed and banished Lola Montes, suddenly abdicated the throne in favour of his son Maximilian. On the 22nd the new King opened the Chambers in person; and in a gracious speech from the throne, announced his intention of perfecting the concessions granted by his father. The ex-King was, a few days afterwards, prevented, by his son Maximilian, from suddenly leaving Munich for Switzerland, where Lola Montes was residing. Subsequently matters have remained tolerably tranquil in Bavaria, the Ministry and the Chambers being employed in securing and organising the necessary laws for the government of the country under the new system of things; and, contenting ourselves with here stating that a slight disturbance occurred a few weeks ago in consequence of the high price of beer, we shall not find it necessary to allude to Bavaria again.

In Austria matters were steadily progressing; the Ministry, employed in securing by law the liberal concessions, were assisted by twelve members of the Diet, and twelve others. The most potent was the abolition, freedom of the press being considered a guarantee against treasonable associations; a political amnesty was pronounced, and nearly 200 political prisoners were released.

At Presburg, the capital of Hungary, great dissatisfaction was expressed at two decrees, which placed the control of the Government somewhat in the hands of Vienna; in the National Assembly violent speeches were made, and the two Imperial Commissioners were burnt in effigy in the streets. The Bohemians being also at this time much agitated, Baron Pillersdorf promised them that all their demands should be granted; that they should have their national representatives, a national guard, and that their own language should be used. On the 6th April the Ministry at Vienna underwent another change; Archduke Ludwig, Kolowrath, and Kubeck, who were suspected of reactionary designs, resigned office, and were succeeded by Archduke John, M. Fiquelmont, and Krauss, with Marshal Zanini for Minister of War. Hungary continued much agitated, and Bohemia was in open rebellion, two or three of the Magnates or Princes setting themselves up for Kings.

Vienna during the whole of April and May may be said to have been under the rule of the mob, guided by the students. On the 10th serious disturbances occurred, Fiquelmont was forced to resign, and was succeeded by Baron Sebzaltini. On the 18th of May the Emperor left Vienna, being carried away by his wife and a party anxious for his personal safety, and fearful that it would be compromised if he remained in Vienna. Without his knowledge, while he was taking an airing, the horses' heads were turned, and arrangements having been previously made by the party in question, they carried the Emperor safely to Innspruck, in the Tyrol, where he still remains. His ministers sent after him assuring him of his safety; but he had somewhat imbibed the fears of his friends, and preferred remaining with his beloved Tyrolese. His Court and the diplomatic corps were of course transferred to Innspruck. On the 27th of May fresh disturbances occurred. On and in consequence of an order from the Minister for the Interior to the students' legion to disband. Barricades were built, and after a short conflict the students were victorious. Baron Pillersdorf then ratified the wishes of the citizens and students, declared them independent of every other authority, and answerable for the public safety. Since then Vienna has been perfectly tranquil; the elections to the new Assembly have proceeded quietly, but there is a great deal of intriguing going on in the city, and the Emperor is said to have expressed a desire to return, in consequence of hints of requiring his abdication in favour of his brother, Archduke Francis. Meanwhile, the Austrians are triumphant, their desires have been accomplished, constitutional freedom in all things is their own, and their attention is absorbed by the proceedings of the German Parliament at Frankfort, which will claim our attention as soon as we have narrated the course of events in Hungary, Bohemia, and Prussia. Croatia, Slavonia, and Dalmatia openly revolted, and proclaimed their intention of founding a Slavonic Empire, with the Ban Jellalich at its head; while Hungary, having been fraternally addressed by the Emperor, in proclamations and decrees; and its demands having been granted, remained tolerably quiet and loyal, the Emperor promising to visit Presburg and Pesth.

In Bohemia events were rapidly hurrying to a crisis. The hatred of the Austrian Government was as deep as it was of old standing. The weak and vacillating conduct of the Austrian Government, the infectious triumphs of the people at Vienna, fanned the love of insurrection, and on the 29th of May a Provisional Government was proclaimed at Prague independent of Vienna, with Count Leo Thun at his head. Immediately after its establishment, the Provisional Government opened a communication with Vienna, and a perfect conflict of protocols ensued, which lasted more than a week. Irritated at the triumphs and determination of the Bohemians, preparations were made on the 12th June, by the Austrian commander in Prague, Count Windischgrätz, to remove some of the cannon and other military stores to the neighbouring hills, which commanded the city, when the inhabitants opposed this proceeding by force. A most fearful and bloody contest ensued, which lasted until the 16th, when, finding the troops unable to sustain the fight in the narrow streets of the city, Count Windischgrätz drew off his troops, and on the two following days bombarded the town from the neighbouring heights. On the evening of the 17th thirteen of the insurrectionary leaders surrendered, and the town once more was in the hands of the Austrians. Accurate accounts of the number slain during these five frightful days are still wanting, but it must have been enormous.

Berlin, in the days immediately after the revolution, quietly witnessed the change of ministry, and listening to the promises that were made, on the 22nd the inhabitants commenced assembling in moderate meetings, to discuss the social question of the day, viz. the want of regular well-paid employment; they ended in demanding the formation of a ministry for the administration of labour. On the 24th the King promised the national organization of Posen; and immediately appointed a committee, half Germans and half Poles, to confer with his commissioner, Count Wilhaim, on the necessary proceedings to be adopted. This proceeding was regarded as a much distasteful one by the German inhabitants, who, inimical towards the Poles, composed the larger number of the inhabitants. Its results will be seen very shortly. On the 28th of March a new ministry entered office; Counts Arnim and Schwerin retired, and their places were filled by MM. Camphausen, Bassermann, Hansmann, Auerswald, men of the extreme left ultra radicals. The first is an eminent banker and merchant at Cologne. Their first step in office was to procure from his Majesty a decree placing the whole public business in their hands, and rendering them responsible for its conduct. On the 3rd of April the Diet was convened, and the first time was in the sittings open to the press and the public. Ministers were well received. The town remaining perfectly quiet, the citizens, unused to the onerous duty of standing guard all night, began to complain, and on the 7th of April two regiments of infantry entered the town to share the duty with the burghers, however, place, and the command of the Burgher Guard. Great difficulty was experienced by the authorities in employing the people out of work; large public works were planned and immediately commenced, and the poorer classes in the town were soon relieved from the distress. The Diet occupied itself in discussing a project for a new law of elections for the Assembly to be convoked for the consideration of the Prussian Constitution. The elections were to be indirect; every 500 inhabitants of the age of twenty-four were to elect one elector, and 80 of these electors were to elect the deputy. Every one was qualified to vote at the age of twenty-four, and to be elected at the age of thirty. About 350 members were to be this elected, and so their Assembly would meet as one Chamber. Those laws were adopted by large majorities. The influence of the Germanic Diet (whose proceedings at that period we have omitted in the most remarkable manner on the 7th of April. On the previous day, in accordance with a decree of the Diet, the Prussian Assembly proceeded to elect deputies for the new German Parliament from among themselves; but the next day brought another decree from the Diet at Frankfort reversing their previous one, and ordering that the elections should be direct, and that a deputy should be elected for every 70,000 inhabitants. Accordingly, the Prussian Diet was compelled to annul its former proceedings; and M. Camphausen announced that it was the duty of Prussia to assume a leading part. On the same day the destitute condition of the Royal Treasury was published, and a loan of 15,000,000 of thalers was resolved upon by the Diet, as well as the giving guarantees to the extent of 25,000,000 more for the support of credit, commerce, and industry; and having voted their confidence in the ministry, the Diet was dissolved.

The alarming condition of the province of Posen at this time attracted much attention. The concessions made to the Poles by the King had very much alarmed the German inhabitants, more particularly the peasants. The appointment of Count Willisen as President of the province, who was well known, and whose acts on his arrival proved him to be more than partial to the Poles, added fuel to the flames. The peasants assembled together in large numbers and attacked the residences of the Polish nobility, many of which were sacked and burnt; the province was shortly in a state of anarchy; the Poles armed in self-defence. Mieroslawski, who had been conspicuous in the conspiracy at Berlin of 1846-7, joined his countrymen, who very soon afterwards amounted in number to 20,000 men, armed chiefly with scythes and axes. That such a state of things could not continue, was plain. Count Willisen, who was accused of having indirectly caused this state of things, was recalled, and succeeded by General Colomb, who immediately called together the troops, and marched against the Polish insurgents. Several bloody engagements took place, in the earlier of which the Poles, under Mieroslawski, obtained the most decisive advantages; but on the 6th of May a general engagement ensued in the neighbourhood of Xionx, in which Mieroslawski was defeated and made prisoner. The routed Poles were pursued and dispersed on all sides. The insurrection was completely quelled; and General Colomb having been withdrawn, General Pfuehl, the President of the province, by conciliatory, but determined measures, has succeeded in quelling the turbulent spirits, and the Prussian provinces of Poland may be regarded as quiet at present. The increasing commercial distress, the utter stagnation of all commercial business, many factories and mills in Berlin and its neighbourhood, but more particularly in the large manufacturing towns on the Rhine, the failure of many large bankers and merchants of the highest order, the certainty that no immediate improvement could be expected, and the increasing agitation among the working classes, who now demanded labour as a right—all these questions and difficulties excited the utmost attention and alarm in thinking minds. The Diet had consented to relieve the poor in the towns by the removal of all octroi duties levied on flour and meat, and in the place had imposed direct taxation by classes. The employment demanded by the working classes could not be found for them in sufficient quantities; all foreigners out of employment were ordered to leave the country, and persons not having a settlement in the towns were removed to their homes. The King of Prussia, during this time, completely overwhelmed by the ridicule and angry feelings which his celebrated German proclamation had excited, remained at Potsdam, endeavouring to forget his political discomfiture and grief by strong internal applications.

STORMING THE ARSENAL, BERLIN.

Great meetings of the people continued to be held in Berlin, but no disturbances occurred, though serious fears were entertained that the desire of M. Camphausen for the return of the Prince of Prussia would cause an outbreak. His mission to England was declared by the people to be a sham; and that it was well known that the man who had caused the fatal occurrence of March had fled through fear of the consequences of his conduct on that memorable occasion. The elections to the new Constituent Assembly proceeded quietly and without disturbance anywhere. The National Assembly met for the first time on the 22d, and from the subsequent proceedings it will be found that the reactionary party were in a majority. His Majesty opened the Chamber in person, in his speech he declared himself most anxious for the unity of Germany, and trusted that the efforts of the new Assembly would restore confidence, revive trade and commerce, and resuscitate industrial activity. The project for the constitution was laid before the Assembly. The chief points of this plan are exceedingly liberal, quite in the spirit of the times. The Parliament to consist of an Upper and Lower House, the former of the Royal Princes, sixty members appointed by the King, the appointment to be hereditary; and of 180 members, to be elected by the people, and to serve for eight years. The Lower House to consist of members elected on the basis of the law of elections spoken of above. All authority is vested in these two houses, except over the army and the judicature; the King to possess the right of making war or peace. Liberty of all kinds granted to the fullest extent, and no money to be raised without the authority of Parliament. This project excited much discussion, and few wholly approved of it. It has been referred to a committee, whose proceedings have not yet terminated.

The sending away of some arms from the arsenal on the 30th May excited the students and the people; the boats were stopped, the cases opened, and the contents divided among the actors in this scene. The turbulent excitement of the people increased day by day; they demanded that the working classes should be armed. This was partially conceded, and they were paraded. On the 6th the Prince of Prussia arrived in Berlin, and took his seat in the Assembly on the 8th. His reception was anything but favourable; hissing and hooting greeted him both on his arrival and departure; out of doors, his reception was the same, if not worse.

Our readers are familiar with the subsequent events; with the angry dissatisfaction excited out of doors by the success of a motion in the Assembly that the revolution should not be acknowledged; with the ministerial crisis, which existed until last week, when M. Camphausen resigned, his successor being M. Auerswald, one of his colleagues. The present ministry is regarded as rather democratic. It has need of wisdom, courage, and determination; for the same causes which effected the fearful events of last week in Paris are at work in Berlin and elsewhere. Foresight and prudence may prevent such an outbreak; but men are beginning to dread its occurrence.

The proceedings of the Germanic Parliament at Frankfort, and the war in Schleswig-Holstein, remain to be sketched; but the little republican war in Baden in April is worthy of being mentioned, before we proceed to those more important subjects. Immediately after the French Revolution, a large meeting of Germans was held in Paris, at which M. Herwegh, the poet, presided. It was there determined that a republic was the only form of government adapted to Germany, and resolving to make an attempt to carry out their principles by force of arms, a German legion was formed for the purpose. In Baden, also, about the 10th of April, an attempt was made of a similar nature by MM. Hecker and Struve, who collected large bodies of armed men of similar republican tendencies. The troops of the Diet were ordered out to disperse these revolutionists. Hecker and Struve were defeated in several engagements; they were joined by Herwegh and his legion, who had entered Germany from France through the Black Forest; but with united forces they were unable to resist the troops, and, in a bloody engagement in Wirtemberg, were totally routed. Struve was made prisoner, and the two others escaped. Similar attempts in Hesse-Cassell and Hildesheim were also completely suppressed.

As the Germanic Parliament took a very active part in supporting the war in Schleswig-Holstein, it will be to the reader's advantage if we narrate the proceedings of that body before the events of the war. The assembly of deputies from all the states of Germany, who were appointed in consequence of the expressed wishes of the Diet, assisted by the seventeen men of confidence, to make arrangements for the convocation of a German Parliament, was constituted on the 31st of March; M. Mittermaur was appointed President. Among the celebrated men present were Dahlmann, Welcker, Blum, Jordan, and others. After a preliminary meeting, the plan for the election of the German Parliament was proposed, based upon universal suffrage, without consideration of property, class, or religious creed. It proposed that every German subject should both be entitled to vote and to be elected; one deputy to be returned for every 50,000 inhabitants. On the 7th of April this plan was adopted by a large majority. According to the census of 1842—upon which it was framed—Austria would send 190 members, Prussia 158, Bavaria 71, Wirtemberg 28, Hanover 26, Saxony 24, Baden 20, Hesse-Darmstadt 12, Hesse-Cassell 11, and the smaller states would return the remaining 64. The population thus represented would amount to 30,164,392. The Assembly resolved, at its first meeting, to recognise Schleswig-Holstein, and urged upon the federal states of the empire, particularly Prussia, the necessity of assisting the duchies in their endeavours to maintain their independence. They also decided upon the incorporation of the province of Posen in the Diet, as well as East and West Prussia. During the sittings of this Assembly, the Republican party, headed by M. Itzstein, made several attempts to procure the recognition of Republican principles, but they were completely defeated, the Assembly declaring that the constitution of Germany could alone be remodelled upon the broadest constitutional monarchical basis. They held their last sitting on the 7th of April, and then dissolved, leaving a committee en permanence, to keep the Diet which still existed up to the proper mark, and to discuss the question of the new German constitution. On the 27th this Committee completed their labours, and presented the Diet their project for a Constitution, which was drawn up by the celebrated Dahlmann. It proposed that all the states hitherto belonging to the Confederation should form one empire, with their separate independence somewhat limited. That the Government of the Empire should represent Germany or any particular state in foreign affairs, and manage all diplomatic matters, determine upon peace or war, control the army and navy, the customs, canals, railways, and telegraphs, all legislation, and dispose of all customs and postage revenues. The power of the empire to be united in the Emperor, the Imperial Upper and Imperial Lower House. The Upper House to consist of 200 members: viz. all the reigning princes; a deputy from each of the four free towns; Peers to be chosen half by the Parliaments and half by the reigning princes for a term of twelve years, one-third withdrawing at the end of every four years: the Lower House to consist of representatives of the people, one for every 100,000 souls. The Parliament to meet once a year at Frankfort, and the Lower House to have the control of the budget, similarly to our House of Commons. A supreme court of justice to be instituted at Nuremberg, to decide all disputes between reigning princes, or against any one of them, and all charges of high treason.

On the 18th of May the German Parliament met for the first time at Frankfort; 397 members were present. M. von Gagern, the monarchist candidate for the presidency, was elected by a majority of 280 votes. The first sittings were occupied by questions of form and in settling something like standing orders; frequent attempts, however, were made by the Republicans to procure a Republic in Germany; and though some differed as to the form of government, all were agreed on the question of its union into one great Confederation. They appointed a committee to consider the proposed Constitution, and another to consider whether a provisional central power should be created until the adoption of the Constitution. During the sittings of these committees many heated discussions took place, but nothing of importance occurred, excepting the appointment of another Committee, to consider the rights of the people. On the 26th of June, the latter and the Committee on the provisional central power made their reports to Parliament. The former issued the following declaration of rights:—Religious liberty, gratuitous education, free opinion, inviolable secrecy of letters, the inhabitant of any state to possess the same political privileges while residing in another, right of petitioning, meeting, and forming clubs; no political privileges; equality of taxation; independence of the judges; trial by jury; constitutional representation of the people in every state; and the Ministers to be responsible; all Parliaments to be open to the public. The other committee proposed the institution of a Directory of State, to be approved and appointed by the German Parliament, with very extended powers. On the 27th this proposition was rejected; and on the 28th the Parliament decided upon appointing a Lieutenant-General of the Empire, to be perfectly irresponsible. This also enacted that, on the appointment of the Lieutenant-General of the Empire, the existence of the Diet was at an end; and, further, that on the completion and adoption of the Constitution for Germany, the Provisional Central Power to cease.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, FRANKFORT, WHEREIN THE GERMAN PARLIAMENT HOLD THEIR SITTINGS.

On the 29th the Assembly proceeded to the election of the Lieutenant-General. The choice fell upon the Archduke John of Austria, who was elected by a very large majority, in opposition to Gagern, the President of the Assembly; Eckstein, the republican; and the Archduke Stephen; the latter only obtained one vote.

But little space remains for a brief narrative of the events in Schleswig-Holstein. A long, narrow, sandy peninsula comprises the two Duchies and Jutland. For more than a century the two former have been under Danish rule, though they always considered themselves as governed by the King of Denmark in his capacity as a Sovereign Prince of Germany. Long dissatisfied with the Danish rule, and more particularly with a recent refusal of the King to concede to them any of their demands, they declared themselves independent of Denmark, and a German Duchy, on the 26th of March, under the sway of the Duke of Augustenburg. The Provisional Government sent to Hanover, Berlin, and Hamburg for assistance, which was granted from the two former, and before the 3rd of April more than 13,000 Prussians and Hanoverians had entered Holstein. The inhabitants had already possessed themselves of Rendsburg, and had expelled the Danish authorities. The Danes were not behindhand with their military preparations, and very soon had an imposing force in the field; while the extraordinary popularity of the war in Germany brought shoals of volunteers from even the southernmost states of Germany to the assistance of their enemies. At Flensburg an engagement took place between the Holsteaners and Danes, at which the latter were victorious. Nearly 20,000 Prussians and Hanoverians, besides volunteers and Schleswig-Holsteiners, were now under arms against the Danes, whose forces were nearly equal. During the months of April and May a great many skirmishes occurred, with variable success; one or two general engagements at Schleswig and Apenraade; and one which lasted two days at Duppeln. The Danes were driven northward, and the combined troops were at one time in possession of Jutland. The island of Alsen was also the scene of an engagement. Though beaten and driven back on land, the King of Denmark made severe reprisals at sea. He blockaded the whole northern coast of Germany; his vessels of war took possession of the rich merchant ships returning to Hamburg and Bremen—an incalculable loss to the Hanse Towns. Our ports are still full of German shipping, waiting until peace is declared. Sweden commenced preparations for the assistance of Denmark; Russia was reported to be doing the same; the Diet at Frankfort rejected all offers of mediation for a long time, and the national feeling in favour of the Duchies was beginning to flag. Nothing of importance has occurred at the seat of war for some weeks, both armies standing still, and awaiting the result of the negotiations which are now pending. While we write, it is reported in the newspapers that peace has been concluded, though the terms are not mentioned. We heartily trust that it may prove to be true, and that, instead of having their attention and energy distracted by an expensive external war, the states of Germany may, by calm and courageous proceedings at home, be enabled to avert the calamities which increasing poverty, diminished trade, and universal distrust compel us to say are impending over them.
